CONGRESSIONAL RECORD,

FORTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION.

CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE FORTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS.

SECOND SESSION.

SENATE.

MONDAY, December 1, 1884.

The first Monday of December being the day prescribed by the Constitution of the United States for the annual meeting of Congress, the second session of the Forty-eighth Congress commenced this day.

The Senators assembled in the Senate Chamber in the Capitol at Washington city.

The President pro tempore (Mr. GEORGE F. EDMUNDS, a Senator from the State of Vermont) took the chair and called the Senate to order at 12 o'clock noon.

PRAYER.

Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D., Chaplain to the Senate, offered the following prayer:

Let us pray. Almighty God, we adore Thee as King of kings and Lord of lords, infinite in wisdom, power, and goodness.

Permit us to draw near with reverence, and honor that Name which is high over all, blessed forever.

We come to thank Thee for the many mercies with which Thou hast been pleased to favor us, and to humbly ask that Thou wilt continue to regard us as the objects of Thy care.

While we have rested Death has been at work, and the ripened grain has fallen by the hand of the great Harvester. Not the Senate only, but the Cabinet and the House of Representatives have received the stroke of the Destroyer, and the nation has been reminded that in the midst of life we are in death.

May we profit by the example of the lives of those now gone, and in their decease read once more the ever salutary lesson of our own mortality. We thank Thee that Thou dost still preserve our country from foreign invasion and intestine war. Surely Thy banner over us is love; and we pray that we may use the opportunity afforded by these pacific times, by such a conserving of fraternal intercourse and by plans for mutual helpfulness, that sectional ambition may be known only in that praiseworthy rivalry by which each desires to outdo the other in benefiting all. Graciously regard all those who are in authority among us, the President of the United States, the Speaker and the House of Representatives, and in an especial manner do Thou be pleased to give Thy blessing to the members of this Senate; continue health and wisdom, strength and fidelity to its presiding officer, and during the entire session may the lives of all its employés be precious in Thy sight. In the performance of their duties may they so yield themselves to the suggestions of Thy Holy Spirit that when done with the management of public affairs now committed to their hands they may be greeted with Thy smile and rest beneath Thy benediction. We ask these mercies in the name of Jesus Christ, our Mediator and Redeemer. Amen.

SENATORS PRESENT.

The following Senators were present:

From the State of—

Alabama—John T. Morgan and James L. Pugh.
Arkansas—Augustus H. Garland and James D. Walker.

NOTIFICATION TO THE HOUSE.

Mr. LOGAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is assembled, and that the Senate is ready to proceed to business.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. SHERMAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee, consisting of two members, be appointed to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of each House is assembled, and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the committee on the part of the Senate; and Messrs. SHERMAN and GARLAND were appointed.

HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. DAWES submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the hour of the daily meeting of the Senate be 12 o'clock meridian until otherwise ordered.

CREDENTIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the credentials of William P. Sheffield, appointed by the governor of the State of Rhode Island a Senator from that State to fill, until the next meeting of the Legislature thereof, the vacancy caused by the death of HENRY B. ANTHONY; which were read and ordered to be filed.

RECESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that under the rules petitions and memorials are now in order. The Chair understands that the custom has been not to receive ordinary business until the fact of the assembling of the House of Representatives has been communicated to the Senate. Therefore, if there be no objection, the Chair will not make the ordinary call.

Mr. COCKRELL (at 12 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.). I move that the Senate take a recess for thirty minutes.

The motion was agreed to; and at the expiration of the recess (at 12 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate reassembled.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

Mr. JOHN B. CLARK, jr., the Clerk of the House of Representatives, appeared below the bar of the Senate and delivered the following message:

Mr. President, I have been directed by the House of Representatives to inform the Senate that a quorum of the House of Representatives has appeared, and that the House is ready to proceed to business.

I am further directed to inform the Senate that the House has passed a resolution that a committee of three members be appointed on the part of the House to join such committee as may be appointed by the Senate to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses has assembled, and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

I am also directed to announce that the House has appointed Mr. SAMUEL J. RANDALL of Pennsylvania, Mr. SAMUEL S. COX of New York, and Mr. THOMAS M. BROWNE of Indiana the committee on the part of the House.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I see no reason why the Senate should not proceed with the reception of the ordinary morning business. If it is now in order, I shall present a petition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive petitions, if there be no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN presented the petition of Israel W. Andrews and other citizens of Marietta, Ohio, praying that certain relief be granted Charles Morris Blake, post chaplain, United States Army, retired; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LAPHAM presented a petition of citizens of New York, praying that certain relief be granted Charles Morris Blake, post chaplain, United States Army, retired; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MORRILL presented the petition of Emily L. Alvord, widow of Brig. Gen. Benjamin Alvord, late Paymaster-General United States Army, praying for a pension of $50 per month; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MILLER, of California, presented the petition of Charles M. Blake, post chaplain, United States Army, retired, praying for certain relief; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the California State Grange, favoring an appropriation of $15,000 for two years for establishing and conducting two agricultural experiment stations in California and one in Oregon; which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. DAWES introduced a bill (S. 2369) declaring certain Indians to be citizens of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2370) dividing the Pottawatomie reservation in the Indian Territory, and authorizing patents to issue to the tribes of Absentee Shawnee and the Citizen Band of Pottawatomie Indians; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 2371) to hereafter prohibit distinctions being made in the military service of the United States against any class of American citizens; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2372) to enable officers of the Army who were promoted for gallant and distinguished services in the war of the rebellion to be retired with the rank and full pay of the grade to which they were so promoted; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2373) to facilitate promotions throughout the Army, by retiring from active service, upon their own application, officers of the Army who served in the war of the rebellion; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2374) to authorize the lighting of the navigable rivers of the United States with electricity; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2375) to authorize the increase of the capital stock of the Commercial National Bank of Chicago; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LOGAN introduced a bill (S. 2376) for the relief of Joseph F. Wilson; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. LOGAN. This bill passed through Congress at the last session, but failed, for some reason, I do not know why, to receive the signature of the President. There is a report accompanying it. I ask that the bill lie on the table, so that I may call it up hereafter.

The bill was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MORRILL introduced a bill (S. 2377) granting a pension to Emily L. Alvord; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DOLPH introduced a bill (S. 2378) to prevent the obstruction of navigable waters and to protect public works against trespass or injury; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2379) to authorize the transfer of one of the vessels of the Greely relief expedition to the Treasury Department for a revenue-cutter and the retention of the other two for use in the Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. LAPHAM introduced a bill (S. 2380) to resubmit the claims of Ira D. Warren, receiver of the New York and Virginia Steamship Company, to the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. LAPHAM. In connection with the bill I ask to submit a synopsis of the facts and the opinion of the court when the case was before it. I move the reference of the papers with the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 2381) to amend "An act providing for two additional associate justices of the supreme court of the Territory of Dakota, one additional associate justice of the supreme court of the Territory of Washington, and for other purposes," approved July 4, 1884; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ILLEGAL FENCES ON THE PUBLIC DOMAIN.

Mr. INGALLS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be directed to report such legislation as may be necessary to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to summarily remove all fences illegally constructed on the public domain of the United States.

RECESS.

Mr. HAWLEY (at 12 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) I move that the Senate take a recess for half an hour.

The motion was agreed to; and at the expiration of the recess (at 1 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate reassembled.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. SHERMAN and Mr. GARLAND, the committee appointed in conjunction with a similar committee of the House of Representatives to wait upon the President of the United States, appeared below the bar, and

Mr. SHERMAN said: The joint committee on the part of the two Houses to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses of Congress has assembled and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make, have performed their duty, and the President requests us to say to the Senate that he will immediately communicate a message in writing.

PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL MESSAGE.

At 1 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m. Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of the secretaries of the President of the United States, appeared below the bar of the Senate and said:

Mr. President, I am directed by the President of the United States to deliver to the Senate a message in writing.

The message was received from the Secretary and handed to the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the annual message of the President of the United States, which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary of the Senate (Mr. ANSON G. MCCOOK) read the message, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

Since the close of your last session the American people, in the exercise of their highest right of suffrage, have chosen their Chief Magistrate for the four years ensuing.

When it is remembered that at no period in the country's history has the long political contest which customarily precedes the day of the national election been waged with greater fervor and intensity, it is a subject of general congratulation that after the controversy at the polls was over, and while the slight preponderance by which the issue had been determined was as yet unascertained, the public peace suffered no disturbance, but the people everywhere patiently and quietly awaited the result.

Nothing could more strikingly illustrate the temper of the American citizen, his love of order, and his loyalty to law—nothing could more signally demonstrate the strength and wisdom of our political institutions.

Eight years have passed since a controversy concerning the result of a national election sharply called the attention of the Congress to the necessity of providing more precise and definite regulations for counting the electoral vote.

It is of the greatest importance that this question be solved before conflicting claims to the Presidency shall again distract the country, and I am persuaded that, by the people at large, any of the measures of relief thus far proposed would be preferred to continued inaction.

Our relations with all foreign powers continue to be amicable.

With Belgium a convention has been signed whereby the scope of present treaties has been so enlarged as to secure to citizens of either country within the jurisdiction of the other equal rights and privileges in the acquisition and alienation of property. A trade-marks treaty has also been concluded.

The war between Chili and Peru is at an end. For the arbitration of the claims of American citizens who during its continuance suffered through the acts of the Chilian authorities a convention will soon be negotiated.

The state of hostilities between France and China continues to be an embarrassing feature of our Eastern relations. The Chinese Government has promptly adjusted and paid the claims of American citizens whose property was destroyed in the recent riots at Canton. I renew the recommendation of my last annual message, that the Canton indemnity fund be returned to China.

The true interpretation of the recent treaty with that country, permitting the restriction of Chinese immigration, is likely to be again the subject of your deliberations. It may be seriously questioned whether the statute passed at the last session does not violate the treaty rights of certain Chinese who left this country with return certificates valid under the old law and who now seem to be debarred from relanding for lack of the certificates required by the new.

The recent purchase by citizens of the United States of a large trading fleet heretofore under the Chinese flag has considerably enhanced our commercial importance in the East. In view of the large number of vessels built or purchased by American citizens in other countries and exclusively employed in legitimate traffic between foreign ports under the recognized protection of our flag, it might be well to provide a uniform rule for their registration and documentation, so that the bona fide property rights of our citizens therein shall be duly evidenced and properly guarded.

Pursuant to the advice of the Senate at the last session, I recognized the flag of the International Association of the Congo as that of a friendly government, avoiding in so doing any prejudgment of conflicting territorial claims in that region. Subsequently, in execution of the expressed wish of the Congress, I appointed a commercial agent for the Congo Basin.

The importance of the rich prospective trade of the Congo Valley has led to the general conviction that it should be open to all nations upon equal terms. At an international conference for the consideration of this subject called by the Emperor of Germany, and now in session at Berlin, delegates are in attendance on behalf of the United States. Of the results of the conference you will be duly advised.

The Government of Corea has generously aided the efforts of the United States minister to secure suitable premises for the use of the legation. As the conditions of diplomatic intercourse with Eastern nations demand that the legation premises be owned by the represented power, I advise that an appropriation be made for the acquisition of this property by the Government. The United States already possess valuable premises at Tangier as a gift from the Sultan of Morocco. As is stated hereafter, they have lately received a similar gift from the Siamese Government. The Government of Japan stands ready to present to us extensive grounds at Tokio whereon to erect a suitable building for the legation, court-house, and jail, and similar privileges can probably be secured in China and Persia. The owning of such premises would not only effect a large saving of the present rentals, but would permit of the due assertion of extraterritorial rights in those countries, and would the better serve to maintain the dignity of the United States.

The failure of Congress to make appropriation for our representation at the autonomous court of the Khédive has proved a serious embarrassment in our intercourse with Egypt; and in view of the necessary intimacy of diplomatic relationship due to the participation of this Government, as one of the treaty powers, in all matters of administration there affecting the rights of foreigners, I advise the restoration of the agency and consulate-general at Cairo on its former basis. I do not conceive it to be the wish of Congress that the United States should withdraw altogether from the honorable position they have hitherto held with respect to the Khédive, or that citizens of this Republic residing or sojourning in Egypt should hereafter be without the aid and protection of a competent representative.

With France the traditional cordial relationship continues. The colossal statue of Liberty enlightening the world, the generous gift of the people of France, is expected to reach New York in May next. I suggest that Congressional action be taken in recognition of the spirit which has prompted this gift and in aid of the timely completion of the pedestal upon which it is to be placed.

Our relations with Germany, a country which contributes to our own some of the best elements of citizenship, continue to be cordial. The United States have extradition treaties with several of the German states, but by reason of the confederation of those states under the imperial rule the application of such treaties is not as uniform and comprehensive as the interests of the two countries require. I propose, therefore, to open negotiations for a single convention of extradition, to embrace all the territory of the empire.

It affords me pleasure to say that our intercourse with Great Britain continues to be of a most friendly character.

The government of Hawaii has indicated its willingness to continue for seven years the provisions of the existing reciprocity treaty. Such continuance, in view of the relations of that country to the American system of States, should, in my judgment, be favored.

The revolution in Hayti against the established government has terminated. While it was in progress it became necessary to enforce our neutrality laws by instituting proceedings against individuals and vessels charged with their infringement. These prosecutions were in all cases successful.

Much anxiety has lately been displayed by various European governments, and especially by the government of Italy, for the abolition of our import duties upon works of art. It is well to consider whether the present discrimination in favor of the productions of American artists abroad is not likely to result, as they themselves seem very generally to believe it may, in the practical exclusion of our painters and sculptors from the rich fields for observation, study, and labor which they have hitherto enjoyed.

There is prospect that the long-pending revision of the foreign treaties of Japan may be concluded at a new conference to be held at Tokio. While this Government fully recognizes the equal and independent station of Japan in the community of nations, it would not oppose the general adoption of such terms of compromise as Japan may be disposed to offer in furtherance of a uniform policy of intercourse with Western nations.

During the past year the increasing good-will between our own Government and that of Mexico has been variously manifested. The treaty of commercial reciprocity concluded January 20, 1883, has been ratified, and awaits the necessary tariff legislation of Congress to become effective. This legislation will, I doubt not, be among the first measures to claim your attention.

A full treaty of commerce, navigation, and consular rights is much to be desired, and such a treaty I have reason to believe the Mexican Government stands ready to conclude.

Some embarrassment has been occasioned by the failure of Congress at its last session to provide means for the due execution of the treaty of July 29, 1882, for the resurvey of the Mexican boundary and the relocation of boundary monuments.

With the Republic of Nicaragua a treaty has been concluded, which authorizes the construction by the United States of a canal, railway, and telegraph line across the Nicaraguan territory.

By the terms of this treaty sixty miles of the river San Juan, as well as Lake Nicaragua, an inland sea forty miles in width, are to constitute a part of the projected enterprise.

This leaves for actual canal construction seventeen miles on the Pacific side and thirty-six miles on the Atlantic. To the United States, whose rich territory on the Pacific is for the ordinary purposes of commerce practically cut off from communication by water with the Atlantic ports, the political and commercial advantages of such a project can scarcely be overestimated.

It is believed that when the treaty is laid before you the justice and liberality of its provisions will command universal approval at home and abroad.

The death of our representative at Russia while at his post at St. Petersburg afforded to the Imperial Government a renewed opportunity to testify its sympathy in a manner befitting the intimate friendliness which has ever marked the intercourse of the two countries.

The course of this Government in raising its representation at Bangkok to the diplomatic rank has evoked from Siam evidences of warm friendship and augurs well for our enlarged intercourse. The Siamese Government has presented to the United States a commodious mansion and grounds for the occupancy of the legation, and I suggest that by joint resolution Congress attest its appreciation of this generous gift.

This Government has more than once been called upon of late to take action in fulfillment of its international obligations toward Spain. Agitation in the island of Cuba hostile to the Spanish Crown having been fomented by persons abusing the sacred rights of hospitality which our territory affords, the officers of this Government have been instructed to exercise vigilance to prevent infractions of our neutrality laws at Key West and at other points near the Cuban coast. I am happy to say that in the only instance where these precautionary measures were successfully eluded the offenders, when found in our territory, were subsequently tried and convicted.

The growing need of close relationship of intercourse and traffic between the Spanish Antilles and their natural market in the United States led to the adoption, in January last, of a commercial agreement looking to that end. This agreement has since been superseded by a more carefully framed and comprehensive convention, which I shall submit to the Senate for approval. It has been the aim of this negotiation to open such a favored reciprocal exchange of productions carried under the flag of either country as to make the intercourse between Cuba and Porto Rico and ourselves scarcely less intimate than the commercial movement between our domestic ports, and to insure a removal of the burdens on shipping in the Spanish Indies, of which in the past our ship-owners and ship-masters have so often had cause to complain.

The negotiation of this convention has for a time postponed the prosecution of certain claims of our citizens which were declared to be without the jurisdiction of the late Spanish-American Claims Commission, and which are therefore remitted to diplomatic channels for adjustment. The speedy settlement of these claims will now be urged by this Government.

Negotiations for a treaty of commercial reciprocity with the Dominican Republic have been successfully concluded, and the result will shortly be laid before the Senate.

Certain questions between the United States and the Ottoman Empire still remain unsolved. Complaints on behalf of our citizens are not satisfactorily adjusted. The Porte has sought to withhold from our commerce the right of favored treatment to which we are entitled by existing conventional stipulations, and the revision of the tariffs is unaccomplished.

The final disposition of pending questions with Venezuela has not as yet been reached, but I have good reason to expect an early settlement, which will provide the means of re-examining the Caracas awards in conformity with the expressed desire of Congress, and which will recognize the justice of certain claims preferred against Venezuela.

The Central and South American Commission appointed by authority of the act of July 7, 1884, will soon proceed to Mexico. It has been furnished with instructions, which will be laid before you. They contain a statement of the general policy of the Government for enlarging its commercial intercourse with American states. The commissioners have been actively preparing for their responsible task by holding conferences in the principal cities with merchants and others interested in Central and South American trade.

The International Meridian Conference, lately convened in Washington upon the invitation of the Government of the United States, was composed of representatives from twenty-five nations. The conference concluded its labors on the 1st of November, having with substantial unanimity agreed upon the meridian of Greenwich as the starting point whence longitude is to be computed through one hundred and eighty degrees eastward and westward, and upon the adoption, for all purposes for which it may be found convenient, of a universal day, which shall begin at midnight on the initial meridian and whose hours shall be counted from zero up to twenty-four.

The formal report of the transactions of this conference will be hereafter transmitted to the Congress.

This Government is in frequent receipt of invitations from foreign states to participate in international exhibitions, often of great interest and importance. Occupying as we do an advanced position in the world's production, and aiming to secure a profitable share for our industries in the general competitive markets, it is a matter of serious concern that the want of means for participation in these exhibitions should so often exclude our producers from advantages enjoyed by those of other countries. During the past year the attention of Congress was drawn to the formal invitations in this regard tendered by the governments of England, Holland, Belgium, Germany, and Austria. The Executive has in some instances appointed honorary commissioners. This is, however, a most unsatisfactory expedient, for without some provision to meet the necessary working expenses of a commission it can effect little or nothing in behalf of exhibitors. An international inventions exhibition is to be held in London next May. This will cover a field of special importance, in which our country holds a foremost rank, but the Executive is at present powerless to organize a proper representation of our vast national interests in this direction.

I have in several previous messages referred to this subject. It seems to me that a statute, giving to the Executive general discretionary authority to accept such invitations, and to appoint honorary commissioners, without salary, and placing at the disposal of the Secretary of State a small fund for defraying their reasonable expenses, would be of great public utility.

This Government has received official notice that the revised international regulations for preventing collisions at sea have been adopted by all the leading maritime powers except the United States and came into force on the 1st of September last. For the due protection of our shipping interests, the provisions of our statutes should at once be brought into conformity with these regulations.

The question of securing to authors, composers, and artists copyright privileges in this country in return for reciprocal rights abroad is one that may justly challenge your attention. It is true that conventions will be necessary for fully accomplishing this result, but until Congress shall by statute fix the extent to which foreign holders of copyright shall be here privileged, it has been deemed inadvisable to negotiate such conventions. For this reason the United States were not represented at the recent conference at Berne.

I recommend that the scope of the neutrality laws of the United States be so enlarged as to cover all patent acts of hostility committed in our territory and aimed against the peace of a friendly nation. Existing statutes prohibit the fitting out of armed expeditions and restrict the shipment of explosives, though the enactments in the latter respect were not framed with regard to international obligations, but simply for the protection of passenger travel. All these statutes were intended to meet special emergencies that had already arisen. Other emergencies have arisen since, and modern ingenuity supplies means for the organization of hostilities without open resort to armed vessels or to filibustering parties.

I see no reason why overt preparations in this country for the commission of criminal acts, such as are here under consideration, should not be alike punishable, whether such acts are intended to be committed in our own country or in a foreign country with which we are at peace.

The prompt and thorough treatment of this question is one which intimately concerns the national honor.

Our existing naturalization laws also need revision. Those sections relating to persons residing within the limits of the United States in 1795 and 1798 have now only a historical interest. Section 2172, recognizing the citizenship of the children of naturalized parents, is ambiguous in its terms and partly obsolete. There are special provisions of law favoring the naturalization of those who serve in the Army or in merchant vessels, while no similar privileges are granted those who serve in the Navy or the Marine Corps.

"An uniform rule of naturalization," such as the Constitution contemplates, should, among other things, clearly define the status of persons born within the United States subject to a foreign power (R. S. sec. 1992) and of minor children of fathers who have declared their intention to become citizens but have failed to perfect their naturalization. It might be wise to provide for a central bureau of registry, wherein should be filed authenticated transcripts of every record of naturalization in the several Federal and State courts, and to make provision also for the vacation or cancellation of such record in cases where fraud had been practiced upon the court by the applicant himself or where he had renounced or forfeited his acquired citizenship. A just and uniform law in this respect would strengthen the hands of the Government in protecting its citizens abroad and would pave the way for the conclusion of treaties of naturalization with foreign countries.

The legislation of the last session effected in the diplomatic and consular service certain changes and reductions which have been productive of embarrassment. The population and commercial activity of our country are steadily on the increase, and are giving rise to new, varying, and often delicate relationships with other countries. Our foreign establishment now embraces nearly double the area of operations that it occupied twenty years ago. The confinement of such a service within the limits of expenditure then established is not, it seems to me, in accordance with true economy. A community of 60,000,000 of people should be adequately represented in its intercourse with foreign nations.

A project for the reorganization of the consular service and for recasting the scheme of extraterritorial jurisdiction is now before you. If the limits of a short session will not allow of its full consideration, I trust that you will not fail to make suitable provision for the present needs of the service.

It has been customary to define in the appropriation acts the rank of each diplomatic office to which a salary is attached. I suggest that this course be abandoned, and that it be left to the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, to fix from time to time the diplomatic grade of the representatives of this Government abroad as may seem advisable, provision being definitely made, however, as now, for the amount of salary attached to the respective stations.

The condition of our finances and the operations of the various branches of the public service which are connected with the Treasury Department are very fully discussed in the report of the Secretary.

It appears that the ordinary revenues for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1884, were—

From customs	$195,067,489 76
From internal revenue	121,586,072 51
From all other sources	31,866,307 65
Total ordinary revenues	348,519,869 92

The public expenditures during the same period were—

For civil expenses	$22,312,907 71
For foreign intercourse	1,260,766 37
For Indians	6,475,999 29
For pensions	55,429,228 06
For the military establishment, including river and harbor improvements and arsenals	39,429,603 36
For the naval establishment, including vessels, machinery, and improvements at navy-yards	17,292,601 44
For miscellaneous expenditures, including public buildings, light-houses, and collecting the revenue	43,939,710 00
For expenditures on account of the District of Columbia	3,407,049 62
For interest on the public debt	54,578,378 48
For the sinking fund	46,790,229 50
Total ordinary expenditures	290,916,473 83
Leaving a surplus of	57,603,396 09

As compared with the preceding fiscal year there was a net decrease of over $21,000,000 in the amount of expenditures. The aggregate receipts were less than those of the year previous by about $54,000,000. The falling off in revenue from customs made up nearly $29,000,000 of this deficiency, and about $23,000,000 of the remainder was due to the diminished receipts from internal taxation.

The Secretary estimates the total receipts for the fiscal year which will end June 30, 1885, at $330,000,000, and the total expenditures at $290,620,201.16, in which sum are included the interest on the debt and the amount payable to the sinking fund. This would leave a surplus for the entire year of about $39,000,000.

The value of exports from the United States to foreign countries during the year ending June 30, 1884, was as follows:

Domestic merchandise	$724,964,852
Foreign merchandise	15,548,757
Total merchandise	740,513,609
Specie	67,133,383
Total exports of merchandise and specie	807,646,992

The cotton and cotton manufactures included in this statement were valued at $208,900,415; the breadstuffs at $162,544,715; the provisions at $114,416,547, and the mineral oils at $47,103,248.

During the same period the imports were as follows:

Merchandise	$667,697,693
Gold and silver	37,426,262
Total	705,123,955

More than 63 per cent. of the entire value of imported merchandise consisted of the following articles:

Sugar and molasses	$103,884,274
Wool and woolen manufactures	53,542,292
Silk and its manufactures	49,949,128
Coffee	49,686,705
Iron and steel and manufactures thereof	41,464,599
Chemicals	38,464,965
Flax, hemp, jute, and like substances, and manufactures thereof	33,463,398
Cotton and manufactures of cotton	30,454,476
Hides and skins other than fur-skins	22,350,906

I concur with the Secretary of the Treasury in recommending the immediate suspension of the coinage of silver dollars and of the issuance of silver certificates. This is a matter to which in former communications I have more than once invoked the attention of the National Legislature.

It appears that annually for the past six years there have been coined, in compliance with the requirements of the act of February 28, 1878, more than twenty-seven million silver dollars. The number now outstanding is reported by the Secretary to be nearly one hundred and eighty-five million, whereof but little more than forty million, or less than 22 per cent., are in actual circulation. The mere existence of this fact seems to me to furnish of itself a cogent argument for the repeal of the statute which has made such fact possible.

But there are other and graver considerations that tend in the same direction.

The Secretary avows his conviction that unless this coinage and the issuance of silver certificates be suspended, silver is likely at no distant day to become our sole metallic standard. The commercial disturbance and the impairment of national credit that would be thus occasioned can scarcely be overestimated.

I hope that the Secretary's suggestions respecting the withdrawal from circulation of the one-dollar and two-dollar notes will receive your approval. It is likely that a considerable portion of the silver now encumbering the vaults of the Treasury might thus find its way into the currency.

While trade-dollars have ceased, for the present at least, to be an element of active disturbance in our currency system, some provision should be made for their surrender to the Government. In view of the circumstances under which they were coined and of the fact that they have never had a legal-tender quality, there should be offered for them only a slight advance over their bullion value.

The Secretary, in the course of his report, considers the propriety of beautifying the designs of our subsidiary silver coins and of so increasing their weight that they may bear their due ratio of value to the standard dollar. His conclusions in this regard are cordially approved.

In my annual message of 1882 I recommended the abolition of all excise taxes except those relating to distilled spirits. This recommendation is now renewed. In case these taxes shall be abolished the revenues that will still remain to the Government will, in my opinion, not only suffice to meet its reasonable expenditures, but will afford a surplus large enough to permit such tariff reduction as may seem to be advisable when the results of recent revenue laws and commercial treaties shall have shown in what quarters those reductions can be most judiciously effected.

One of the gravest of the problems which appeal to the wisdom of Congress for solution is the ascertainment of the most effective means for increasing our foreign trade and thus relieving the depression under which our industries are now languishing. The Secretary of the Treasury advises that the duty of investigating this subject be intrusted in the first instance to a competent commission. While fully recognizing the considerations that may be urged against this course, I am nevertheless of the opinion that, upon the whole, no other would be likely to effect speedier or better results.

That portion of the Secretary's report which concerns the condition of our shipping interests can not fail to command your attention. He emphatically recommends that, as an incentive to the investment of American capital in American steamships, the Government shall by liberal payments for mail transportation, or otherwise, lend its active assistance to individual enterprise, and declares his belief that unless that course be pursued our foreign carrying trade must remain, as it is to-day, almost exclusively in the hands of foreigners.

One phase of this subject is now especially prominent, in view of the repeal by the act of June 26, 1884, of all statutory provisions arbitrarily compelling American vessels to carry the mails to and from the United States. As it is necessary to make provision to compensate the owners of such vessels for performing that service after April, 1885, it is hoped that the whole subject will receive early consideration, that will lead to the enactment of such measures for the revival of our merchant marine as the wisdom of Congress may devise.

The 3 per cent. bonds of the Government to the amount of more than $100,000,000 have since my last annual message been redeemed by the Treasury. The bonds of that issue still outstanding amount to little over $200,000,000, about one-fourth of which will be retired through the operations of the sinking fund during the coming year. As these bonds still constitute the chief basis for the circulation of the national banks, the question how to avert the contraction of the currency caused by their retirement is one of constantly increasing importance.

It seems to be generally conceded that the law governing this matter exacts from the banks excessive security, and that upon their present bond deposits a larger circulation than is now allowed may be granted with safety. I hope that the bill which passed the Senate at the last session permitting the issue of notes equal to the face value of the deposited bonds will commend itself to the approval of the House of Representatives.

In the expenses of the War Department the Secretary reports a decrease of more than $9,000,000. Of this reduction $5,600,000 was effected in the expenditures for rivers and harbors and $2,700,000 in expenditures for the Quartermaster's Department.

Outside of that department the annual expenses of all the Army bureaus proper (except possibly the Ordnance Bureau) are substantially fixed charges, which can not be materially diminished without a change in the numerical strength of the Army. The expenditures in the Quartermaster's Department can readily be subjected to administrative discretion, and it is reported by the Secretary of War that as a result of exercising such discretion, in reducing the number of draught and pack animals in the Army, the annual cost of supplying and caring for such animals is now $1,108,085.90 less than it was in 1881.

The reports of military commanders show that the last year has been notable for its entire freedom from Indian outbreaks.

In defiance of the President's proclamation of July 1, 1884, certain intruders sought to make settlements in the Indian Territory. They were promptly removed by a detachment of troops.

During the past session of Congress a bill to provide a suitable fireproof building for the Army Medical Museum and the Library of the Surgeon-General's Office received the approval of the Senate. A similar bill, reported favorably to the House of Representatives by one of its committees, is still pending before that body. It is hoped that during the coming session the measure may become a law, and that thereafter immediate steps may be taken to secure a place of safe deposit for these valuable collections, now in a state of insecurity.

The funds with which the works for the improvement of rivers and harbors were prosecuted during the past year were derived from the appropriations of the act of August 2, 1882, together with such few balances as were on hand from previous appropriations. The balance in the Treasury subject to requisition July 1, 1883, was $10,021,649.55. The amount appropriated during the fiscal year 1884 was $1,319,634.62, and the amount drawn from the Treasury during the fiscal year was $8,228,703.54, leaving a balance of $3,112,580.63 in the Treasury subject to requisition July 1, 1884.

The Secretary of War submits the report of the Chief of Engineers as to the practicability of protecting our important cities on the seaboard by fortifications and other defenses able to repel modern methods of attack. The time has now come when such defenses can be prepared with confidence that they will not prove abortive; and, when the possible result of delay in making such preparation is seriously considered, delay seems inexcusable. For the most important cities—those whose destruction or capture would be a national humiliation—adequate defenses, inclusive of guns, may be made by the gradual expenditure of $60,000,000; a sum much less than a victorious enemy could levy as a contribution. An appropriation of about one-tenth of that amount is asked to begin the work, and I concur with the Secretary of War in urging that it be granted.

The War Department is proceeding with the conversion of 10-inch smooth-bore guns into 8-inch rifles, by lining the former with tubes of forged steel or of coiled wrought iron. Fifty guns will be thus converted within the year. This, however, does not obviate the necessity of providing means for the construction of guns of the highest power, both for the purposes of coast defense and for the armament of war vessels.

The report of the gun-foundery board, appointed April 2, 1883, in pursuance of the act of March 3, 1883, was transmitted to Congress in a special message of February 18, 1884. In my message of March 26, 1884, I called attention to the recommendation of the board that the Government should encourage the production at private steel works of the required material for heavy cannon, and that two Government factories, one for the Army and one for the Navy, should be established for the fabrication of guns from such material. No action having been taken, the board was subsequently reconvened to determine more fully the plans and estimates necessary for carrying out its recommendation. It has received information which indicates that there are responsible steel manufacturers in this country who, although not provided at present with the necessary plant, are willing to construct the same and to make bids for contracts with the Government for the supply of the requisite material for the heaviest guns adapted to modern warfare if a guaranteed order of sufficient magnitude, accompanied by a positive appropriation extending over a series of years, shall be made by Congress. All doubts as to the feasibility of the plan being thus removed, I renew my recommendation that such action be taken by Congress as will enable the Government to construct its own ordnance upon its own territory, and so to provide the armaments demanded by considerations of national safety and honor.

The report of the Secretary of the Navy exhibits the progress which has been made on the new steel cruisers authorized by the acts of August 5, 1882, and March 3, 1883. Of the four vessels under contract, one, the Chicago, of 4,500 tons, is more than half finished; the Atlanta, of 3,000 tons, has been successfully launched, and her machinery is now fitting; the Boston, also of 3,000 tons, is ready for launching, and the Dolphin, a dispatch steamer of 1,500 tons, is ready for delivery.

Certain adverse criticisms upon the designs of these cruisers are discussed by the Secretary, who insists that the correctness of the conclusions reached by the advisory board and by the Department has been demonstrated by recent developments in ship-building abroad.

The machinery of the double-turreted monitors Puritan, Terror, and Amphitrite, contracted for under the act of March 3, 1883, is in process of construction. No work has been done during the past year on their armor for lack of the necessary appropriations. A fourth monitor, the Monadnock, still remains unfinished at the navy-yard in California. It is recommended that early steps be taken to complete these vessels and to provide also an armament for the monitor Miantonomoh.

The recommendations of the naval advisory board, approved by the Department, comprise the construction of one steel cruiser of 4,500 tons, one cruiser of 3,000 tons, two heavily armed gunboats, one light cruising gunboat, one dispatch vessel armed with Hotchkiss cannon, one armored ram, and three torpedo-boats. The general designs, all of which are calculated to meet the existing wants of the service, are now well advanced, and the construction of the vessels can be undertaken as soon as you shall grant the necessary authority.

The act of Congress approved August 7, 1882, authorized the removal to the United States of the bodies of Lieut. Commander George W. De Long and his companions of the Jeannette expedition. This removal has been successfully accomplished by Lieutenants Harber and Schuetze. The remains were taken from their grave in the Lena Delta in March, 1883, and were retained at Yakutsk until the following winter, the season being too far advanced to admit of their immediate transportation. They arrived at New York February 20, 1884, where they were received with suitable honors

In pursuance of the joint resolution of Congress approved February 13, 1884, a naval expedition was fitted out for the relief of Lieut. A. W. Greely, United States Army, and of the party who had been engaged under his command in scientific observations at Lady Franklin Bay. The fleet consisted of the steam-sealer Thetis, purchased in England, the Bear, purchased at St. John's, Newfoundland, and the Alert, which was generously provided by the British Government. Preparations for the expedition were promptly made by the Secretary of the Navy, with the active co-operation of the Secretary of War. Commander George W. Coffin was placed in command of the Alert, and Lieut. William H. Emory in command of the Bear. The Thetis was intrusted to Commander Winfield S. Schley, to whom also was assigned the superintendence of the entire expedition.

Immediately upon its arrival at Upernavik, the fleet began the dangerous navigation of Melville Bay, and in spite of every obstacle reached Littleton Island on June 22, a fortnight earlier than any vessel had before attained that point. On the same day it crossed over to Cape Sabine, where Lieutenant Greely and the other survivors of his party were discovered. After taking on board the living and the bodies of the dead the relief ships sailed for St. John's, where they arrived on July 17. They were appropriately received at Portsmouth, N. H., on August 1, and at New York on August 8. One of the bodies was landed at the former place. The others were put on shore at Governor's Island, and, with the exception of one which was interred in the national cemetery, were forwarded thence to the destinations indicated by friends. The organization and conduct of this relief expedition reflect great credit upon all who contributed to its success.

In this the last of the stated messages that I shall have the honor to transmit to the Congress of the United States I can not too strongly urge upon its attention the duty of restoring our Navy as rapidly as possible to the high state of efficiency which formerly characterized it. As the long peace that has lulled us into a sense of fancied security may at any time be disturbed, it is plain that the policy of strengthening this arm of the service is dictated by considerations of wise economy, of just regard for our future tranquillity, and of true appreciation of the dignity and honor of the Republic.

The report of the Postmaster-General acquaints you with the present condition and needs of the postal service.

It discloses the gratifying fact that the loss of revenue from the reduction in the rate of letter-postage recommended in my message of December 4, 1882, and effected by the act of March 3, 1883, has been much less than was generally anticipated. My recommendation of this reduction was based upon the belief that the actual falling off in receipts from letter-postages for the year immediately succeeding the change of rate would be $3,000,000. It has proved to be only $2,275,000.

This is a trustworthy indication that the revenue will soon be restored to its former volume by the natural increase of sealed correspondence.

I confidently repeat, therefore, the recommendation of my last annual message, that the single-rate postage upon drop letters be reduced to 1 cent wherever the payment of 2 cents is now required by law. The double rate is only exacted at offices where the carrier system is in operation, and it appears that at those offices the increase in the tax upon local letters defrays the cost not only of its own collection and delivery, but of the collection and delivery of all other mail matter. This is an inequality that ought no longer to exist.

I approve the recommendation of the Postmaster-General that the unit of weight in the rating of first-class matter should be one ounce instead of one-half ounce, as it now is. In view of the statistics furnished by the Department it may well be doubted whether the change would result in any loss of revenue; that it would greatly promote the convenience of the public is beyond dispute.

The free-delivery system has been lately applied to five cities, and the total number of offices in which it is now in operation is one hundred and fifty-nine. Experience shows that its adoption, under proper conditions, is equally an accommodation to the public and an advantage to the postal service. It is more than self-sustaining, and for the reasons urged by the Postmaster-General may properly be extended.

In the opinion of that officer it is important to provide means whereby exceptional dispatch in dealing with letters in free-delivery offices may be secured by payment of extraordinary postage. This scheme might be made effective by employment of a special stamp, whose cost should be commensurate with the expense of the extra service.

In some of the large cities private express companies have undertaken to outstrip the Government mail-carriers, by affording for the prompt transmission of letters better facilities than have hitherto been at the command of the Post-Office.

It has always been the policy of the Government to discourage such enterprises, and in no better mode can that policy be maintained than in supplying the public with the most efficient mail service that, with due regard to its own best interests, can be furnished for its accommodation.

The Attorney-General renews the recommendation contained in his report of last year touching the fees of witnesses and jurors.

He favors radical changes in the fee-bill, the adoption of a system by which attorneys and marshals of the United States shall be compensated solely by salaries, and the erection by the Government of a penitentiary for the confinement of offenders against its laws.

Of the varied governmental concerns in charge of the Interior Department the report of its Secretary presents an interesting summary. Among the topics deserving particular attention I refer you to his observations respecting our Indian affairs, the pre-emption and timber-culture acts, the failure of railroad companies to take title to lands granted by the Government, and the operations of the Pension Office, the Patent Office, the Census Bureau, and the Bureau of Education.

Allusion has been made already to the circumstance that, both as between the different Indian tribes and as between the Indians and the whites, the past year has been one of unbroken peace.

In this circumstance the President is glad to find justification for the policy of the Government in its dealing with the Indian question, and confirmation of the views which were fully expressed in his first communication to the Forty-seventh Congress.

The Secretary urges anew the enactment of a statute for the punishment of crimes committed on the Indian reservations, and recommends the passage of the bill now pending in the House of Representatives for the purchase of a tract of 18,000 square miles from the Sioux reservation. Both these measures are worthy of approval.

I concur with him also in advising the repeal of the pre-emption law, the enactment of statutes resolving the present legal complications touching lapsed grants to railroad companies, and the funding of the debt of the several Pacific railroads under such guarantee as shall effectually secure its ultimate payment.

The report of the Utah commission will be read with interest.

It discloses the results of recent legislation looking to the prevention and punishment of polygamy in that Territory. I still believe that if that abominable practice can be suppressed by law it can only be by the most radical legislation consistent with the restraints of the Constitution.

I again recommend, therefore, that Congress assume absolute political control of the Territory of Utah, and provide for the appointment of commissioners, with such governmental powers as in its judgment may justly and wisely be put into their hands.

In the course of this communication reference has more than once been made to the policy of this Government as regards the extension of our foreign trade. It seems proper to declare the general principles that should, in my opinion, underlie our national efforts in this direction.

The main conditions of the problem may be thus stated:

We are a people apt in mechanical pursuits and fertile in invention; we cover a vast extent of territory rich in agricultural products and in nearly all the raw materials necessary for successful manufacture; we have a system of productive establishments more than sufficient to supply our own demands; the wages of labor are nowhere else so great; the scale of living of our artisan classes is such as tends to secure their personal comfort and the development of those higher moral and intellectual qualities that go to the making of good citizens. Our system of tax and tariff legislation is yielding a revenue which is in excess of the present needs of the Government.

These are the elements from which it is sought to devise a scheme by which, without unfavorably changing the condition of the workingman, our merchant marine shall be raised from its enfeebled condition and new markets provided for the sale beyond our borders of the manifold fruits of our industrial enterprises.

The problem is complex, and can be solved by no single measure of innovation or reform.

The countries of the American continent and the adjacent islands are for the United States the natural marts of supply and demand. It is from them that we should obtain what we do not produce or do not produce in sufficiency, and it is to them that the surplus productions of our fields, our mills, and our workshops should flow, under conditions that will equalize or favor them in comparison with foreign competition.

Four paths of policy seem to point to this end.

First, a series of reciprocal commercial treaties with the countries of America, which shall foster between us and them an unhampered movement of trade. The conditions of these treaties should be the free admission of such merchandise as this country does not produce in return for the admission free or under a favored scheme of duties of our own products—the benefits of such exchange to apply only to goods carried under the flag of the parties to the contract; the removal, on both sides, from the vessels so privileged of all tonnage dues and national imposts, so that those vessels may ply unhindered between our ports and those of the other contracting parties, though without infringing on the reserved home coasting trade; the removal or reduction of burdens on the exported products of those countries coming within the benefits of the treaties; and the avoidance of the technical restrictions and penalties by which our intercourse with those countries is at present hampered.

Secondly, the establishment of the consular service of the United States on a salaried footing, thus permitting the relinquishment of consular fees not only as respects vessels under the national flag, but also as respects vessels of the treaty nations carrying goods entitled to the benefits of the treaties.

Thirdly, the enactment of measures to favor the construction and maintenance of a steam-carrying marine under the flag of the United States.

Fourthly, the establishment of a uniform currency basis for the countries of America, so that the coined products of our mines may circulate on equal terms throughout the whole system of commonwealths. This would require a monetary union of America, whereby the output of the bullion-producing countries and the circulation of those which yield neither gold nor silver could be adjusted in conformity with the population, wealth, and commercial needs of each. As many of the countries furnish no bullion to the common stock, the surplus production of our mines and mints might thus be utilized and a step taken toward the general remonetization of silver.

To the accomplishment of these ends, so far as they can be attained by separate treaties, the negotiations already concluded and now in progress have been directed, and the favor which this enlarged policy has thus far received warrants the belief that its operations will ere long embrace all, or nearly all, the countries of this hemisphere.

It is by no means desirable, however, that the policy under consideration should be applied to these countries alone. The healthful enlargement of our trade with Europe, Asia, and Africa should be sought by reducing tariff burdens on such of their wares as neither we nor the other American States are fitted to produce, and thus enabling ourselves to obtain in return a better market for our supplies of food, of raw materials, and of the manufactures in which we excel.

It seems to me that many of the embarrassing elements in the great national conflict between protection and free trade may thus be turned to good account—that the revenue may be reduced so as no longer to overtax the people; that protective duties may be retained without becoming burdensome; that our shipping interests may be judiciously encouraged, the currency fixed on firm bases, and above all such a unity of interests established among the states of the American system as will be of great and ever-increasing advantage to them all.

All treaties in the line of this policy which have been negotiated or are in process of negotiation contain a provision deemed to be requisite under the clause of the Constitution limiting to the House of Representatives the authority to originate bills for raising revenue.

On the 29th of February last I transmitted to the Congress the first annual report of the Civil Service Commission, together with communications from the heads of the several Executive Departments of the Government respecting the practical workings of the law under which the commission had been acting. The good results therein foreshadowed have been more than realized.

The system has fully answered the expectations of its friends in securing competent and faithful public servants and in protecting the appointing officers of the Government from the pressure of personal importunity and from the labor of examining the claims and pretensions of rival candidates for public employment.

The law has had the unqualified support of the President and of the heads of the several Departments, and the members of the commission have performed their duties with zeal and fidelity. Their report will shortly be submitted, and will be accompanied by such recommendations for enlarging the scope of the existing statute as shall commend themselves to the Executive and the commissioners charged with its administration.

In view of the general and persistent demand throughout the commercial community for a national bankrupt law, I hope that the differences of sentiment which have hitherto prevented its enactment may not outlast the present session.

The pestilence which for the past two years has been raging in the countries of the East recently made its appearance in European ports with which we are in constant communication.

The then Secretary of the Treasury, in pursuance of a proclamation of the President, issued certain regulations restricting, and for a time prohibiting, the importation of rags and the admission of baggage of immigrants and of travelers arriving from infected quarters. Lest this course may have been without strict warrant of law I approve the recommendation of the present Secretary that the Congress take action in the premises, and I also recommend the immediate adoption of such measures as will be likely to ward off the dreaded epidemic and to mitigate its severity in case it shall unhappily extend to our shores.

The annual report of the commissioners of the District of Columbia reviews the operations of the several departments of its municipal government. I ask your careful consideration of its suggestions in respect to legislation—especially commending such as relate to a revision of the civil and criminal code, the performance of labor by persons sentenced to imprisonment in the jail, the construction and occupation of wharves along the river front, and the erection of a suitable building for District offices.

I recommend that, in recognition of the eminent services of Ulysses S. Grant, late General of the armies of the United States and twice President of this nation, the Congress confer upon him a suitable pension.

Certain of the measures that seem to me necessary and expedient I have now, in obedience to the Constitution, recommended for your adoption.

As respects others of no less importance, I shall content myself with renewing the recommendations already made to the Congress, without restating the grounds upon which such recommendations were based.

The preservation of forests on the public domain, the granting of Government aid for popular education, the amendment of the Federal Constitution so as to make effective the disapproval by the President of particular items in appropriation bills, the enactment of statutes in regard to the filling of vacancies in the Presidential office, and the determining of vexed questions respecting Presidential inability are measures which may justly receive your serious consideration.

As the time draws nigh when I am to retire from the public service, I can not refrain from expressing to the members of the National Legislature with whom I have been brought into personal and official intercourse my sincere appreciation of their unfailing courtesy and of their harmonious co-operation with the Executive in so many measures calculated to promote the best interests of the nation.

And to my fellow-citizens generally I acknowledge a deep sense of obligation for the support which they have accorded me in my administration of the executive department of this Government.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

WASHINGTON, December 1, 1884.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the message will be printed and laid upon the table.

DEATH OF SENATOR ANTHONY.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, the credentials which you have this morning laid before the Senate, and the absence of the familiar and conspicuous figure of our late senior associate, publish the sad event whose shadows pervade this Chamber, filling every heart with sorrow, but they do not relieve me from the painful duty of making a formal announcement of the death of my late colleague, HENRY B. ANTHONY, who died at his home in the city of Providence on Tuesday, the 2d of September last.

On some proper occasion, later in the session, my colleague and myself will ask the Senate to give expression in fitting terms to their appreciation of the distinguished public services and private virtues of our deceased friend.

I move, as a mark of respect to his memory, that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 1, 1884.

This being the day designated by the Constitution, the members of the House of Representatives of the Forty-eighth Congress assembled in their Hall for their second session.

At 12 o'clock noon the Speaker, Hon. JOHN G. CARLISLE, a Representative of the State of Kentucky, called the House to order.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The SPEAKER. It appears from the call of the roll that two hundred and twenty-five members are present, which is more than a quorum.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that a quorum of that body was assembled and ready to proceed to business; also, that Mr. SHERMAN and Mr. GARLAND had been appointed a committee to join such committee as should be appointed by the House of Representatives to wait on the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of each House was assembled, and that Congress was ready to receive any communication he may desire to make.

SWEARING IN OF A MEMBER.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I present the credentials of Hon. Benjamin F. Shively, from the State of Indiana, elected to fill the unexpired term of Mr. William H. Calkins, resigned.

The SPEAKER. The credentials will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

I, Albert G. Porter, governor of the State of Indiana, do hereby certify that at the general election held in this State on the 4th day of November, 1884, Benjamin F. Shively was elected a Representative to the Forty-eighth Congress for the thirteenth Congressional district, composed of the counties of La Porte, Saint Joseph, Elkhart, Starke, Marshall, and Kosciusko, to fill the unexpired term of William H. Calkins, who resigned his office on the 20th day of October, 1884.

In witness whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and caused to be affixed the seal of the State, at Indianapolis, this 25th day of November, 1884.

ALBERT G. PORTER.

By the governor:

W. R. MYERS,
Secretary of State.

Mr. SHIVELY then appeared at the bar of the House and was qualified by taking the oath prescribed by law.

NOTIFICATION TO THE SENATE.

Mr. MORRISON submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House inform the Senate that a quorum of the House of Representatives has appeared, and that the House is ready to proceed to business.

COMMITTEE TO WAIT UPON THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. RANDALL submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of three members be appointed on the part of the House, to join such committee as may be appointed by the Senate, to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses has assembled, and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as such joint committee on the part of the House Mr. RANDALL, Mr. COX of New York, and Mr. BROWNE of Indiana.

DAILY HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. MATSON offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That until the further order of the House the daily hour of meeting of the House be 12 o'clock noon.

And then, on motion of Mr. HOLMAN, the House (at 12 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) took a recess for fifteen minutes.

AFTER THE RECESS.

The recess having expired, the House (at 12 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) resumed its session.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE TO WAIT UPON THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, the joint committee appointed to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that the two Houses of Congress were ready to receive any communication he might be pleased to make have discharged that duty, and the President desired us to say that he will communicate to the two Houses in writing immediately.

PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL MESSAGE.

A message in writing was received from the President of the United States by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the annual message of the President of the United States.

The message was then read. (See Senate proceedings.)

Mr. MORRISON submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the message of the President be committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and, with the accompanying documents, printed.

Mr. MORRISON also submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed —— thousand copies of the President's last annual message for the use of the House.

TEMPORARY APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE NAVY.

Mr. HUTCHINS, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. 7510) making temporary provision for the naval service; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I desire to give notice to the House that I will bring this bill up for consideration to-morrow morning immediately after the reading of the Journal.

DEATH OF HON. WILLIAM A. DUNCAN.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. Mr. Speaker, on me has devolved the sad duty of announcing to the House of Representatives the death of our late lamented colleague WILLIAM A. DUNCAN, recently representing the nineteenth district of the State of Pennsylvania, composed of the counties of Adams, York, and Cumberland, which occurred at Gettysburg on the 14th of November last.

It is not my purpose now to make any remarks commemorative of the qualities and character of the deceased. Upon some future occasion that will be my sad duty. But on behalf of our delegation and of the constituents whom he represented I offer the following resolutions, and ask their adoption by the House, with this qualification, that action be not taken upon them until a Representative from the State of South Carolina shall have presented resolutions of a similar character in relation to the death of our late colleague Mr. EVINS, from that State.

The SPEAKER. The resolutions submitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with sincere regret the announcement of the death of WILLIAM A. DUNCAN, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate the foregoing resolution to the Senate.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the House do now adjourn.

DEATH ON HON. JOHN H. EVINS.

Mr. AIKEN. Under instructions of the delegation from the State of South Carolina, which State I have the honor in part to represent on this floor, it is my sad duty to announce to the House the death of our late colleague Mr. JOHN H. EVINS, and to ask the adoption of the resolutions which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The resolutions will be read.

The Clerk read as follows.

Whereas death has taken from our midst the Hon. JOHN H. EVINS, of South Carolina, a member of this House:

Resolved, That we have heard with much sorrow of this bereavement to his family and loss to his State and country.

Resolved, That the clerk communicate the foregoing to the Senate.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased this House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection the question will be taken upon the adoption of both series of resolutions at the same time.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to; and in accordance therewith the House (at 2 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BARBOUR: The petition of James G. Field, administrator of Edmund Bickers, Gordonsville, Va., to correct error in the decision of the Southern Claims Commission, and to refer the same to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. S. S. COX: Five petitions of business men and seamen of New York city, for a modification of the shipping law to admit seamen giving an allotment note to creditors for any past debt owing by them occurring before engagement—to the Select Committee on American Ship-building and Ship-owning Interests.

By Mr. KETCHAM: Petition of L. G. Dodge and W. C. Fonda, vice-president and cashier of the Merchants' National Bank, Poughkeepsie, N. Y., asking that authority be given the Secretary of the Treasury to issue a duplicate bond in place of one destroyed—to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. ROSECRANS: Petitions of Gerard Russell, captain Third United States Cavalry; of B. H. Grierson, colonel Tenth Cavalry, and others; of L. H. Gangee, captain Seventeenth Infantry; of colonel Sixth Infantry; of Henry E. Noyes, major Fourth Cavalry, and others; of J. H. Bradford, captain Nineteenth Infantry; of Edward P. Grumley and others; of C. M. Burley and others; of H. S. Foster and others; of B. G. Heiner, captain First United States Infantry; and of Leslie Smith, major Second Infantry, in favor of a bill to facilitate promotions throughout the United States Army—severally to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SINGLETON: Petitions of William J. McGowan, and also of William B. Sims, respectively of Marshall and La Fayette Counties, Mississippi, to correct errors in the decisions of the late Southern Claims Commission, and to have each case referred to the Court of Claims—severally to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. STOCKSLAGER: Papers relating to the pension claim of Jacob Ging—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a paper to accompany bill for the relief of Lieut. J.W. Manington—to the Committee on Claims.

Also, a statement to accompany bill for the relief of L. C. Orrill—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. VANCE: Papers relating to the payment of salaries of postmasters under act of March 3, 1883—to the Committee on Appropriations.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 2, 1884.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

M. C. BUTLER, a Senator from the State of South Carolina; ALFRED H. COLQUITT, a Senator from the State of Georgia; JAMES Z. GEORGE, a Senator from the State of Mississippi; JOHN E. KENNA, a Senator from the State of West Virginia; PRESTON B. PLUMB, a Senator from the State of Kansas; JAMES H. SLATER, a Senator from the State of Oregon; and JOHN S. WILLIAMS, a Senator from the State of Kentucky, appeared in their seats to-day.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

SWEARING IN OF A SENATOR.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, my colleague Mr. SHEFFIELD, whose credentials were presented to the Senate yesterday, is now present in the Chamber, and I ask that the oath of office may be administered to him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator appointed from Rhode Island will attend at the desk the oath will be administered to him, if there be no objection.

Mr. SHEFFIELD advanced to the desk of the President pro tempore, escorted by Mr. ALDRICH, and the oath prescribed by law having been administered to him, he took his seat in the Senate.

REPORT OF SECRETARY OF SENATE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the report of the Secretary of the Senate, communicating, in obedience to law, a statement of the receipts and expenditures of the Senate from December 19, 1883, to June 30, 1884, and a full and complete account of all property in his possession belonging to the United States December 1, 1884, and of the amounts received from the sale of waste paper; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

REPORTS OF SERGEANT-AT-ARMS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the annual report of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, communicating, in obedience to law, a full and complete statement of all the property in his possession belonging to the United States December 1, 1884; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a report of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate on the subject of the sale of waste paper, old carpets, and condemned furniture; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

FINANCE REPORT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the state of the finances for the year 1884; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF COMPTROLLER OF THE CURRENCY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Comptroller of the Currency, pursuant to section 333 of the Revised Statutes, transmitting his annual report; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF COURT OF CLAIMS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting, in pursuance of section 1057 of the Revised Statutes, a statement of all judgments rendered by the Court of Claims during the year ending November 30, 1884; which was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate for reference sundry bills from the House of Representatives which were received at the very end of the last session, and which were not then presented to the Senate:

The bill (H. R. 191) for the relief of L. S. Ensel was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

The bill (H. R. 411) granting a pension to Elizabeth Connor was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The bill (H. R. 652) for the relief of Brannin, Summers & Co. was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Claims, if there be no objection.

Mr. BECK. The bill ought to be referred to the Committee on Finance. That committee reported a bill similar to it, which the Senate passed and sent to the other House. It is a matter that has been considered by that committee a number of times, and it properly belongs there.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky, if there be no objection the bill will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill (H. R. 847) for the relief of Francis B. Von Hoesen was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill (H. R. 5509) for the benefit of soldiers and sailors who have lost an arm at the shoulder-joint was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, if there be no objection.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest that the reference should be to the Committee on Pensions. The bill relates to the subject of pensions for a certain class of disabled soldiers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred, then, if there be no objection, to the Committee on Pensions.

The bill (H. R. 6712) to remove the political disabilities of John Randolph Hamilton, of North Carolina, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a joint resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Vermont in the nature of a memorial, which will be read.

The joint resolution was read, and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Joint resolution.

Resolved, That the thanks of the Vermont senate and house of representatives are due and are hereby tendered Hon. JOHN W. STEWART for the earnest and able manner in which he has urged upon the attention of Congress the importance of national control of "interstate commerce;" and

Be it further resolved, That the Vermont senate and house of representatives most earnestly request our Senators and Representatives in Congress to use all honorable means to secure the passage of some suitable measure concerning the subject-matter of "interstate commerce" by national legislation.

JAMES K. BATCHELDER,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
E. J. ORMSBEE,
President of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair presents the petition of Richard Woodham, who alleges himself to be illegally confined in the insane asylum at Concord, N. H., claiming that his constitutional rights under the Constitution of the United States are thereby violated. The petition will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a memorial of William Gardner, of Washington, Ill., regarding the rights of the veterans of the North, and the act to relieve certain soldiers from the charge of desertion, approved July 5, 1884; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the petition of Mrs. Mary A. Bryant, of Medford, Mass., praying for an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Mrs. Nancy A. Wilson, of Nixa, Mo., praying for an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Thomas Kennedy, of Norwich, Conn., a soldier in the Florida Indian war, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of the Second Corps Club, Brooklyn, N. Y., praying for passage of amendments of section 1754 of the Revised Statutes, giving preference in appointments to civil offices to honorably discharged Union soldiers and sailors; which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, presented a petition of over 2,200 citizens of the city of New York, praying for the repeal of all acts fixing the term of many administrative offices at four years; which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

He also presented a petition of bankers and merchants of Buffalo, N. Y., praying for the passage of an act for the redemption of the trade-dollar; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. COKE. On the 30th of June last, by direction of the Committee on Commerce, I reported back to the Senate the bill (S. 1652) to provide for the improvement of the channel between Galveston Harbor and the Gulf of Mexico, which had been referred to that committee, giving notice that I should subsequently file a written report to accompany the bill. I now ask leave to present that report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the report will be received, and printed in accordance with the rule.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, submitted the following report; which was ordered to be placed on file:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred Senate bill 1592 for the relief of Franklin S. Whitney, have carefully considered the same; and, in accordance with the resolution of the Senate of February 7, 1884, report as follows:

That they have referred the same to the Court of Claims under the provisions of an act entitled "An act to afford assistance and relief to Congress and the Executive Departments in the investigation of claims and demands against the Government," approved March 3, 1883.

PRINTING OF TESTIMONY.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Resolved, That the testimony taken by a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs concerning the condition of certain Indian tribes in the State of California, under resolution of the Senate of July 4, 1884, be printed for the use of the committee only.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. McMILLAN introduced a bill (S. 2382) to authorize Frank W. Hunt to erect and maintain a ferry across the Missouri River at the military reservation of Fort Buford, Dakota Territory; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. LAPHAM introduced a bill (S. 2383) in relation to the salaries of those chaplains in the Army who served one year or more as officers in the line or as privates in the war of the rebellion; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HOAR. I ask leave to introduce a bill granting a pension to Jennette S. Kent, which I desire to have lie upon the table, to be referred to the Committee on Pensions when appointed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator from Massachusetts that, under the rules adopted at the last session, the Chair thinks that the committees of the Senate as appointed at the last session are still in existence.

Mr. HOAR. Then let the bill be referred at once.

The bill (S. 2384) granting a pension to Jennette S. Kent was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PENDLETON (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2385) for the relief of R. G. Huston & Co.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HARRISON introduced a bill (S. 2386) granting a pension to John I. Weir; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HAWLEY introduced a bill (S. 2387) for the relief of the sufferers by the wreck of the United States steamer Tallapoosa; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, introduced a bill (S. 2388) for the protection and improvement of the harbor of New York; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2389) for the relief of E. Remington & Sons; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. JACKSON, it was Ordered, That Thomas P. Jordan, of Henderson County, in the State of Tennessee, have permission to withdraw his papers from the files of the Senate, no adverse action having been had thereupon.

LEASES OF INDIAN LANDS.

Mr. VEST submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be instructed to inquire what leases of lands in the Indian Territory for grazing or other purposes have been made by the tribes of Indians therein, the number of acres embraced by each of said leases, the terms thereof, and the persons, corporations, or associations named therein as lessees; also, that the committee inquire as to the circumstances under which said leases were made and the means used for obtaining the same, and whether said leases are authorized by existing legislation or are conducive to the welfare of the Indians in said Territory.

That the committee have power to send for persons and papets, and shall report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I propose to ask for the immediate consideration of the resolution, and I should like to have the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs in regard to it.

By a provision of the Revised Statutes now in force a direct prohibition is in existence as to the making of leases of any portion of any Indian reservation. In 1881 my colleague and myself indorsed the application of a citizen of Missouri who had made such a lease with one of what are known as the five civilized tribes of the Indian Territory. The reply of the Secretary of the Interior was that the Revised Statutes absolutely prohibited any such lease, and I considered that a finality. I find now, however, in a document which comes from the Interior Department, information to the effect that there are now leases in this same Indian Territory for 3,117,880 acres of land. These leases seem to have come to the knowledge of the Interior Department, and while they do not meet the approval of that Department, still the Secretary of the Interior in a public letter declares that he will protect the lessees, and that while he will not approve such a lease he will see that persons who have no leases do not interfere with those who have them. The result is that this enormous amount of land is to-day, notwithstanding a direct prohibition of the Revised Statutes, in possession of lessees, and their names are given on page 124 of the document which I hold in my hand.

I have information since the last session of Congress, which I should be glad to lay before the committee, coming from responsible persons, to the effect that these leases have been procured by corruption, fraud, and bribery; that some of the worst practices which have obtained in civilized communities with regard to legislation have already reached to an alarming degree of corruption among the Indian councils. I have before me a letter coming from Mr. Augustus E. Ivey, directed to the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Ivey being a gentleman who is editor of a newspaper at Vinita, in the Indian Territory, in which he says:

I must again say that the lease—

That is, the lease of what is called the "Cherokee strip"—

was gotten through by the most corrupt and vile schemes, in order to allow a monopoly to enrich themselves, for which privilege they did not spare any money about our council. Could the inside of the scheme be seen through—and it can—I dare say no more vile a swindle was ever perpetrated upon our people. Five times the amount could have been realized for the lands if our council had went at it in a proper way. I have been connected with the press of the Cherokee Nation for the last half dozen years, in fact ever since I have been grown. I have yet a more burning shame to chronicle than the leasing of the "Cherokee strip."

This gentleman I understand to be an entirely responsible party. In addition to his name, I will say to the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs that whenever requested I am prepared to lay before him names, amounts, and dates, which show that as widespread a scheme of corruption is to-day in existence in that Territory as ever obtained in the worst times and under the worst methods known to the States of the United States or any other community.

Mr. DAWES rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. DAWES. I should like to hear the resolution read.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be again read.

Mr. CONGER. I was about to object to its consideration to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On that question the Senator from Massachusetts has a right to have the resolution read. It will be again reported.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that it may lie over a day.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution.

Mr. DAWES. I inquire of the Senator from Michigan if he objects to my making a statement before the resolution goes over?

Mr. CONGER. Not at all. I withdraw the objection for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. All this debate proceeds by unanimous consent. If there be no objection, the Senator from Massachusetts will proceed.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to state to the Senate that the fact of the existence of these leases came to the knowledge of the committee some time ago. Their attention was called to the subject at the last session by a resolution introduced by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES], if I mistake not. The committee were impressed with the seriousness of the condition of things, not only in the Indian Territory but in other reservations outside of it—the spirit that seemed to have got hold of the white people to take the earliest opportunity and the largest means to appropriate the reservations of the United States throughout, as well outside the Indian Territory as within it.

Upon the passage of the resolution of the Senator from Indiana the committee sought to get a joint committee, a subcommittee of both Houses, to enter into this examination in a serious and thorough manner, and thought that whatever could be done would be best done on a report from such a committee, giving both Houses the advantage of the information at the same time. They were unable to bring about such a result. Just at the close of the session the committee authorized its chairman to report a resolution, which was adopted by the Senate, instructing the committee to visit the Indian Territory and examine into this subject. After the adoption of that resolution, and against the wishes, with the opposition, of the committee, the Senate imposed upon that committee another duty during the vacation, to visit California and examine into the condition of a particular Indian reservation in that State. The committee found it impossible to discharge both of those duties during the vacation. They did execute the resolution imposed upon them by the Senate as well as they could by a subcommittee, but the engagements of the members of the committee as well as of other members of the Senate during the vacation were such that it was impossible to get the committee to visit the Indian Territory. They hope to execute that resolution hereafter. If they do not do so during this session of Congress they hope to do it hereafter.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. DAWES. Certainly.

Mr. BECK. I desire, having heard something about leases outside the Indian Territory, to ask the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Missouri whether it would not be better to enlarge the scope of the resolution, so as to apply to all Indian reservations, without confining it to the Indian Territory.

Mr. DAWES. Since the Senate adopted the resolutions to which I have referred, and since the efforts on the part of the committee to execute them, there has come to their knowledge an attempt to appropriate other Indian reservations, especially the Crow reservation, by such a lease as this. The committee are impressed with the idea that serious consequences are connected with these efforts, and that something more than a resolution instructing a committee is necessary to check this proceeding.

If it is not improper, I will state that the committee made inquiry with reference to the Crow reservation leases within a few days, and they ascertained that there is in the treaty with the Crows a special provision authorizing the Crow Indians to do this very thing without the sanction of the Interior Department; at least it is so alleged; I do not know how the fact is; but unless something is done every foot of land in these reservations will be taken in the manner described by the Senator from Missouri. I hope that Congress will have their attention called to this matter in a manner that will enlist the active effort of Congress to put an end to it.

The suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] imposes a duty upon the committee which he will see at once it would be impossible for them in this short session to perform. I do not know what it would involve. I certainly know that the committee are desirous of finding some way to put a stop to these leases.

I ought to say in justification of the Interior Department, in response to what was said by the Senator from Missouri, that I have understood the decision of the Interior Department to be this: While no lease can be valid without their sanction, yet withholding their sanction, so long as leases exist there with the consent of the Indians in the Indian Territory which do not appear to the Interior Department to be injurious and unjust, they will not interfere, but will let the Indians manage their own affairs. This condition of things has grown up in the Indian Territory by the Interior Department omitting to interfere, under the impression—a mistaken one, I think—that on the whole these leases are beneficial to the Indians.

Mr. VEST. The Senator from Massachusetts will pardon me for saying a word further. I stated very deliberately, and I will state again, that while the Secretary of the Interior says that he will not approve these leases, virtually he does approve them, because he protects the lessees against the world. I will quote his language:

> While the Department will not recognize the agreement or lease you mention, nor any other of the like character to the extent of approving the same, nor to the extent of assuming to settle controversies that may arise between the different parties holding such agreement, yet the Department will endeavor to see that parties having no agreement with the Indians are not allowed to interfere with those who have.

That is substantially an approval of the lease; and the whole military force of the Government of the United States is used to protect these lessees under an agreement that the Revised Statutes absolutely prohibits. That is what I state upon this floor, and there is no question about it.

Mr. DAWES. I agree with the Senator as to the legal effect disclosed. I only stated the position as it has been stated to me, and as the Committee on Indian Affairs have understood the position of the Interior Department up to this time. I would call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the resolution under which the committee were instructed to make their investigation, to see whether it does not cover just what the Senator proposes in his resolution, so that his resolution is not necessary.

Mr. VEST. I think not, Mr. President.

Mr. DAWES. If not, I have no objection to the passage of this resolution.

Mr. BECK. Without being prepared to say that anything has yet been done in the matter of the Crow reservation, for that was the subject I was thinking about when I asked the question, I fear from what I see in the papers that efforts are being made to have leases made ostensibly with the Crows which virtually get possession of that territory and destroy very much of the good that the Committee on Indian Affairs by their recent action have done, settling the matter so far as the Crows are concerned. It can do no harm to enlarge the scope of the resolutions, so as to embrace that great reservation which the Crows are now occupying and which they will continue to occupy unless leases are made to cattle-men in Montana, foreign and domestic companies, who will make the same leases that they are now making and to which I endeavored to call the attention of the committee last summer. I hope the Senator from Missouri will enlarge the resolution so as to embrace the Crow reservation.

Mr. DAWES. I think it is due to the committee for me to state that, agreeing with the Senator from Kentucky as to the policy of the Government toward the Crow reservation in all particulars as I understand his position, for he is quite as familiar with it as any Senator, I can conceive of nothing more unjust to those Indians than to attempt to appropriate all the land in that reservation which is thrown out of their particular occupation by the late statute—removing them to another part of the reservation—than these leases. The moment it came to my knowledge I assumed to act for the Committee on Indian Affairs and sought to stop any further effort to get those leases into legal shape, and besought the Secretary of the Interior to do it by telegram if in no other way. I do not think that the committee should be considered as derelict in any particular, for they have done all in their power to put a stop to those leases.

Mr. MAXEY. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts if, in his judgment, the resolution passed at the last session authorizing the committee to inquire into the condition of affairs in the Indian Territory, and to report such legislation, if any, as might be necessary, is sufficiently broad to cover the inquiry proposed by the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. DAWES. I have not that resolution before me. It was passed on the 11th day of June. My impression is that it contained everything that is in the resolution of the Senator from Missouri. I do not object to that resolution, however.

Mr. MAXEY. Nor do I; but I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator, if he will pardon me. I happen to know, from living in close contiguity to that country, that there is an immediate and pressing necessity for an investigation, not only of this but of other important matters, by the Committee on Indian Affairs. Now, can that be done without sending a committee or a subcommittee to the Indian Territory? Can it be done here during the present session? If so, I think it ought to be done by all means.

Mr. DAWES. My colleague on the committee [Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin] suggests that the resolution adopted in June required this examination to be made during the recess.

Mr. MAXEY. Then I ask the Senator if the time of that committee would justify an examination during the session?

Mr. DAWES. I ask the Chief Clerk to read the resolution to which I referred.

Mr. MAXEY. The question I asked was, Will the time of the committee justify an investigation during the session?

Mr. DAWES. I do not think it possible for the committee to make a thorough examination into that subject without visiting the Territory. Whether it is practicable to visit it during this session or not, Senators more acquainted with the Indian Territory than myself are better able to answer. The Chief Clerk will read the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, as this debate is proceeding by unanimous consent, the paper sent to the desk will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

> Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs, or any subcommittee thereof appointed by its chairman, is hereby instructed to inquire into the condition of the several tribes and bands of Indians in the Indian Territory, the tenure by which the lands in the several reservations in said Territory are now held, and the character of their actual occupation and use, the condition and rights of the freedmen among said Indians, and the relation of said tribes to the United States and to each other, and the need, if any, of legislation in respect to the same; and for that purpose shall have power to send for persons and papers, examine witnesses under oath, employ a stenographer, and sit during the recess of the Senate at such times and places as the committee may determine; and shall report their proceedings and any recommendations they may see fit to make to the Senate at its next session; and that the actual and necessary expenses of said investigation be paid, on the approval of the chairman of the said committee, out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. DAWES. I yield the floor entirely.

Mr. HARRISON. It seems to me, as a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, that it would be probably impracticable during this short session to conduct as thorough and searching an investigation of this important matter as it ought to have, and that the facilities of the committee for such an investigation would be greatly increased if the members could be upon the ground and come in contact with the existing state of things there. If it be true as the Senator from Missouri has stated—and I have no doubt it is, for he is apt to be accurate in such examinations—that these leases are in open defiance of an express provision of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and if it be true, as he intimates, that the Secretary of the Interior has by any indirection given some sanction and force to the leases—if we may take those two things to be established, one as a matter of law and the other as a fact, I do not see why we may not by a resolution, without any investigation, take such prompt steps as will prevent the continuance of that state of things or the recognition in any way of any future leases which may be made.

If we should do that, then the matter, it seems to me, might well be left until the next vacation, when the Committee on Indian Affairs could make, on the ground, a searching inquiry into this question. The only thing to be lost by delay might be the making of new leases, or some increase of investment, or tightening of the grip of those who have got hold of some of the lands; and it seems to me that might be prevented, if the Senator from Missouri would present some resolution relating to this matter, either of instruction to the Secretary of the Interior or declaratory of the law in some way, and let us pass it promptly; and then let the investigation follow, and be conducted in a way that should be thorough and searching.

Mr. VEST. There are a good many difficulties which will present themselves to the Senator from Indiana after he has given his attention more fully to this subject. I have looked into it more closely, perhaps, than he has, for the reason that my State, the State of Missouri, is near the Indian Territory, and many citizens of the State are interested in this matter. As the Revised Statutes now stand, no lease is permitted with any Indian tribe for a single acre of their reservations. Notwithstanding that fact the anomalous condition is found now in the Indian Territory of nearly four million acres of land leased with the knowledge of the Interior Department; and the Secretary holds that it is not his duty to go into the question at all, but that he will simply protect the lessees and allow them to remain in possession, and not examine the question in the slightest degree.

In regard to this resolution, all I desire to know is the status of the law, the manner in which these leases have been obtained, and whether the Congress of the United States proposes to allow a few corporations or individuals to go into that Territory and take under leases millions of acres of land and accumulate millions of dollars, for the rent is simply nominal, while the rest of the people of the United States are excluded by the military authorities.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator from Missouri will allow me, my suggestion I thought was calculated to apply a prompter remedy than was suggested by the Senator from Missouri. I agree with him that it is a wrong and an outrage—or you may use the strongest terms in its description you please, and I agree with him—but if the Secretary of the Interior thinks it is not his business to interfere, then let us make it his business by some brief joint resolution on the subject which we can pass at once.

Mr. VEST. As I understand the position of the statutes to-day in regard to the Indian Territory, that entire Territory is under the supervision and absolute control of the Interior Department. If that be so, then no additional legislation is necessary, but it is our duty to ascertain why these leases are permitted, why it is that this great Department of the Government ignores the statute, which is as plain as any upon the statute-book, and says that this thing shall still continue to exist. I understand from the report of the Secretary of the Interior that he defends this system, and says it is proper and right and ought to be continued. Out of deference to him and to his practice under the law I thought it was better for the Committee on Indian Affairs to examine the whole subject and make a report.

In regard to the suggestion of the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] that the subject-matter of my resolution is covered by an antecedent resolution, he will find upon examination that he is mistaken. The first resolution upon this subject was one offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. WALKER] December 4, 1883, and is as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish, for the information of the Senate, copies of all documents and correspondence in his office relating to leases of lands in the Indian Territory to citizens of the United States for cattle-grazing and other purposes.

The report in response to that resolution is the document from which I have read this morning to the Senate. It does not cover the manner in which the leases were made; it does not touch the legality of the leases.

Following that resolution came another, offered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES], and the date of that, as shown by the Journal, is February 25, 1884. That resolution does not cover this point as I understand it. It reads:

Whereas in compliance with Senate resolution of December 4, 1883—

Which I have just read—

Whereas in compliance with Senate resolution of December 4, 1883, the honorable Secretary of the Interior has transmitted copies of documents and correspondence relating to leases of lands in the Indian Territory to citizens of the United States for cattle-grazing and other purposes; and

Whereas it appears from Executive Document No. 54 of the present session of Congress, containing said copies of correspondence, &c., that several million of acres of land in the Indian Territory have been leased to citizens of the United States for cattle-grazing purposes: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and they are hereby, instructed to investigate the matter of said leases; whether the same have been made in conformity to law; whether any money paid by any of the lessees under the terms of said leases have been covered into the Treasury; whether any of said lessees have attempted to survey any of the lands in said Indian Territory belonging, secured, or granted by treaty with the United States to any Indian tribe, or has designated any of the boundaries of said lands by marking trees or otherwise; and that said committee be instructed to report by bill or otherwise at any time.

That simply affects the legal status of this case. Now comes the resolution which was sent to the desk by the Senator from Massachusetts, and which reads:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs, or any subcommittee thereof appointed by its chairman, is hereby instructed to inquire into the condition of the several tribes and bands of Indians in the Indian Territory, the tenure by which the lands in the several reservations in said Territory are now held, and the character of their actual occupation and use, the condition and rights of the freedmen among said Indians, and the relation of said tribes to the United States and to each other, and the need, if any, of legislation in respect to the same; and for that purpose shall have power, &c.

By some construction it might be said that this last resolution would cover the subject, but I desire to put it so specifically and so directly before the committee and the country that there can be no mistake about it.

In regard to the suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] I have simply to say that I understand the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] to object to the present consideration of this resolution. If so, I will ask that it lie on the table and be printed, and we can amend it when it comes up.

Mr. BECK. That is right.

Mr. VEST. I have no objection to extending the inquiry to the Crow reservation.

Mr. MAXEY. I was of the impression, from my recollection of the resolution which we adopted during the last session, that it was sufficiently broad to cover the investigation proposed by the Senator from Missouri. That was my opinion, and, having just now re-examined it, I am of that opinion yet. At the same time if it is not broad enough I desire the inquiry to extend fully and completely to the questions presented by the Senator from Missouri, because they ought to be inquired into. I have heard a great many criticisms about the leases in the Indian Territory just north of me. Lands are rented there for a price greatly less than is paid for corresponding grazing lands in my State; and I think there is much dissatisfaction among the Indians growing out of the leasing of the lands in such large bodies, as well as at such low figures. How those leases were procured I do not know; but I do know that the lands in the Indian Territory are as fine grazing lands as there are in America, and that they are rented to-day at very small figures as compared with corresponding grazing lands elsewhere.

That ought to be looked into. But that is not the only question which I desire to have inquired into. I call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs to the fact that there are many questions of great moment to the welfare of the Indians, which I called to the attention of the Senate last session, that need prompt action. I did say at the last session, as the Senator will remember very well, that I was exceedingly anxious that the committee should visit the Indian Territory in person and make examination for themselves, send for books, persons, and papers, and make a complete and exhaustive report to this body for our action, not only upon this question, but upon many others that I could name which need to be examined, to the end that the Senate in then pending legislation should act advisedly.

If the committee could at the present session make these examinations, which I regard as important and urgent, I should be very glad. If they can not do it, of course that settles it for the present Congress. I only desired to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs to the fact that there ought to be an examination, rigid and thorough, into the affairs of that Territory. I do not know much about the reservations, and am willing to act as the investigations may show to be right as to them.

Mr. CONGER. I asked that the resolution might go over until to-morrow because I desired to see whether the Committee on Indian Affairs and the Committee on the Judiciary, which have been instructed by resolutions, direct and positive, to make reports upon particular subjects connected with this general topic, had made any reports, and what they were.

Mr. GARLAND. Allow me to interrupt the Senator for a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield?

Mr. CONGER. For an inquiry.

Mr. GARLAND. The resolution to which the Senator from Missouri referred as having been introduced by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] to instruct the Judiciary Committee was amended, and in place of the Judiciary Committee it was directed to the Committee on Indian Affairs. So that resolution went to them also.

Mr. CONGER. Then there have been two or three resolutions directing the Committee on Indian Affairs (instead of the Committee on the Judiciary as to one) to make a report upon a particular subject. Now, I suppose it is known to every man who has had any familiarity with Indian reservations, not only in the Indian Territory but throughout other parts of the country, that grazing lands and lands for meadows where the grass could be cut on the Western prairies and all over that region have been either seized upon by cattle-dealers, ranchmen, or under some pretended lease—such lands have been taken, been pastured, the grass cut, all for a mere nominal price of no value to the Indians and with no regard for their rights.

I had hoped that there would be a report upon some of these resolutions which at least would give some information to the Senate upon these subjects. I am in full accord with the Senator from Missouri in having this investigation made, if it would be any better than the resolutions which have already been passed by the Senate. The resolution of the Senator from Missouri gives power to send for persons and papers. It gives no authority to send agents or examiners to find what on the ground the particular condition of affairs is. I will venture to say that there is not a reservation on the whole Western border where the Indian lands suitable for meadows and for mowing the grass have not been used by cattle-men or by those living near there, and the grass cut or the lands pastured without any valuable compensation to the Indians throughout hundreds and thousands and hundreds of thousands of acres. Some of these things I know myself by inquiry for two or three years in succession, and I have called attention to them heretofore.

I desire to have the resolution go over, so that its scope may embrace an inquiry in regard to all these trespasses upon the reservations and rights of the Indians, that the actual condition of the Indian reservations, not only in the Indian Territory but throughout all the West, may be ascertained, and, if necessary, some legislation may be had which shall protect the Indians against the encroachments of the whites. That is the only object I have in desiring that the resolution shall go over, until I can see what reports have been made, if any, and how much answer has been made to the inquiries which the Senate has ordered heretofore.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, the debate is going on by general consent, I believe, and so I suppose I may be allowed a word. As the Indian matter is being discussed—in which the Senator from Massachusetts takes great interest, and I know he desires to do everything he possibly can to correct evils in connection with the leasing of lands and the purchasing of stock in the Indian Territory, and I believe it exists elsewhere—I hope the committee who are to investigate the subject will see how far these things are carried on.

We have been purchasing large numbers of milch cows and other stock to aid Indians, and have asked them to convert their ponies into cattle so as to have a market for them, and we permit by law or by sufferance or something "squaw-men" to settle among them—that is, white men who pretend to have married squaws; and while we do not allow white people to trade with the Indians, the "squaw-men" can trade with them. Cases were brought before the Committee on Appropriations last year where men claiming to have married squaws, and so having a right to trade, were buying cattle by the hundreds from the Indians at ten or twelve dollars a head, and white men outside were furnishing the money to make the purchases of cattle that the Government paid thirty, forty, or fifty dollars a head for. They were stripping the Indians of cattle under the claim that having married squaws they had the right to trade with them, and outside white men were furnishing the money and the cattle were being taken away. When an Indian agent thought of stepping in in the Indian Territory he was brought here for reproval, but the Secretary of the Interior took his side and said he was right; but the Commissioner of Indian Affairs was unable to find any law that prevented the "squaw-men" from doing this.

I hope the Indian Committee will find some way very promptly to stop that condition of things as well as the leasing of lands, for there is no use in our buying cows at $40 a head for the Indians and letting white men outside furnish the "squaw-men" $10 apiece and take them all away from the Indians, as is being done.

Mr. DAWES. I hope the Senator from Michigan will allow me——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. CONGER. I do. I thought unanimous consent was given to everybody to speak.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Kentucky, as well as myself, went into the very question to which he calls attention.

Mr. BECK. We stopped it in the appropriation bill for this year, but not by a general law. We provided only that that money should not be so used.

Mr. DAWES. That went as far as the Committee on Appropriations could go.

Mr. BECK. Yes; but now let the Committee on Indian Affairs present a general law.

Mr. DAWES. The Committee on Appropriations in that regard have done all that it was in their power to do. The transactions to which the Senator from Michigan alludes are trespasses on the Indian lands, altogether different from the transactions to which attention has been called this morning. In respect to those transactions the Indian Bureau have called the attention of Congress time and again to the necessity of legislation giving that office power to prevent these trespasses. The only power they have now is the imposition of a fine upon an irresponsible man, who has nothing to do but to go the next day and take the poor debtor's oath and repeat his trespass. This man Payne has done that over and over again in the courts in Arkansas, and atoned in that way for his trespasses upon the Indian lands. The Committee on Indian Affairs have reported time and again to this body a bill giving sufficient authority to the Indian Bureau to put a stop to these trespasses. At the last session the Senate passed that bill. If the bill shall become a law before the expiration of this Congress, the Indian Bureau will be clothed with authority sufficient to put an end to this kind of trespass if they have the disposition.

These leases of the Indian lands are no more outrageous than leases of the public lands which have been going on before the eyes of Congress and the administration for two or three years past. Almost all the public lands are fenced in now by wire fences and appropriated by the cattlemen; they have gone from the Indian lands to the public lands, and from the public lands to the Indian lands. The Committee on Indian Affairs visited during the recess, under the instructions of the Senate, a reservation of 102,000 acres, 85,000 of which are in the absolute and exclusive possession of outsiders with their herds of cattle and their flocks of sheep, consuming everything that grows upon that land, while the Indian Bureau has been obliged to advertise for contracts to furnish beef to support the Indians on the reservation and has bought the beef of the men who fattened it upon the Indian reservation itself to feed the Indians, when if they could have had their own reservation they would not only have been self-supporting Indians, but would have had an income—Indians who sold in one year 17,000 bushels of wheat from a reservation which is now occupied entirely or almost entirely by private individuals without any power on the part of the Government to dispossess them.

Such is the spirit not only about the Indian reservations, but the public lands generally. There is abroad in the country a disposition on the part of private individuals to appropriate public lands as well as Indian lands; and the barbed-wire-fence mania which has taken possession of our people, and the great profits growing out of the raising of cattle and sheep upon this large domain, imposed upon Congress a serious and imperative duty to find some remedy, or the public lands and the Indian lands will pass irrecoverably into the possession of large landholders, foreigners as well as citizens of the United States.

I hope that this matter will not end in talk, nor will it be confined alone to the Indian reservations. As alarming a condition of things exists on the public lands without regard to the Indians as exists today in the Indian Territory and on the reservations. Here is the Crow reservation, from a large portion of which Congress by legislation withdrew the Crow Indians to a place where they could support themselves, leaving for disposition by legislation or by treaty a large tract, two or three hundred thousand acres, more or less, to be disposed of for the benefit of the Indians. In this vacation cattle-men have got their influence over the Indians and have obtained a lease for thirty or more years of that whole territory, and I understand the Crows have the authority to make this lease by virtue of their own treaty.

It is necessary for Congress to do something. I think we have evidence enough here, evidence enough without sending a committee out upon these reservations, to require of us immediate, prompt action, clothing the Indian Bureau with the authority and imposing upon it the duty to restore the Indian lands to their rightful occupants and the public lands to the public domain, to be appropriated for the benefit of the United States and of the Indians, rather than to the profit of those who are engaged in raising cattle.

Mr. CONGER. Will the Senator state the reservation which has been visited this year, and whether the committee have made a report on the condition of that reservation?

Mr. DAWES. The reservation to which I alluded is the Round Valley reservation in California. The committee have not made a report, because the investigation was during the recess, and this morning only has the Senate ordered the testimony to be printed for the use of the committee.

Mr. CONGER. From some information I have had I supposed the committee found there that the Indian land of the Round Valley reservation in California had been leased by Government officials.

Mr. DAWES. There are no leases in that valley. It is occupied by private individuals by sufferance, and they have occupied it for ten or fifteen years—eighty-five or more thousand acres out of one hundred and two thousand—and have absolute control of it.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, I know that in getting timber from Indian reservations, either cutting down trees or taking away timber that has been cut in some way on reservations, with which I am somewhat familiar, where there are meadow lands, white men have gone in with their mowing-machines and taken in some instances the entire meadow lands and cut the grass from them, so as to leave the Indians, who have their own machines, without any land to mow, without any grass, without any meadow to cut. That has been going on within my observation and knowledge for some three or four years inside of States and Territories on our Western border and under the immediate observation of Government officials and Indian agents. It was in reference to such a condition of things that I desired a resolution of this kind to be large enough to meet what I conceive the demands of justice toward the Indian and toward the Government.

Let the resolution go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution goes over until to-morrow. If there be no objection it will be printed. Resolutions are still in order.

CAPTAIN WHEELER'S REPORT.

Mr. COCKRELL submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That the report of Capt. George M. Wheeler, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, on the Third International Geographical Congress and Exhibition at Venice, Italy, with the accompanying illustrations, transmitted to the Senate by the Secretary of War on December 10, 1883, be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the Committee on Printing will take cognizance of the subject and act upon it promptly.

WILLIAM H. FENTON.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I ask that the vote by which Senate bill No. 1103, to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of William H. Fenton, was indefinitely postponed be reconsidered and that the bill be referred back again to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the vote of the Senate taken, as the Chair sees, on the 15th of February last, indefinitely postponing the bill (S. 1103) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of William H. Fenton be reconsidered. The bill was reported adversely and postponed indefinitely on the 15th of February. Is there objection to the reconsideration proposed? The Chair hears none, and the vote postponing the bill is reconsidered. The bill is now before the Senate.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I move that the bill be now referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be recommitted with the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be recommitted also, if there be no objection.

ADMISSION OF DAKOTA.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to give notice that on Tuesday next I will call up and ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1682) to enable the people of that part of the Territory of Dakota south of the forty-sixth parallel of north latitude to form a constitution and State government and for the admission of the State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes. I shall hope to have the attention of the Senate to the measure at that time. I believe there is no other special order for that day.

Mr. VEST. It is only a notice that is given, I believe.

Mr. HARRISON. I give the notice because I want my friend from Missouri to have a little time for reflection, in the hope that he will by that time see the great injustice of refusing longer to admit to full national citizenship this great and enterprising population.

Mr. VEST. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Indiana.

GOVERNMENT'S INTEREST IN ENCUMBERED PROPERTY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further resolutions that order is closed. The Senate proceeds to the consideration of the Calendar in pursuance of Rule VIII. Order of Business 314 is the first in order. This bill was under consideration under Rule VIII, and by a vote of the Senate its consideration was proceeded with notwithstanding an objection. The bill is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill (S. 1733) to provide for protecting the interests of the United States in respect of any incumbrances on property wherein they have an interest.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on an amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] when the bill was under consideration on the 23d of May last, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 17, after the word "made," it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That if the lien, incumbrance, or mortgage to be paid off or removed is upon the property of a railroad company, the same shall not be paid by the United States until after the validity and amount of such lien, mortgage, or incumbrance shall have been ascertained and settled by the judgment or decree of a court of competent jurisdiction.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND], who has charge of this bill, I believe, is not in the Chamber at this moment. I would much prefer that the consideration of it should proceed while he is here. I will therefore suggest that it be postponed until to-morrow at the expiration of the morning hour and be made the special order at that time, so that the Senator from Arkansas may come in and take charge of it.

Mr. HOAR. Why not let it go over by unanimous consent, holding its place on the Calendar? I think it can be disposed of under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MORGAN. I prefer that course if the Senate will agree to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama suggests that this bill be passed over for to-day, retaining its place on the Calendar.

Mr. MORGAN. I see that the Senator from Arkansas is now in his seat.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama withdraws his suggestion.

Mr. MORGAN. I withdraw the suggestion if the Senator from Arkansas wishes to go on with the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. GARLAND. In view of some general action on the subject to which this bill relates, I ask permission of the Senate to pass it over without losing its place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas asks that this bill be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar under Rule VIII. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

W. C. MARSH.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. 1031) for the relief of W. C. Marsh; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in line 5, after the word "dollars," to strike out "in gold coin;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States be authorized and directed to pay W. C. Marsh, of Tennessee, $2,054, the same being the amount taken from him on or about the 10th day of February, 1863, by the officers commanding the gunboat New Era, and turned into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, let the report be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. DOLPH March 5, 1884:

The Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 1031) for the relief of W. C. Marsh, respectfully reports:

That the said claimant, William C. Marsh, who was at the time a citizen of the United States and a resident of the county of Tipton, in the State of Tennessee, on or about the month of January, 1863, obtained permission from the military authorities at Memphis, Tenn., to ship a quantity of cotton to Saint Louis, in the State of Missouri, and that in accordance with such permission he shipped his cotton—about eighteen bales—to Saint Louis, and sold it for $3,500 in United States currency, which he converted into $2,228 in gold coin, and then took passage on a regular steam transport plying between the cities of Saint Louis and Memphis, and started on his return, via Memphis, to his home in Tipton County; that when said steamer had reached a point at or near Island No. 10, in the Mississippi River, which was on or about the 10th day of February, 1863, the Federal forces upon the United States gunboat New Era seized said transport and took charge of her and the passengers on board, and seized and took from the said claimant the sum of $2,054 in gold coin, which was taken to the city of Cairo, where the same was duly libeled by the district attorney of the southern district of the State of Illinois in the district court of said district, as forfeited to the United States, for the reason that the same at the time of the seizure was being transported from a portion of the United States, to wit, the State of Missouri, to another portion of the United States, to wit, the State of Tennessee, contrary to the act of July 13, 1861, which libel was filed June 2, 1863; and afterward the said claimant appeared and filed a bond and stipulation in the said court, and the said gold coin was delivered to him; that afterward and on the 23d day of January, 1864, the cause coming on to be heard in the said court, the said claimant appeared, by his proctor, J. O. Broadhead, esq., and confessed the allegations of the libel to be true; and it was thereupon ordered, adjudged, and decreed by the court that the libellant (the United States) have and recover from the said claimant the sum of $2,054, the amount of his bond and stipulation filed in said cause, and that execution issue against the said claimant and Jacobs Burns, his surety, therefor. On the same day the claimant filed in said court a petition praying for the remission of the forfeiture of said gold coin, and the district attorney having consented that the same might be heard, the court proceeded to hear the proofs in support of said petition, and ordered that the execution of the decree of forfeiture should be staid until the action of the Secretary of the Treasury in the premises, and proceeded to hear the evidence, and made the following findings of fact:

"First. That the claimant, William C. Marsh, is an illiterate man, unable to read or write, and that he is a poor and honest laboring man.

"Second. That said Marsh is no trader or speculator, and his business is that of a farmer, and that he rents the lands cultivated by him.

"Third. That the $2,054 gold coin found on the person of said claimant Marsh was his own property, no other person having any interest in it, it being the proceeds of certain cotton raised and sold by him.

"Fourth. That said claimant Marsh was carrying said gold coin home with him for the use of himself and family in good faith, without any intention of fraud, he being ignorant of any law, order, or regulation forbidding the carrying of coin into said State of Tennessee.

"Fifth. That said claimant Marsh is and ever has been loyal to the Government of the United States, and that while Tipton County, Tennessee, the home of said claimant, was under rebel rule, he persistently and continuously avoided giving them any aid or comfort or in any way recognizing their authority.

"Sixth. No proof was taken in support of the libel or against the petition of the owner.

"S. H. TREAT, District Judge."

The petition and findings having been presented to the Secretary of the Treasury, the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, on April 20, 1864, addressed the following communication to the Solicitor of the Treasury:

"TREASURY DEPARTMENT, April 30, 1864.

"SIR: Application has been made by William C. Marsh, of Tipton County, Tennessee, for the remission of a forfeiture of $2,054 in gold coin, seized at Island No. 10, in the Mississippi River, and libeled in the United States district court for the southern district of Illinois, for violation of an act of Congress approved July 13, 1861.

"After a careful review of the summary examination had before the judge of said court, I see no sufficient reason to grant the prayer of the petitioner. You will accordingly please instruct the United States district attorney for said district that the application for the remission of the forfeiture in said case has been denied.

"Respectfully,

"GEORGE HARRINGTON,
"Acting Secretary of the Treasury.

"EDWARD JORDAN, Esq.,
"Solicitor of the Treasury."

While the facts found by the district judge upon the summary hearing of the petition for a remission of the forfeiture would seem to have justified the Secretary of the Treasury in granting the prayer of the petitioner, there may have been circumstances which are unknown to your committee which rendered a strict enforcement of the act of July 13, 1861, necessary. Your committee is of the opinion that the claimant is equitably entitled to relief, and recommends that the bill be amended by striking out the words "in gold coin," in line 5 of the bill, and that the bill as amended do pass.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RICHARD HAWLEY & SONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1170) for the relief of Richard Hawley & Sons. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to refund to Richard Hawley & Sons, of Detroit, Mich., $473.20, collected of them as duty on malt in excess of the amount authorized by law.

Mr. COCKRELL. I see that there is a report there. Let it be read.

Mr. PALMER. I would call for the reading of the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GARLAND in the chair). The Senator from Missouri has called for its reading. It will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. FAIR March 5, 1884:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1170) for the relief of Richard Hawley & Sons, respectfully report as follows:

The evidence before the committee shows that Richard Hawley & Sons, of Detroit, imported from Canada in July, 1870, three lots of malt, amounting in all to 6,415 bushels, or 230,940 pounds. In Canada an excise tax of 1 cent per pound was imposed on all malt consumed in that country, and malt out of bond, or in the market for consumption or use, was worth 1 cent per pound more than malt in bond. The petitioners bought this malt in bond, and therefore the excise tax of 1 cent per pound was never paid or demanded in that country. The entry was duly made in this case at the Detroit custom-house at the price actually paid for the malt in Canada.

But it was claimed by the collector of the port of Detroit, in accordance with a decision previously made by the Secretary of the Treasury, that duty must be paid upon this malt according to its value in Canada out of bond at the time of its purchase; and that this value must be ascertained by adding to the price actually paid the excise tax of 1 cent per pound. This valuation of the collector increased the value of the malt, and commission included, $2,367.13, and upon this increased valuation duty was exacted at the rate of 20 per cent., or to the amount of $473.42.

Hawley & Sons paid the duties so imposed, verbally protesting against the exaction, and declaring their intention to appeal to the Department. They were told by the collector that they had the right to do so, but that the Department would undoubtedly reaffirm its decision; and then read to them the decision which had been made by the Secretary.

The United States court in Chicago, in November of that year, rendered a decision on the identical question, in a cause then pending in said court, annulling the ruling of the Secretary of the Treasury and in favor of the importer. The court held that the price paid gave the dutiable value. This decision of the court was thereafter recognized by the Secretary of the Treasury, and he thereafter refunded all duties so illegally collected where protest was made and appeal taken by the importer, but refused to refund the excessive duties collected in this case because no appeal was taken, he having no authority to refund except in cases in which protest and appeal had been duly taken, or failure to appeal was shown to be owing to causes beyond the control of the importer.

There has never been any controversy between the petitioners and the officers of the Government in relation to the facts in this case.

The officers of the United States have illegally collected from the petitioners the sum of $473.42, and aside from the fact that they had no right to collect and the United States have no right to retain this sum, the committee are of opinion that the facts of this case bring the petitioners within the spirit of the remedial statute, and equitably entitle them to relief. They agree perfectly with the court as to the true rule for the valuation of property so imported into this country, and are of opinion that the money so paid into the Treasury in excess of the requirements of the law should be refunded. The petitioners made a mistake of 22 cents in making up the amount improperly collected of them. The committee recommend that the bill do pass.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to inquire if this does not involve a very important principle. As I understand, under the customs laws there are thousands of cases now pending in the Treasury of applications for the refund of customs duties. The law is very explicit; it points out exactly the steps that shall be taken when there is any controversy in regard to the payment of customs duties; and unless the parties take these necessary steps they are entitled to no relief. Now, as I understand, in this case they did not take the steps. If they had, they would have had a perfect legal remedy.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The Senator will permit me to say that if they had followed the statute and taken an appeal, as the statute says they may do, the Secretary of the Treasury would have refunded to them the amount.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is precisely the point. There is no question about that.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Not having done that, the committee were of the opinion that their equitable right to relief existed, and that Congress having authority to grant that equitable relief, the committee would recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then why not pass a general law authorizing refunds in all cases? Is there anything in this case that renders it an exception to the rule? That is the question. If there is nothing in this case to render it an exception, it is a gross injustice to other persons who have failed to make an appeal and whose cases were afterward decided to be on the same footing.

I understand that there are thousands of cases where, after a lapse of years, a decision has been rendered by which customs dues would be refunded if the parties had appealed; but they, not having appealed, have no remedy. Now, if we are going to give relief to one class of these persons, ought we not to give it to the others? Do the committee say that wherever a man has paid customs duties and has failed to take the appeal prescribed by law, and the courts afterward decide that he would be entitled to a refund if he had taken the prescribed steps, he shall have relief, or do they make exceptions?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. That question was not presented to the committee. The question presented to the committee was, whether or not, in this case, the committee would recommend that these parties have relief. The question as to whether a general act should be passed embracing the thousands of cases, if there be thousands of cases, now pending before the Treasury Department which are somewhat analogous to this was not presented to the Committee on Claims. The question presented to that committee was simply whether or not, these parties having been required by the collector of customs at Detroit to pay the sum of four hundred and odd dollars in excess of the amount which under the law they ought to have been required to pay, the committee would recommend the passage of this bill for their relief.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then I understand that the committee would in all cases——

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The Senator does not understand me.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is a very important question, an exceedingly important question, and if the committee has not considered that question it ought to have considered it. That is the point I make, because we can not afford to lay down the bars in that way. There are millions—yes, $20,000,000 involved in this identical principle, at least $20,000,000, and the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury will show it.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The Committee on Claims has enough to do to consider the questions presented to it. The question presented by the Senator from Missouri, as I have already stated, was not submitted to that committee at all. This bill was introduced and referred to that committee, and it became the duty of the committee to consider this bill. It considered it without regard to any other claims that are or may be pending against the Government.

Mr. CONGER. This occurred in the spring of 1870. A protest was made against it on the ground that 1 per cent. extra duty was charged. Before that time the Treasury Department had ruled that that should be the measure of the duty. The only point here is that the persons mentioned in the bill, Hawley & Sons, did not appeal within the proper time; but in November of that same year a case was carried up from Chicago embracing the same state of facts, involving the same judicial question, and the court decided that the proportion of the value of malt which would be called export charges was not a proper item in calculating the duty, and after that the Treasury Department acquiesced in that decision, and collected no more tax on that account; but the time for an appeal had passed.

This matter was presented to Congress almost immediately after that. I think I introduced the bill in the House some years ago and it passed the House, but never passed both Houses during the same Congress.

There is no doubt about the equity of this bill, and there is no doubt about the practice of Congress to refund money which has been paid by an improper decision of the Treasury Department. It can not affect other cases. Every case of that kind stands on its own merits.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Missouri that to pass this bill would be setting a dangerous precedent, going back fourteen years; and if we may go fourteen years we may go twenty. And he has not overstated the amount that would be liable to be drawn from the Treasury if this should be established as a precedent.

This bill, I think, was before the Committee on Finance, and it was virtually there rejected; and I may say that at the last session a bill by some accident involving the same principle, that is, where a party had failed to take an appeal within the proper time, got through our committee, but afterward it was reconsidered and the bill was withdrawn from the files of the Senate.

I hope that no precedent will be established to-day on a question of this kind, as it will undoubtedly revive some thousands of claims. Perhaps five thousand cases would not begin to approximate the number that would be brought here for revision by Congress if this should be established as a precedent.

Mr. CONGER. The statute-books are full of just such cases as this at every session, where Congress does justice to a person who has been compelled to pay unjust duties. I am surprised at gentlemen. It is because the Department has not the power to do what is equitable and right that men come to the law-making branch and ask it to do what is right. This is one of those cases—nothing new, nothing unusual. All the time that any man has spent in the Senate or in Congress there has never been a session but that the same class of relief has been furnished by Congress.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock and 44 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 2, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

The following additional members appeared: Messrs. BAGLEY BLANCHARD, BRUMM, FIEDLER, GARRISON, MORSE, PERKINS, PHELPS, SPOONER, CHARLES STEWART, STORM, WAKEFIELD, WILLIAMS, GEORGE D. WISE, and WEAVER.

SWEARING IN OF A MEMBER.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I present the credentials of Hon. Hiram Y. Smith, elected from the seventh Congressional district of Iowa, to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Hon. John A. Kasson.

The SPEAKER. The credentials will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To whom it may concern:

This is to certify that at a general election holden on the 4th day of November, A. D. 1884, Hiram Y. Smith was elected to the office of Representative in Congress from the seventh Congressional district of said State for the term of two years from the 4th day of March, A. D. 1883, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of John A. Kasson.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused to be affixed the great seal of the State of Iowa.

Done at Des Moines, this twenty-eighth day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighty-four, of the Independence of the United States the one hundred and ninth, and of this State the thirty-eighth.

[SEAL.] BUREN R. SHERMAN.

By the governor:

J. A. T. HULL,
Secretary of State.

W. T. HAMMOND,
Deputy.

Mr. SMITH appeared at the bar of the House and was qualified by taking the oath prescribed by section 1757 of the Revised Statutes.

CHARGES AGAINST MARSHAL OF SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF OHIO.

Mr. FOLLETT. As a privileged question, I submit what I send to the desk and desire to have it read.

Mr. REED. I reserve all points of order.

The SPEAKER. The paper will be read subject to the right of objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

I do impeach Lot Wright, United States marshal of the southern district of Ohio, of high crimes and misdemeanors.

I charge him with usurpation of power and violation of law:

In that he appointed a large number of general and special deputy marshals to serve at the several voting precincts in the city of Cincinnati, in the State of Ohio, at an election for members of Congress held in said city on the 14th day of October, A. D. 1884, and armed said deputy marshals with pistols and other deadly weapons said to have been furnished by the War Department of the United States Government;

In that a large number of the deputy marshals so appointed and armed were notorious criminals and men of known vicious and brutal habits and reputation, and many of them non-residents of said city of Cincinnati and of said State of Ohio;

In that the said deputy marshals, acting under his orders and directions, aided, abetted, and encouraged fraudulent voting, intimidation of voters, and gross outrages upon the elective franchise and the rights of the honest voters of said city in furtherance of the interests of a political party and its candidates: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice be required and directed, as soon as the same can reasonably be done, to investigate such charges and report to this House.

First. How many deputy marshals, general and special, were appointed and authorized by said United States marshal for the southern district of Ohio to serve at the several voting precincts of said city at said election, with the name and residence of each and the voting precinct to which each was assigned.

Second. What citizens, if any, of said several precincts asked for the appointment of such deputy marshals, with the names of such citizens and the reasons, if any were assigned, for such request.

Third. Whether any, and, if so, how many, of such deputy marshals have, prior to such appointment, been accused or convicted of crime, or were men of known vicious and brutal habits and reputations.

Fourth. Whether said deputy marshals were under the direction and control of partisans, and used the powers vested in them in the interest of any political party, and aided, countenanced, and encouraged fraudulent and illegitimate voting in the interest of such political party and its candidates.

Fifth. What number and what kind of pistols or other deadly weapons were put into the hands of said deputy marshals, who furnished the said weapons, from whence were they received, why furnished, and how many of such weapons have been returned, together with the names of such deputy marshals as have failed to return the weapons furnished them.

Sixth. What amount of money has been paid to such deputy marshals, and by whose order was the same paid, and at what rate per day.

Seventh. Any other matter or thing connected with or germane to the general subject of such investigation.

Resolved, That in making such investigation the said committee be empowered to appoint a subcommittee of three, consisting of the chairman of said committee and such other two members thereof as he may select, which subcommittee shall have full power to meet and hold its sessions at such times and places as may seem proper, to send for persons and papers, to compel the attendance of witnesses and to require them to testify, to employ a stenographer, and to incur any and all such necessary and reasonable expenditures as may be deemed requisite for the purposes of such investigation, such expenditures to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. KEIFER. I make the point of order that those resolutions are not in order at this time. It may be understood that in the discussion of this question of order we are not called upon to go into the merits of the proposition presented. Under what rule it could be in order I am unable to guess. It is a proposition to investigate charges against an officer of the United States. It is not a question of impeachment. That is not presented. It will not make the resolution in order to say that it looks to impeachment, for that does not meet the question of privilege. If articles of impeachment were preferred under the Constitution of the United States, this rule, I have no doubt, would prevail.

The present occupant of the chair has passed upon this question and decided that a proposition to investigate charges against an officer of the United States is not a question of privilege; although it was claimed, I believe, by the gentleman who submitted that proposition at the first session of this Congress that his proposition looked to the question of impeachment. I now desire to call attention to the decision of the Chair on that occasion. Referring to the Journal, in the appendix to the Journal of the last session, page 1789, I find that on the 4th of February, 1884, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] submitted a resolution in many respects similar to this, looking to the investigation of charges that had been preferred by the petition of a gentleman named Webb against the chief-justice of the Territory of New Mexico. It was proposed by the gentleman from Illinois to have the Committee on the Judiciary investigate the charges preferred in the petition that accompanied the resolution, and they were required specifically to investigate and report upon these matters. There was given also to that committee by the terms of the resolutions submitted the right to send for persons and papers and conduct an examination to the close. The gentleman from Iowa, Mr. Kasson, made the point of order that that resolution did not present a question of privilege, and the Journal shows—I have not consulted the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, but the Journal shows that the Speaker sustained the point of order on the ground that the resolution proposed an investigation of certain charges set forth in the memorial and accompanying papers against the said chief-justice and did not specifically propose articles of impeachment. The resolutions now submitted do not specifically propose articles of impeachment; and hence, following the ruling held by the present Speaker, these resolutions must be held not to be in order.

It will be time enough to discuss the questions presented on the merits when we reach that matter in the proper way and at the proper time. I have accomplished all I desire now by submitting the point of order as against these resolutions.

Mr. FOLLETT. In the preparation of these resolutions I adopted a form furnished by the records of the Thirty-ninth Congress, that form being embraced in resolutions or charges preferred by James M. Ashley, as a question of privilege, against Andrew Johnson, then Vice-President and Acting President of the United States, those resolutions or charges being in substantially the same form as the charges here made, being first charges, followed by a resolution of inquiry, the inquiry in that case being directed to the Judiciary Committee as the proper committee, while in this case it is directed to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice as the proper committee. The question as to the committee named in the resolutions as the organ for making the inquiry is not a matter affecting the question now before the Speaker. In the case to which I have referred the resolutions proposed simply that the Judiciary Committee proceed to inquire and report with a view to impeachment; and the object of the resolution now presented is the same. The charges are made specifically, and the resolutions of inquiry are directed to furnishing the House with facts either disproving those charges or corroborative of them, as preliminary to the preferring of articles of impeachment.

Now, it strikes me that this question has been settled by precedent in this House and is no longer open to the point of order made by my colleague [Mr. KEIFER], and I do not desire to discuss any further the precedents on this subject.

Certainly this House has a right in every case to inquire into the conduct of any officer of the United States with a view to impeaching that officer if it has the right to impeach him. And it has that right with reference to every such officer, whether appointive or elective—to inquire into the manner in which he has discharged his official duties, and especially whether the discharge of those duties has been attended with any conduct in violation of law.

The SPEAKER. The present occupant of the chair decided during the last session of Congress that a mere proposition to investigate the conduct of a public officer, without proposing to impeach him, was not a matter of privilege under the rules of the House or under the Constitution of the United States; and the Chair has seen no reason to change that opinion. But the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] is mistaken in his statement that the resolution now offered does not contain a proposition for impeachment. The resolution begins with an impeachment of this officer; and all that follows is a mere specification under the general charge made, together with a direction to a committee to make the investigation usual in such cases. The proceeding corresponds precisely with that adopted in the Twenty-seventh Congress when an attempt was made to impeach the then President, John Tyler, and adopted afterward in the Thirty-ninth Congress, when Mr. Ashley, then a member from Ohio, rose in his place on the floor, made charges against the then President, Andrew Johnson, and asked for an investigation.

In both those cases the question was held by the Speaker to be a matter of privilege.

Mr. REED. Will the Chair permit a suggestion in regard to this matter?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. REED. I understand that the point has not yet been decided.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has intimated that inasmuch as this resolution does propose directly an impeachment of an officer of the United States, it comes within the previous rulings on the subject. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman, however.

Mr. REED. I shall be glad to submit a suggestion or two to the Chair.

I do not understand that either of the precedents which are cited here are like the present case. In neither of the cases which have been referred to as precedents was there any such direction to the committee as is here proposed in regard to their method of examining into the question. I understand it to be conceded on all hands, and very properly, that a declaration of intention to impeach, coupled with a direction to a committee to inquire whether there are sufficient facts existing upon which an impeachment can be founded, is properly a question of privilege. But the point I make with regard to this resolution is that while it contains a declaration of impeachment, it is in substance merely a resolution for the purpose of investigating certain points. It proposes to direct the committee to discover certain facts—not to take in charge the question whether there are facts sufficient to found an impeachment upon—and to report the same to the House.

Now I want to call the attention of the Chair to the very incongruous character of this proposition.

In the first place, under the rules of the House the committee which has jurisdiction of all civil or criminal proceedings is the Judiciary Committee. Consequently if this is a motion looking toward impeachment it must necessarily under our rules go to the Committee on the Judiciary. But if it is an investigation looking to expenditures in the Department of Justice, then it very properly goes to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice. And the statement of those two facts reveals to the Chair and the House the character and nature of this proceeding. From one point of view it pretends to be with reference to impeachment, and in the other to an investigation into expenditures. Now I submit to the Chair that in order that this may be privileged it must be throughout and solely looking to the question of impeachment. The question of investigation must simply be with reference to finding facts upon which to found an impeachment.

Now, under the rules of this House questions of impeachment are within the jurisdiction of the Committee on the Judiciary; and yet this resolution proposes under the guise of privilege to change the rules of this House, and to make a matter which under the rules goes to the Committee on the Judiciary go to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice. Well, now, why is it sent to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice? Because the main purpose and object of the transaction is to investigate expenditures. I submit this resolution as it is now presented is not a privileged question.

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I imagine that the reason why the case of Chief-Justice Axtell, of New Mexico, went to the Committee on the Judiciary was this: that the Committee on the Judiciary had control and jurisdiction of all judicial matters, and the impeachment being that of a judge, the resolutions would naturally go to the Committee on the Judiciary. But in the case of Belknap, if I remember rightly, the preliminary resolution went to the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department. Perhaps I am wrong.

Several MEMBERS. No, you are right.

Mr. COX, of New York. That is my impression, and I find that I am right about it.

But, Mr. Speaker, the point was already decided in the last session in the case of Chief-Justice Axtell. As the Speaker intimated a moment ago it was decided plainly, and in the very language quoted by the Speaker himself, that the point of order was sustained on the ground that the resolution proposed an investigation of certain charges set forth in said memorial and accompanying papers against said Axtell and did not specifically propose articles of impeachment. Let the Clerk read the beginning of this proposition presented by my friend from Ohio.

The Clerk read the first portion of the pending resolutions.

Mr. COX, of New York. It is not necessary to read all of the resolutions, but from what the Clerk has read it will be seen that the pending proposition is clearly an impeachment. It looks forward to it. It prepares the way by investigation, or rather by obtaining the data toward beginning an impeachment in this House.

I was a member of this House and objected to the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] against Judge Axtell at the last session because it was simply a proposition of investigation that did not look to impeachment, and I did not think it fair to begin a case of such magnitude, a case of impeachment against a judge or anybody else, unless there was first an investigation of fact as a foundation for the solemn action of Congress.

It seems to me that the gentleman from Ohio could not have brought the pending case more clearly within the ruling of the Speaker at the last session as well as in accordance with the precedents of prior Congresses.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I will occupy but a little time further on this question. I think with all due respect that whatever may have been decided in reference to this character of proposition it can not be said because the paper presented by the gentleman from Ohio, by the use of the form of expression, to wit, I do impeach so and so, that that brings it within the clause of the Constitution which authorizes the House of Representatives to impeach—that because the gentleman from Ohio who presents these resolutions himself personally proposes to impeach it does not follow in any sense that that is an impeachment on the part of the House. And I submit further that a careful scrutiny of the whole of the papers before you at this time, Mr. Speaker, will show that they do not even propose to require the committee to which they are to be referred to report articles of impeachment. It is only another mode of getting at an investigation, an unauthorized step in the direction of impeachment.

Even if the gentleman from Ohio who presents this proposition should succeed in having it adopted, it is not in any sense an impeachment of this United States marshal by the House of Representatives. The House of Representatives, by the second section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States, is given the sole power of impeachment. It rests nowhere else. If this were a proposition by the House of Representatives to impeach this United States marshal, then it might be said it was something more than a mere charge against a United States marshal. I do not believe because the gentleman in this resolution uses the words, "I do charge Lot Wright with the following things," that therefore that determines the power of impeachment under the Constitution. Suppose the resolution is adopted—it does not impeach anybody. It is only a proposition of a gentleman outside of the House to impeach a man of certain high crimes and misdemeanors. It is therefore purely technical to undertake to allege that this is a proposition on the part of the House to impeach. The resolution indicates to the committee to which it is to be referred that it is to investigate certain charges and specifications recited in the resolution. It is therefore not a proposition to impeach, but a mere proposition, as was the case in that of Chief-Justice Axtell, of New Mexico, to investigate charges and report to the House, which, as the Speaker rightfully decided then, was a mere proposition to investigate charges alleged against a person, and that such a proposition did not bring it within the rule. I think the present case is equally objectionable and upon precisely the same ground. It is not material in what form the proposition is drawn when its clear intent is to violate the rules.

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Speaker, the distinction made by the gentleman from Maine is not well taken. As to what committee shall have the charge of this resolution the House will determine. The only question now is whether it is a matter of privilege, and there is a distinct charge upon which there is a proposition to impeach. That makes a privileged question. The House will take care as to where the investigation shall be made, to what committee shall be referred the particular details. It seems to me at present the only thing for the Chair is to determine whether there is enough to make it privileged and then submit the other questions to the House.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the proceedings in the second session of the Thirty-ninth Congress in relation to the impeachment of President Andrew Johnson.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. JAMES M. ASHLEY, as a question of privilege, submitted the following:

"I do impeach Andrew Johnson, Vice-President and Acting President of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors;

"I charge him with a usurpation of power and violation of law:

"In that he has corruptly used the appointing power,

"In that he has corruptly used the pardoning power;

"In that he has corruptly used the veto power;

"In that he has corruptly disposed of public property of the United States;

"In that he has corruptly interfered in elections, and committed acts which, in contemplation of the Constitution, are high crimes and misdemeanors: Therefore,

"Be it resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and they are hereby, authorized to inquire into the official conduct of Andrew Johnson, Vice-President of the United States, discharging the powers and duties of the office of President of the United States, and to report to this House whether, in their opinion, the said Andrew Johnson, while in said office, has been guilty of acts which were designed or calculated to overthrow, subvert, or corrupt the Government of the United States, or any department or officer thereof; and whether the said Andrew Johnson has been guilty of any act, or has conspired with others to do acts, which, in contemplation of the Constitution, are high crimes or misdemeanors, requiring the interposition of the constitutional power of this House; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers and to administer the customary oath to witnesses."

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, so far as that goes I do not understand that there is to be any objection to this resolution. But the resolution goes further, and the two last sheets of it add to the resolution, which is in form like that just read by the Clerk, a series of instructions which practically turn this into an investigation instead of a committal to a committee for the purpose of impeachment; and that is the point I make in regard to it.

The SPEAKER. It seems to be conceded on all sides that a proposition to impeach a public officer who is impeachable under the Constitution is a privileged matter. In deciding the question of order at the last session of Congress in the case of Judge Axtell, to which reference has been made, the Chair used this language, which he will direct the Clerk to read in the hearing of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

If a member on the floor should prefer articles of impeachment against a public officer, the Chair has no doubt that it would be a privileged matter under the Constitution, because this House possesses the power of impeachment. But this is not a resolution proposing to impeach any one; it simply instructs the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into the truth or falsity of certain charges made against a public officer in a memorial which has been presented. The inquiry may result in an impeachment or it may not; but the doubt which the Chair has arises upon the distinction between a mere proposition to investigate charges against a public officer and a proposition to impeach that officer.

The SPEAKER. It is admitted that the resolution now offered does contain a proposition to impeach a public officer who is impeachable under the Constitution; but it is insisted that it does not present a matter of privilege under the Constitution or rules of the House, because, in the first place, it contains other matter; that is to say, it directs the committee to take certain evidence in the case which it is claimed is not pertinent to the charges made.

It may be, or it may not be, that the resolution does direct the committee to take what the House might afterward decide to be incompetent evidence upon a charge of this character. But that, of course, is not a question for the Chair to determine. It is the province of the House to decide, when the resolution comes before it, how far it shall direct the committee to proceed in the investigation or as to what charges it shall investigate.

Again, it is objected that this inquiry should be made by the Committee on the Judiciary, and not by the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice. Of course, if a proposition to impeach a public officer should be submitted to the Chair for reference, the Chair, under the rules of the House, would send it to the Committee on the Judiciary; but it is always in the power of the House itself to determine what committee shall conduct an investigation or consider and report upon any matter. So it seems to the Chair that under all of the rulings heretofore made this presents a matter of privilege, and the House can determine for itself how far the committee shall proceed in the investigation, what committee shall have charge of it, and what matters shall be investigated.

Mr. FOLLETT. I do not desire, Mr. Speaker, to discuss the merits of this proposition at this time. The charges are made, and the proposition submitted in the resolutions which have been read from the desk is simply a proposition to ascertain the truth or falsity of these charges, and the questions that it is asked of this committee to investigate and report upon are each of them questions reflecting upon not only the conduct of this officer, but upon the fact as to whether or not he acted willfully and purposely in violation of law.

The committee is asked to inquire in the first place the number of deputy marshals who were appointed to serve at an election and the reasons for their appointment. The law is specific that the marshals have no power to act in any case except upon the request of citizens. The resolutions still further ask that the investigation shall ascertain whether or not that request was made; and, if so, by whom, and why the request was made.

Mr. KEIFER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment, as I desire to make a suggestion?

Mr. FOLLETT. Certainly.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not know that the resolutions will be objected to, but my suggestion is only that we would like to have a little time to examine into them, as we heard them read here in some confusion. It may be that there are some important amendments or modifications of them that should be made before they are adopted, and we can perhaps facilitate the matter if an opportunity is allowed us to look at them with a view to suggest such modifications as they may seem to require. I will therefore suggest that they be allowed to go over, say, until to-morrow morning.

Mr. FOLLETT. I prefer, Mr. Speaker, to have them acted upon now. If there were anything in them that the House did not understand then it would present a different question.

Mr. KEIFER. But you are judging for everybody else.

Mr. FOLLETT. I am judging from the resolutions themselves, and from nothing else. In other words, Mr. Speaker, what this committee is asked to investigate is a simple matter embraced within the provisions of an act of Congress. It simply calls upon this committee to investigate the conduct of this officer with reference to the question of whether or not in the performance of what I regard as the highest possible duty of any officer of the Government, to wit, the protection of the ballot—whether or not he acted in pursuance of the law or acted in violation of the law. That, and that only, do I desire to investigate; that, and that only, do I desire that this House shall be informed upon; and that this House ought to and will require from every officer of the Government intrusted with such a duty the strictest compliance with this duty and the laws passed in furtherance of it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not want this proposition encumbered with anything but that simple question—that this officer, in the performance of his duty, acted in pursuance of or in known violation of law. And, as I said, I do not see why every member of this House is not prepared at this moment to have this investigation made. I should be more than delighted to know that that officer had performed the duty conscientiously and legally if this investigation discloses that fact. Gentlemen upon the other side should feel equally delighted to know and to visit the proper punishment upon an officer if it should be disclosed he has not thus acted.

Mr. Speaker, I call the previous question.

Mr. KEIFER. I hope the gentleman from Ohio is not going to insist on making his speech and allowing no reply at all.

Mr. FOLLETT. I will divide the time that is left after the previous question is ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOLLETT] who has the floor is entitled to it for an hour under the rules of the House. He can use the whole of his time himself or yield to other gentlemen.

Mr. KEIFER. I think he should allow reasonable discussion.

Mr. FOLLETT. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. KEIFER. I can hardly say. I thought if this could go over until to-morrow we could have an opportunity to investigate the scope of this proposition.

Mr. FOLLETT. I will give the gentleman from Ohio a half hour to dispose of as he sees proper.

Mr. KEIFER. I should like the gentleman to agree to my suggestion to let the matter lie over till after the reading of the Journal to-morrow.

Mr. FOLLETT. I can not consent to that.

Mr. KEIFER. This is not so terribly pressing and we have no special matter for to-morrow, but we have to-day an important matter that ought to go through immediately.

Mr. FOLLETT. Does the gentleman from Ohio want to discuss the resolution?

Mr. KEIFER. I do, and I want to amend it.

Mr. FOLLETT. I will give the gentleman half an hour.

Mr. KEIFER. I would like to see the resolution in print and think I can help the gentleman from Ohio to amend it. I expect to vote for it, but I think it needs amendment.

Mr. FOLLETT. I renew my motion for the previous question.

Mr. CANNON. A number of us have come in since this matter was brought up and have not heard the resolutions read. It occurs to me the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] is perfectly reasonable that this matter go over till to-morrow. I hope the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOLLETT] will assent to that proposition. There is no disposition to unduly delay or embarrass the gentleman in the adoption of his resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOLLETT] has demanded the previous question.

Mr. FOLLETT. I want to say this: These are charges against an officer of the United States. The investigation that is sought is an investigation into the conduct of that officer with a view of impeaching him, if the investigation shall disclose the fact that the charges made are substantiated. Unless the gentlemen upon the other side of the House want to add to them, there is nothing in this investigation other than that. The resolution provides that the subcommittee shall investigate any matter germane to the subject of this investigation; and if gentlemen upon the other side of the House desire to add to the charges that have here been made, they will have an opportunity to call the attention of the subcommittee to them for that purpose.

I can not, therefore, consent to the postponement of the consideration of these resolutions. But I will renew my proposition to the gentleman and will give him an hour and at the end of that time move the previous question.

A MEMBER. You mean half an hour.

Mr. FOLLETT. No; I mean an hour.

Mr. KEIFER. That is more time than I desire. But, of course, if the gentleman will not agree to what I have suggested we will have to accept his proposition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] has the floor.

Mr. KEIFER. We will necessarily have to say some things without having had time to consider or deliberate upon them. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOLLETT] presenting these propositions that he calls propositions to impeach has doubtless been reflecting and brooding over them a long time and he is himself prepared to act upon them. There may be many others here who are in the same situation that I am, not quite able to vote for these resolutions without knowing all that is intended to be included within the proposed investigation.

I apprehend, Mr. Speaker, that it will be no great risk at prophecy to say that when these resolutions are adopted and when the committee goes to work, when the subcommittee is sent out to the city of Cincinnati or to the southern district of Ohio to commence this investigation, that committee will commence a political investigation from the first and that it will there end in just such an investigation. Feeling that that is all that is going to be accomplished, we were very desirous that there might be considered here by means of the report that would come from that committee the whole situation as it appeared in that great panorama that was exhibited in Cincinnati on the 14th day of October last and the few days prior to that time. I think it would be very important before we are prepared in this House to impeach the United States marshal at Cincinnati that we should know the whole situation surrounding that officer at the time he undertook what I allege to be all that he undertook to do, to wit, to provide that there should be a peaceable election, that all persons of all races properly citizens of the United States might go and cast their ballots. I would like it to appear, if such be the case, that at the very time these deputy marshals were appointed in Cincinnati there were going about the streets of that city officers, claiming at least to be officers of that municipal corporation, seizing men simply because they were colored men and carrying them off and putting them in the station-houses and locking them up by the hundred, keeping them there until the polls closed on the 14th day of October and then turning them out without any charges of any kind against them. I may not be entirely correct, but the newspapers undertake to tell us that there were in one station-house over three hundred colored men at one time against whom there was no charge alleged at all, and that they lay there in that station-house all through election day, being kept there in order that they should not go to the polls and vote.

Now, it ought to be known what was the condition of things surrounding this United States officer who had certain duties cast upon him under the laws of the United States, and I would like this investigation to be broad enough and full enough to bring to us and lay before us all the circumstances that surrounded him. This might help us to determine whether or not he acted wisely and prudently, in the light of the great responsibility which was thrown upon him, when he appointed an unusually large number of special deputy marshals. It might also enable us to tell whether or not this officer acted within the proper scope of his legal power when he directed his special deputy marshals to go to the polls and do their duty resolutely under all circumstances. While I am not going to object in any sense to the investigation here proposed, I would like it to be thorough and complete. It might be well enough for this committee when they go out to Cincinnati, when they are taking this testimony, to find how many persons have been indicted for violating the laws of the United States in the manner which I have indicated—how many persons a grand jury, having as its foreman a distinguished Democrat of Cincinnati, has indicted for seizing men on the street and imprisoning them for no other reason and no other purpose in the world than to prevent them from voting—how many have been convicted after fair trial for this kind of crime. A presentation of such facts might enable us to tell whether or not an honest, able, resolute officer of the United States, clothed with power under the law, acted wisely in appointing a very considerable number of men to go to the polls and see that peace, quiet, and order were preserved there.

Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who believe that no peaceable, quiet citizen of the United States, North or South, is ever injured by having a strong peace power around the ballot-box on election day. Only such persons as go to the polls to create riot and disorder and prevent others from voting peaceably and quietly ever object to a strong power at the polls on election day for the protection of voters. In years gone by I have raised my voice here and elsewhere in favor of such protection to the rights of voters. I have voted in the direction of having a strong power to protect the quiet, peaceable voter everywhere in the United States.

I believe in the power of the United States in all national matters. Gentlemen on the other side of the House have but recently upon the public rostrum boasted of their readiness and willingness to go, with all the power and strength of the United States, into foreign lands and upon foreign seas to protect a citizen of the United States whenever he should be wronged or harmed in any way. I would go as far as he who goes the farthest in that direction. But I also believe in protecting a citizen of the United States under the flag of the United States and within its boundaries. Therefore I believe in an honest, fair, resolute power exhibited, when the law authorizes it, to preserve peace and quiet and order at elections in the United States; and whether violations of law of a character to prevent a peaceable citizen from voting may exist in Ohio, in Mississippi, or in South Carolina, I would apply everywhere the same rule and the same power.

Now, if the gentleman on the other side who has been so kind as to yield to me desires to be heard, I would like to reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me before he takes his seat to ask a question?

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. I have not heard the resolutions read; and I would be glad to know whether they are broad enough to enable and direct this committee to make full investigation touching the Federal election in Cincinnati on the 14th day of last October.

Mr. KEIFER. If I am to answer, Mr. Speaker, I should say that is the very thing they avoid. They undertake to provide for an investigation of a specific, special character, without giving us all the surrounding circumstances and the facts under which the particular officer acted. I have asked for time in order that I might have an opportunity to look more carefully into these resolutions, to see their scope, and to propose amendments which I hope the gentleman offering the resolutions would accept.

Mr. CANNON. If the resolutions as now presented are not broad enough to show the circumstances under which the marshal and his deputies acted—to show the whole machinery in play at the Federal election at that time—then I hope the gentleman from Ohio will take the necessary steps to at least take the sense of the House upon an amendment which shall broaden the scope of inquiry and enable this committee to ascertain and report the exact facts which existed on that day touching the Federal election; otherwise the investigation would be a farce.

Mr. KEIFER. How much time have I left of the hour allotted to me?

The SPEAKER. Forty-seven minutes.

Mr. KEIFER. Then I will reserve that time for the present.

Mr. FOLLETT. Mr. Speaker, the resolutions were intended to be, and I insist are, broad enough to give this officer full opportunity to show his surroundings, to show every condition that contributed in any way whatever to the conduct with which he is charged in the resolutions and in the charges here made.

Now, sir, I am not here to-day nor do I desire to-day to make a statement personally of all that occurred at that election. I prefer to do that after this investigation shall have been had, and when it will no longer be necessary for any gentleman on this floor to defend the position which he occupies by the extreme charges of partisan papers or partisan people. I prefer to let the facts speak and to have the facts before we speak of the conduct of that election and of these officers.

The gentleman has said something with reference to indictments and prosecutions. There have been indictments and prosecutions on one side only. There can be obtained no indictments or prosecutions upon the other side. I propose that the people of this country shall, upon proper investigation, be informed of the actual condition of things.

The gentleman has said that men were arrested and discharged without there being preferred against them any charge of crime. I am not here to-day to speak for those gentlemen. They did not belong to my district; they came from surrounding States, and they were arrested simply because it was known the purpose for which they were there and the reason why they came. So the charges are and so I believe the facts to be, but, as I said, I do not desire to discuss these questions until such time as the testimony shall be brought into this House.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as I said before, there is and can be but one purpose in these resolutions and in these charges. If an officer of the Government has been guilty of what I believe this investigation will show that he was guilty of, if for the purpose of securing a peaceable election, quiet at the polls where there were no armed men, it was necessary to select men who could neither write nor read, known for their brutality and armed with British bull-dog revolvers, to say to them, "You have your weapons; go out and use them"—if that is the method to secure a peaceable, quiet, and orderly election in the United States, then in the name of God let us know it. We have statutes prohibiting the Army of the United States from coming near the polls. Who shall say that a drilled officer—a man who has been accustomed to obey and enforce law—is not a more suitable person, if armies are to be brought to the polls, than men selected, just from the penitentiary, just from the work-house, for their known brutality and criminality, with arms put in their hands and sent to the polls!

Sir, this is not a thing which was done under cover. It was done in broad day. I regret to say that these deputy marshals took possession of our United States court-room, the temple of justice, dedicated to the enforcement and protection of the rights of citizens These arms were placed in their hands in that court-room, coming I know not from whence, but with nine cases of British bull-dog revolvers. The man selected to preside as temporary chairman of the first Chicago convention, but repudiated by the convention itself, was there from morning until after night to give orders to these people to secure a peaceable, quiet, honest, fair election!

Now, sir, I say these charges are made in good faith. I desire if this is not true that the country should know it. In God's name let us wipe out this stain of a charge if made without foundation. If made with good ground, if substantiated by the evidence thus obtained, this House can not hesitate for one moment to say that an officer thus derelict of duty, thus violating the public trust placed in his hands, is no longer fit to be a servant of the United States, or have placed in his hands another opportunity to give us an honest, quiet, peaceable election, such as my friend from Ohio so much desires.

Now I say, Mr. Speaker, this investigation ought to be made in the interest of the public and of good order. We ought to know whether these charges are true or false, the country ought to be advised by what methods peaceable, quiet elections are to be secured, and how they are to be conducted; and if this is the process, then I say let us at once abandon the ballot and submit our necks to the yoke of the men so ready to resort to such extreme measures for the purpose of accomplishing an object.

Mr. COX, of New York. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield to me for a moment?

Mr. FOLLETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Speaker, the House will remember the trouble we had some years ago in relation to the appointment of United States marshals. There was always a doubt as to whether or not the United States Government could interfere with elections. The doubt still remains in the minds of the body of our people. However, the matter has been settled in a Federal way. These officers now regulate elections. I am not sure but that in New York city, at least occasionally, these Federal supervisors and officers may be of some good in determining a just election. But, certainly, whether that question be still open or not, it is of the greatest importance we should have a fair and decent experiment in reference to these Federal officers and their interference in our suffrage. And when the gentleman from Ohio presents a resolution having unity, having but one object, the impeachment of an officer under the Constitution and the law, I believe that any amendment such as suggested by the gentleman from Ohio, to use a lawyer's expression, is bad on demurrer for multifariousness. [Laughter.] It has no business in a matter of impeachment. This is a proposition for impeachment only. The investigation looks only to impeachment. No charges are made aliunde. [Laughter.] The impeachment only is to be considered in the investigation which is to be made, and therefore when the gentleman from Ohio writes out an amendment to this proposition he goes outside of the object, and I am not sure but it is subject to a point of order. It is about the last session my friend from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] will have to make these points of order. [Laughter.]

Mr. KEIFER. Oh, no.

Mr. COX, of New York. But it is not all of life to live, nor all of death to die. [Laughter.] These gentlemen on the other side should understand it is magnanimity on our part to give them an opportunity to vindicate themselves in the recent elections. [Great laughter and applause.] Let them show, if they can, in this investigation that their marshals have acted honorably, and how much more glorious and more beautiful and more lovely is our victory when they show they have acted decently and we have got a triumph. I thank the gentleman from Ohio for giving me this opportunity. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. KEIFER. I did not occupy the whole of my time, and now wish to yield a portion of it to my colleague [Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR], who desires a portion of my time.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Ohio if he did not consent that this resolution should be so amended as to meet the demands of other gentlemen from Ohio, that this investigation should be wide enough to cover all the circumstances under which the marshal acted.

Mr. FOLLETT. I did not hear my colleague's question.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Did I not understand you to say that you would consent to an amendment of the resolutions which would widen their scope and enlarge the field of investigation if the resolution is not now wide enough for that purpose?

Mr. FOLLETT. I have not consented to any amendment at all to the resolutions, nor do I propose to, nor had I intended to be understood as consenting to it.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Then I understand the gentleman from Ohio objects; that he objects to having this investigation made wide enough to show the circumstances under which the marshal of the southern district of Ohio acted.

Mr. FOLLETT. If the gentleman will permit me I will tell him why.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I would be glad to have the gentleman do so.

Mr. FOLLETT. I wish to state one fact, that the law does not permit him to go except upon the application of citizens. The resolutions especially point to the fact that he is to be inquired of as to whether or not this request was made by citizens and the reasons given therefor. It covers everything that under the law could be embraced by your amendment.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I presume that the marshal would be required to act not solely in response to a request made by one, two, or three citizens. I presume the number of citizens making the request would not control his conduct entirely. It seems to me that the circumstances surrounding the marshal, the circumstances then existing in that city, the fact that there were hundreds of colored men fleeing from the city, fleeing from the State, escaping for their lives, men who were threatened in various ways, threatened with menace and violence, threatened with loss of employment, intimidated with the threat that their children would have to go hungry and naked, that their property would be taken and destroyed—I say that such circumstances would have and ought to have weight in influencing the action of the marshal. If it be shown that there were hundreds of colored men in the city of Cincinnati who had taken refuge in cellars and were there trembling with fear, who did not dare to go out in the open day, did not dare to go upon the streets because their lives would be in danger—if this condition of terrorism be true, as I understand it to have been, as I have been informed was the fact by people who live in that city and who have been in business there for more than forty years, then I want these facts showing the condition of things in that city and the situation of the colored people to appear in whatever testimony may be brought out in reference to this matter.

What is the object of this investigation? Is it to show all the facts, or is it to show a part and suppress a part? It seems to me that its scope should be wide enough to show all the facts and circumstances under which the marshal acted. There were circumstances existing there, organized circumstances too, the very object of which was to prevent hundreds of colored men from voting at the October election. We have no fear, sir, in regard to this investigation, but we ask that it shall go far enough to show the necessity and the wisdom of the marshal's action. The investigation should not be confined to specified points only, but should go far enough to put the House in possession of the information on which the marshal then acted, and which may or may not, as the facts will show, justify the steps taken by him to secure a fair election. Our only desire is to show from the testimony of the people, if it be true, that this officer acted from a strict sense of duty and from an honest desire to give to the people of our State a fair, full, and honest ballot. The character of the marshal is involved in this investigation, and if it be gone into let it be gone into far enough to develop all of the facts in reference to it.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, it has been urged that an amendment should be admitted to this resolution to enlarge the scope of the investigation, to inquire into the action of a United States officer, as well as of other officers and the people of Cincinnati in this election. I submit that it would not be germane to the object of the resolution proposed by the gentleman from Ohio. It would simply enlarge the scope of the investigation, thereby embracing a different subject-matter from impeachment, which is the prime object of the resolution presented, and would simply go into a general political examination and inquiry—a subject entirely different from the precise object had in this resolution. I repeat, sir, the object of such an amendment would be to go into a general political investigation, to draw out facts probably without any necessary bearing upon the question submitted by the resolution.

Any fact that would serve as a defense for a person impeached can be brought out under the scope of the investigation as proposed. Every lawyer on this floor will understand that any fact which may be necessary to the defense can be brought out without any such amendment as is proposed, and consequently the only effect of the amendment would be, as I have said, to open up a political investigation, which perhaps would not be concluded within the next year. I submit, therefore, that it is not the proper way to embarrass this suggestion, which I take it for granted is made in good faith, for the impeachment of a public officer for a manifest violation of law, if the charges alleged be true.

Mr. KEIFER. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, it affords me very great pleasure to see gentlemen upon the other side of this House apparently so anxious and so earnest to provide for a free election in one section of our country, as well as a fair count of the ballots. I only regret, sir, that the investigation proposed stops at the Ohio River. If it would only pass beyond the confines of that stream, if the proposed investigating committee could wend their way down the Mississippi and in a general way through the South, spending as they go a few days in Mississippi, a few more in the State of Louisiana, a few in the State of Alabama, a few in the State of South Carolina, and a few more in some of the other Southern States where no regard is paid to how a ballot is cast or how counted so that it is counted for the Democrats, I must confess I would be supremely delighted.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. May I interrupt the gentleman from Pennsylvania for a moment?

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I only wish to say to the gentleman that we do propose an investigation into one of these Southern States, and I have a resolution to that effect ready now, to which I hope there will be no objection from that side of the House when it is presented.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I am glad to hear it.

It has been my duty in the last three years to investigate matters connected with elections in the Southern States; and while I believe in recent years they have measurably ceased to destroy life, while the shotgun has been laid temporarily aside, they still manage in some way, notwithstanding majorities against them, to count the representatives of the Democracy in without regard to the manner in which the ballots were cast.

In the first session of this Congress a Democratic election committee, in the investigation of a contested-election case from the State of Alabama, found the result as certified to the House so farcical and fraudulent, that the subcommittee having the case in charge, with but a single exception, decided to displace the holder of the certificate occupying a seat on this floor and returned here by a majority running into the thousands, and when the case came before the full committee, and after full investigation, there was but one dissenting voice against seating the contestant, although the committee stood nine Democrats and six Republicans.

Mr. MCMILLIN. That shows that we are fair.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I am glad that you propose an investigation, and only hope that its scope will be further extended. I hope the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOLLETT] will not take umbrage at the amendment proposed to be offered by his colleague [Mr. KEIFER], but will permit the investigation to be made broad and wide, so that all these matters can be laid before the country by a committee appointed by the Chair, and that the elections held in many of the Southern States, which are a farce and a fraud on popular suffrage, may be laid bare.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, replying to the very proper suggestion made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], and also to the suggestion made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX], that any amendment to the proposed resolutions would be out of order, I have to state that those gentlemen were exceedingly astute and apparently anxious to get in an objection before the form of an amendment to be submitted was known to them, doubtless for fear that such objection would not be good afterward.

Now I will try to make myself clear as to this matter. I take it that if a United States marshal were to undertake, wherever he had the legal power, to appoint a very large number of special deputy marshals for service at elections where there was no shadow of charge of any sort of irregularity or violation of law or any disorder, that that officer might be assailed for appointing unnecessary officers and for appointing men at an unnecessary expense to the Government and for doing that which would be exceedingly improper in the light of good conduct. But, on the other hand, I apprehend that if a United States marshal was to find that at the several polling places or a large number of them within his jurisdiction there was assembled armed men, bad men, men who had in years gone by been in the habit of seizing the ballot-boxes, taking possession by violence of the boxes, striking down or maltreating the officers of election simply because they tried to protect the ballot-boxes from violence, and assaulting citizens simply because they tried to get access to the polls to cast their ballots—I say if such an officer was apprised and advised by everything around him that the condition of things was such as I have described, it would justify him in the appointment of a larger number of persons to perform that duty.

And what I desire is that this resolution may be so broadened and enlarged that we may be told, when the report comes in here, the circumstances under which these officers were selected and appointed.

The gentleman from Ohio presenting these resolutions in his remarks seems to object to the fact that stalwart, strong, resolute men were appointed to go to the polls. He rather thinks that slender-fingered clerks, or ministers of the Gospel, or professors in colleges ought to have been sent into the seventh ward and some other localities, there to compete with the worst style of plug-uglies that ever gathered into bodies on the face of the earth. That is one of the gentleman's troubles. He thinks the marshal ought to be impeached by the House of Representatives and found guilty by the Senate of the United States because he exercised his judgment in selecting men who were capable of competing physically and otherwise with the character of men they were to meet.

I propose at the proper place, Mr. Speaker, to submit an amendment in some such language as this, to be added to the resolutions:

And the said committee are authorized to fully investigate all the circumstances attending the election of members of the House of Representatives at the recent October election in the first and second districts of Ohio at which said United States marshal appointed deputy marshals.

This does not propose to go into any political matter at all, but to see what state of things existed there at the time these deputy marshals were chosen and appointed. I would like to know what kind of organizations had prepared themselves to seize the polls, and if you please under whose directorship. I would like to know whether the men gathered there were only confined to citizens of Cincinnati, or whether they included some citizens of the State of Kentucky and of the State of Indiana. Ohio was having an election at that time alone, Kentucky and Indiana assisting a little on the outside and sometimes coming within. We would like to know how much of this work was going on that had to be counteracted by this United States marshal. If gentlemen believe, if anybody believes, that the action of these special deputy marshals had anything to do with preventing men from voting or with making them cast votes in a direction that they would not otherwise have cast them, let them test that by a comparison of the vote on the 14th of October last with the vote on the 4th of November. That will show that the election in October was not one to prevent men from voting, but it was held under such auspices as allowed a great many men to vote who could not otherwise have voted. There were some that could not vote because they were in prison, presumably because they were colored and Republicans.

I was sorry to hear the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOLLETT] say that the indictments were all on one side. By implication he meant to charge that the United States court, the United States officers, the law officers of that court, and the grand jury charged with the duty of investigating these cases were engaged in simply finding indictments against one side. I think the gentleman will take pains to deny that he wanted to go that far. I say that a majority, as I am informed, of the grand jury—and it was a good one—that found these indictments were not men of the same political party as I belong to; and the foreman of the grand jury that found these indictments, which the gentleman chooses to call one-sided indictments, was a distinguished Democrat. It is true it hit a certain class of politicians that perhaps the gentleman would call one-sided—fellows all on one side.

The little pleasantry, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from New York undertook to display here at the expense of my colleague from the Cincinnati district and myself needs no reply from me. When the gentleman from New York could no longer in Ohio get a seat in the Congress of the United States he, wisely perhaps, pulled up stakes and went where he could find some congenial constituents to elect him to Congress. Some of us will not follow that example. We will stay where we were born, and not abandon our friends there. The gentleman was a very distinguished Representative when he represented me in the House of Representatives many years ago, and I am thankful to him for his many kindnesses; and what I have said now is certainly said purely in pleasantry.

Now I think, unless some gentleman on this side desires to be heard, I will occupy no more time. How much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has twenty-seven minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. KEIFER. I will reserve the time which remains to me, but am not sure that we will occupy it.

Mr. FOLLETT. I will say to the gentleman that I should prefer his occupying the whole of his time now. I want the right to close discussion.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not know that I will occupy any more time. Some gentlemen, however, on this side may still desire to be heard. Before the previous question is ordered I ask the gentleman from Ohio to allow me formally to present this amendment.

Mr. FOLLETT. I shall object to the offering of any amendment, and shall at the close of my remarks demand the previous question.

Mr. KEIFER. Will the gentleman allow the amendment to be read for information in my time?

Mr. FOLLETT. I have no objection to that.

Mr. KEIFER. I understand it is not in order to offer the amendment during the discussion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOLLETT] to demand the previous question. Thereupon he was appealed to to admit amendments and postpone the further consideration of the resolution. He declined to admit the amendments, but agreed there should be one hour more for debate. The Chair understands that to be the situation.

Mr. KEIFER. I understand that to be the effect of it. I desire to have my amendment read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the said committee are authorized to fully investigate all the circumstances attending the election of members of the House of Representatives at the recent October election in the first and second districts of Ohio at which said United States marshal appointed deputy marshals.

Mr. HISCOCK. If the gentleman from Ohio will allow me a moment——

Mr. FOLLETT. The other gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] has not yet consumed all his time.

Mr. KEIFER. I will yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HISCOCK. I understood the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] to make the point against the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Ohio that the United States marshal could enter into his defense fully under these resolutions, and that any facts tending in that direction would be proper evidence in the way of rebuttal. Do I state the gentleman's position correctly?

Mr. REAGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HISCOCK. Now, as I heard these resolutions read, it seemed to me they were presented here in the form of interrogatories, limiting the investigation to particular questions, particular facts to be reported, and excluding the opportunity on the part of the marshal to enter into any rebuttal or give any excuse for his action. It appears to me that by the resolutions the committee is directed to report certain facts and is limited to a report of those facts, the questions being sent to them, as I said a moment ago, in the form of interrogatories. Now, I ask whether the gentleman who submits the resolutions would not be willing to accept a proposition which I desire to offer and will read:

Resolved, That said committee further investigate and report if there were any facts or circumstances or action on the part of any State, county, or municipal authorities that justified the action of said marshal or may excuse his action.

It seems to me there is involved in this matter of impeachment the question of the intent of the marshal, whether he acted criminally or not, whether he acted in good faith or not; and in view of the fact that the questions are put so pointedly and distinctly to guide the investigation of the committee, I suggest whether there ought not to be an amendment allowing the marshal opportunity to present his defense directly—authorizing him to introduce his defense, if he has any, but limiting it to a justification of the acts on his part. I would not go so far as is suggested in the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER], but would simply authorize the marshal to introduce such evidence as he may have in the way of rebuttal, or justification, or apology, or excuse, if you please, to repel the supposition of any criminal intent on his part. It seems to me that in justice, in fairness, something of this kind ought to be incorporated in these resolutions, since they are so specific in limiting the investigation to the ascertainment of particular facts.

I will send to the Clerk's desk the amendment I have suggested. All I desire in this case is to allow this officer an opportunity to give to the House any excuse he may have, if he relies upon an excuse; or apology, if he depends upon an apology; or defense, if he claims that there is a sufficient defense. I would not limit this investigation to simply ascertaining and reporting certain affirmative facts, which it seems to me is the intention of the resolution which has been read.

The SPEAKER. The proposition sent to the desk by the gentleman from New York will be read for the information of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That said committee further investigate and report if there were any facts or circumstances or action on the part of State, county, or municipal authorities that justified the action of said marshal or may excuse his action.

Mr. HISCOCK. I will change the word "excuse" to "explain."

Mr. REAGAN. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the proposition of the gentleman from New York, as just read, instead of limiting the scope of investigation suggested by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr KEIFER] would in fact very much enlarge it. The proposition just read proposes that the committee shall enter into an investigation of the conduct of State and municipal authorities as a defense for an officer of the United States charged with the violation of law.

Now, no lawyer can believe that any such thing would be admissible by way of defense. If the State authorities of Ohio violated the law, if the municipal authorities of Cincinnati violated the law, such facts would furnish no excuse, no justification, no palliation for a violation of the law by a marshal charged with the official duties under the Government of the United States. I wish to suggest upon this point that if wrong has been done by State or municipal authority, the great State of Ohio has all the machinery, legislative, judicial, and executive, to secure the proper investigation of the conduct of its own officers and its own citizens relating to elections and to punish offenders. This can be appropriately done by the tribunals of the State, and no doubt will be done if the facts require such action.

But the question recurs—here is a proposition to impeach an officer of the United States for a violation of the law. Either of the amendments proposed would enlarge the scope of the investigation so as to bring in everything that occurred in connection with the election, thus indefinitely prolonging the investigation of the committee and delaying a report to the House as to whether this officer ought to be impeached or not.

I do not wish to be understood as throwing any impediment in the way of full and fair investigation or as doing anything which would deprive this officer of any defense which he has a right to make. No one will contend that he will not have such opportunity under the resolution as proposed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOLLETT], which is a little broader than suggested by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], who has said that it proposes simply to require an answer to certain questions. It does more than that. It requires an answer on the part of the officer as to his reasons for doing the acts he is charged with having done. Not only are certain questions to be answered, but under the resolution he can show, as I understand, the motives of his conduct. All that may be necessary in the way of his defense will be let in. I think we should make a mistake if we enlarged the scope of the resolution so as to turn this into a general political investigation, thereby prolonging the inquiry so as to defeat a proper determination of the question submitted.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Speaker, if I believed that the committee when appointed would have the power which the gentleman from Texas seems to think they will have I certainly would not propose any amendment. But, sir, suppose this state of facts existed in Cincinnati, that there was an armed body of men who proposed to take possession of the polls and only to allow one class of men to vote, or rather men belonging to one party. That might afford an excuse to the marshal for making a large number of appointments of deputies and arming them for the protection of the people there in the exercise of their right of suffrage. Will the gentleman from Texas say that under these resolutions that state of facts can be proved?

Mr. REAGAN. I suggest to the gentleman from New York that if it were proved it would not be a defense to these charges, and therefore it would be improper.

Mr. HISCOCK. Then I understand the gentleman from Texas to say this: That if the United States marshal understood there was an organization and a purpose and design on the part of certain persons to defeat a fair election of Representatives in Congress the marshal would not be authorized to appoint deputies for the purpose of preventing such unlawful proceeding and protecting the rights of suffrage.

Mr. REAGAN. You certainly understand me as saying that he can do nothing unless in conformity and compliance with law, which he must take as his guide. The marshal can not make himself a dictator. He can not be judge of the circumstances when he has arbitrary and unlawful authority to appoint deputy marshals and to arm them with deadly weapons.

Mr. HISCOCK. But suppose he appointed no more than he was technically authorized to appoint, and yet he exercised his discretion improperly, and you could show that he intended to so exercise it, it might afford cause for impeachment. The point I am aiming at is this: That if there was any unlawful combination there to prevent a free and fair election, why not let us go one step beyond proving that fact, and so broaden these resolutions that we will be able to prove the fact of that unlawful combination for an unlawful purpose? The United States marshal is presumably innocent of any unlawful intent. The municipal officers, the State officers, the county officers are presumably innocent of any unlawful intent. But suppose there was a combination of county officers to prevent the free exercise by the electors of their privilege, that would be justification on the part of the marshal to exercise the limit of his discretion as to the appointment and arming of deputy marshals for the protection of the people in the exercise of their just rights.

What I object to on the part of these resolutions is, as I stated awhile ago, to the limitation to answers to certain interrogatories. We are to be limited to the answers made to these interrogatories and the marshal is precluded under the very language of these resolutions from offering any evidence which will tend to justify his action. Now, if the sheriff of Hamilton County, in the State of Ohio, had appointed deputy sheriffs in needless number and armed them to take possession of the polls, it might then have been the duty of the United States marshal to do what he did, but he can not under these resolutions be allowed to prove that fact. He is entitled to have that fact before the House before we pass on any articles of impeachment. Yet, sir, these resolutions have been prepared with the greatest care for the purpose of excluding what it seems to me to be the right on the part of the United States marshal to introduce, whatever evidence he may have in justification of his action.

I am in favor of the broadest inquiry, of the widest investigation, on this question, but let us proceed in such a way that if the marshal has any justification, if he has any facts, provided the charges in the resolutions are true so far as they are indicated by these interrogatories—if he has a defense, then he should not be denied the opportunity of introducing testimony to show just exactly what that defense is.

Mr. KEIFER rose.

Mr. FOLLETT. I understand the gentleman from Ohio is entitled to ten minutes longer of his time.

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly, but I do not propose to use it now.

Mr. FOLLETT. It is my intention when I conclude what I have to say to call the previous question.

Mr. KEIFER. You will keep your agreement?

Mr. FOLLETT. Certainly, but I have the right to close the debate. If the gentleman wishes to occupy his ten minutes he must take it now. When I conclude what I have to say I shall move the previous question and close the debate.

Mr. KEIFER. I did not wish to speak at this time.

Mr. FOLLETT. If the gentleman wishes to occupy any more time he must do it now.

Mr. KEIFER. I will then take the floor and yield three minutes to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. REED Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to occupy but a few moments. This discussion has led to what I endeavored to suggest to the Speaker on the point of order, and that is, under pretense of a resolution for impeachment a limited investigation is about to be ordered by the House. And I submit upon the face of it it is necessarily an unjust and one-sided investigation.

In the first place it is instigated by a gentleman who feels personally aggrieved by the situation as he found it upon the counting of the votes on election day. And then, instead of bringing here an impeachment or a foundation for impeachment coupled with a direction to the Committee on the Judiciary to consider the whole question of whether an impeachment ought to be ordered for malfeasance in office, the resolution has been seduously curtailed from the form which has been customary in such cases, from a resolution which allowed the whole matter to be gone into, into a resolution which confines the committee, as has been pointed out by the gentleman from New York, to particular points upon which information or misinformation is desired.

Now I submit to the House that such a resolution is not adequate to the subject. This proposes to impeach an officer of the United States for malfeasance in office, and yet at the same time the resolution of investigation on that subject is not broad enough and is not framed to be made broad enough to give a fair foundation, because we owe it as a House of Representatives to an officer against whom charges are made, against whom impeachment proceedings are about to be initiated, that the investigation shall be of such a character that the ground shall be sufficient to justify an impeachment on our part; and it seems to me that under the resolution as offered the only result would be an investigation merely for political purposes and not one which will lead to punishment for violation of law. It seems to me that the rules of the House have not been carried out in framing such a matter to be presented to the House under the guise of an attempt at impeachment.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. I ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOLLETT] to yield to me long enough to ask for the reading of the second resolution, because it will show, as I think, a sufficient answer to all the objections stated by my colleague [Mr. HISCOCK].

The second resolution was again read by the Clerk.

Mr. HISCOCK. I do not see why this particular resolution covers the case to which I have referred at all; and it seems to me, if this investigation is to be entered into, that in a spirit of fairness some proposition should be formulated so clear and explicit that there could be no question of its allowing the United States marshal to give his reasons for his action.

If he appointed an undue number of deputies, and if he armed them, if such be facts, make the investigation broad enough not only to cover the facts, but to enable him to give his reasons and excuses for his own justification.

I will say also to my friend from Ohio that no party advantage will be gained by this investigation if it is to be a one-sided matter.

Mr. FOLLETT. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BARKSDALE].

Mr. BARKSDALE. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to participate in the discussion of this resolution, nor should I have submitted a single remark but for certain language of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MILLER]. He asks that the scope of the proposed investigation be enlarged so as to embrace the States south of the Ohio River, and couples his proposition with sweeping and unfounded charges in reference to the conduct of elections in those States, naming among them the State of Mississippi, which I have the honor to represent in part upon this floor.

Mr. Speaker, such a proposition, of course, is not germane to the resolution before the House looking to the impeachment of a United States officer in Ohio for malfeasance. But I wish to say, and I can speak for the Representatives, I am sure, of all the States to which he refers—the Southern States; I know I can speak for my own State—that if it be proposed in good faith that this House shall within the limits of its constitutional functions institute such an investigation as will lead to a revelation of all the facts and to a verification or rebuttal of the unfounded charges he makes concerning the mode of conducting elections in those States, they will not throw an obstacle in the way, but on the contrary they will invite the fullest and freest inquiry.

Mr. FOLLETT. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE].

Mr. CONVERSE. Mr. Speaker, I think the country to-morrow morning will read with some surprise of the course pursued by the gentlemen upon the other side on this proposition to impeach an officer of the United States charged with official misconduct and crime. It is the first time in the history of the country when a political party has resorted to all sorts of machinery and technical objection to avoid an investigation of a public officer whom it is proposed to impeach for high crimes and misdemeanors. Gentlemen have even undertaken to arraign a sovereign State and propose to inquire whether that State has not been derelict in its duty, or whether such State attempted to interfere in some way with the election of members of Congress to prevent a fair and honest election.

Mr. KEIFER. Will you allow me to ask to what State you refer?

Mr. CONVERSE. I understand the gentleman himself to have stated that at the election in the city of Cincinnati the laws of the State of Ohio had been overridden, the rights of sovereign citizens had been invaded, that they were not permitted to vote their sentiments, and that it was necessary for this officer, the marshal, to arm the deputies that he sent to the polls with revolvers and bludgeons so as to preserve the purity of the election.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman has stated substantially what I did say, but he will perceive that I have said nothing against the State, but only that if there was violence there or threats of violence this officer acted only in pursuance of his duty in protecting the people against it.

Mr. CONVERSE. Not only does the gentleman charge this upon his State, but the statement made by my colleague from Ohio [Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR], who also addressed the House upon this question, was one involving a more serious charge against his native State; and the two gentlemen sat there in their seats and heard without protest the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] rise in his place and solemnly propose to investigate their State to see whether she as a State had undertaken to interfere with the purity of elections.

The gentleman's proposition was a general proposition to investigate and see whether the State of Ohio had not violated her duty and therefore justified the marshals and their deputies to take charge of the polls and override the constituted authorities of the State and the will of the people.

Mr. KEIFER. Oh, no. I said nothing against the State, only against a few individuals.

Mr. CONVERSE. The gentleman may disclaim his assertion; but the fact is, and nobody knows it better than my two colleagues to whom I have referred, that there never was a time in the State of Ohio when the humblest man, black or white, if he was legally entitled to vote, might not go to the polls in perfect safety and deposit his ballot on any election day, and his vote would be honestly counted. It is not true that the laws of my State have ever been overridden at elections and on election day, except as it has been done by the marshals of the United States and their deputies. It is only the men who wore the livery of the United States that came to our elections and undertook to interfere with them. The laws of our State, as these gentlemen well know, severely punish every infraction of the election laws, and our State officers rigidly enforce them. Every attempt at interference with the citizen who proposes to cast his vote and is entitled to vote is punished with great severity by our law. The penitentiary stares the man in the face, whether he be election officer or bystander, who undertakes to interfere wrongfully with our elections, and gentlemen know it very well.

The claim that the State of Ohio had designs against the purity and integrity of the ballot-box at the last October election, or that the county or city authorities had, or that the election officers or deputy sheriffs had, or that any other officers of the State had, is a mere pretense. The elections in Ohio when left under the control of State authority have always been fair and honest, and peace and good order preserved at the polls. But when men came to our polls clothed in the livery of the United States and armed with revolvers and bludgeons, then our citizens retired from the conflict and allowed them to take charge.

I simply rose for the purpose of repudiating this slander upon my State and upon her laws, expressed by my colleagues and implied in the proposition of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK]. Gentlemen know that, if there was any combination of deputy sheriffs or anybody else to interfere with any election precinct or with the ballot-box, all they had to do was to make that fact known to some magistrate, when all persons implicated would be placed under arrest and under bonds, and the entire power of the county would be at his command to preserve order and decorum and the purity of the ballot-box, and the entire strength of the State, if needed, was at the command of the justice of the peace and of the sheriff of the county to enforce order at that single poll. The military of the State might be called out for any such purpose. It was not necessary to make the complaint ten days beforehand to a United States marshal in order to get protection. The remedy under State authority was simple, inexpensive, and efficient.

The fact is that the deputy marshals in Ohio have been used only as an electioneering machine to assist the Republican party to carry the elections. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That is all there is of it. They have been able to appoint this unusual number and pay them from $30 to $50 apiece for putting in several days helping the Republican party organize preceding the election and for voting and controlling the polls by force and fraud on election day. The process was simply one of procuring money out of the Treasury to assist the Republican party to carry the elections. That is all there has been of it except the murder of some and the wounding of others to accomplish that wicked purpose.

Mr. BRUMM. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him one question?

Mr. CONVERSE. Yes; if I have a moment remaining.

Mr. BRUMM. If the gentleman is so sure that the State of Ohio is so immaculate and pure, why not challenge investigation instead of objecting——

Mr. CONVERSE. The proposition is simply a slander upon my State——

Mr. BRUMM. Allow me to finish my question. I ask why, then, object to an amendment that will put the immaculacy of your State to the test?

Mr. CONVERSE. I would scorn to stand here without one word of protest and see my State arraigned by a petty marshal. [Derisive laughter on the Republican side.] I do not propose for one, as a Representative of my State, to do it. We have never called upon either the civil or military arm of the Government of the United States to protect either person or property in my State. We have power enough of our own, either civil or military, to preserve order and enforce the laws, and the independent, self-respecting spirit of our people will do it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HISCOCK. If the gentleman will allow me to make a single suggestion, I desire to say the form of my resolution was this: If there was any action on the part of any State, county, or city authorities that justified his action. I made no insinuation against the State of Ohio. I have the highest respect for that State. But if all of the authorities of the county of Hamilton or the city of Cincinnati were free from blame why not let them vindicate themselves, or if they were guilty of irregularities or an attempt to influence the election improperly why not permit that to be proven?

Mr. FOLLETT. I propose to reply to that position of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK]. The marshal of the United States under the law can appoint deputies to serve at the polls only in pursuance of the law. I have the statute before me, and it is exactly that to which the second of these resolutions is directed:

Whenever an election at which Representatives or Delegates in Congress are to be chosen is held in any city or town of 20,000 inhabitants or upwards the marshal for the district in which the city or town is situated shall—on the application in writing of at least two citizens residing in such city or town, appoint special deputy marshals, &c.

He has no power to appoint them except when the request is made in writing by at least two citizens. And what more, Mr. Speaker?

No person shall be appointed a supervisor of election or deputy marshal under the preceding section who is not at the time of his appointment a qualified voter of the city, town, or precinct.

Now, what are the facts? These gentlemen, some of them from Ohio, have said that the appointment of these deputy marshals was made necessary in consequence of the fact that in Cincinnati negroes were prevented from voting. I say the charge is without foundation. The negroes from Kentucky and from Virginia brought in there upon freight cars, locked into the box-cars like cattle, taken to the town, kept for days before the election, and there for the purpose of voting, were the only ones with whom there was any attempt to interfere on the part of any officers, and those men, sir, were decorated with the badges of deputy marshals.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Why not have that investigated?

Mr. FOLLETT. That is exactly, with other conduct of the marshal, what these resolutions provide to investigate.

Now, Mr. Speaker, before this election was held this marshal was waited upon by citizens of that State, with the request that he should disclose what his intentions were for the election day and that he should co-operate with the State officers for the purpose of securing a fair and honest election. He said, in his immaculate dignity, as an officer of the United States, that if the mayor of our city and the other persons whose duty it was to see that there was a fair election saw fit to wait upon him his majesty would be at his office at certain hours in the day. One of these citizens, the president of one of our leading railroads, one of the most prominent citizens of Cincinnati, replied to him in strong and vigorous language: "Were I the mayor of Cincinnati I would see you in a hot place before I did so. Your little dignity assuming to control the affairs of the State of Ohio! And your office greater than that of the mayor of Cincinnati!"

Now, Mr. Speaker, there were there on that day, decorated with marshal's badges, men professing and glorying in the cognomen of the "Terror of Black Hills"—men just out of the penitentiary from the State of Kentucky—men who were seen and known to be residents of other States. It has been said here that the United States court is prosecuting one side only. That is true. The marshal of the United States knowingly brought persons from outside the State and decorated them with marshal's badges; but no Government officer prefers a charge against him or brings complaint before a grand jury. But, sir, here is a law of the United States. The majesty of that law is invoked; and any poor fellow who attempted to clear the road to the ballot-box, that he might get there and deposit his vote, if he interfered with one of these deputy marshals standing between him and the ballot-box, is immediately arrested, brought before the United States court, and punished in accordance with that law for interfering with the United States deputy marshals.

Now, I have very little care for what the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] sees fit to say about myself or my disappointment at the count upon the night of the election. I say to the gentleman that so far as the honest voters of my district are concerned, I had many more votes than I had two years ago when I was chosen to the seat I am now occupying—very nearly 2,000 more. But, sir, when appliances such as this investigation will disclose are brought into action, when Government officers from Kentucky, postmasters and revenue collectors, are brought into my town decorated with deputy marshal's badges and turned loose to vote from early in the morning till late at night, thank God I was not elected by such votes and I would not wish to be. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Gentlemen on the other side say that we want to suppress investigation. On the contrary, these resolutions provide for the widest possible scope in this investigation. So far as the marshal is concerned, God knows I would not prevent him from making any excuse, if excuse he has, for the conduct which disgraced the city of Cincinnati and the election upon the 14th of last October. But, sir, when an officer of the United States puts himself into the hands and under the control of that distinguished citizen of New York John I. Davenport (my friend from New York knows who he is), and such distinguished citizens as Powell Clayton, of Arkansas, who was there the whole day giving instructions; such distinguished citizens as Mr. Filley, whose character is known to the gentleman from Missouri; such distinguished citizens as many who congregate about this Capitol during the sessions of Congress—such men as McElfresh; such distinguished citizens as one who, I blush to say, has been an officer of the United States, a man who has presided over the Pension Department of this Government, the chief detective of that department, who for two weeks was there setting up the job to do exactly what was done, to perpetrate a fraud upon the people, to make that fraud possible and successful—when such men as these control and govern an officer of the United States for the purpose of accomplishing such results, when by such means as these, I say to the gentleman from Maine, I am counted out of a seat in Congress, it is not my loss that is to be considered—for that I care not—it is the country's threatened destruction, the stab at liberty which you have given by that act. [Derisive cries on the Republican side.] Oh, those gentlemen begin already to groan. Thank God, their time has come; their eyes are beginning to close in death. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

I have said all I desire to say on this occasion, and I now demand the previous question upon the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. KEIFER. Will not the gentleman allow me to offer my amendment? Will he not consent to include that in his motion?

Mr. FOLLETT. I move the previous question upon the adoption of the resolutions.

Mr. KEIFER. Will not the gentleman allow my amendment to be incorporated?

Mr. FOLLETT. Not at all. I have said so several times. My language is plain.

Mr. KEIFER. Then I want it distinctly understood that the gentleman does not desire a full investigation, one that will cover the whole case. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The question is upon ordering the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was ordered, and under the operation thereof the resolution of Mr. FOLLETT was adopted.

Mr. FOLLETT moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELECTION IN RICHMOND, VA.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I ask unanimous consent to offer for present consideration the resolution which I send to the desk. I hope nobody on the other side will object to it.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the United States marshal for the eastern district of Virginia and his deputies are alleged to have appointed a large number of general and special deputy marshals to serve at the several voting precincts in the city of Richmond, in the State of Virginia, at an election for electors of President and Vice-President of the United States and for member of Congress, held in said city on the 4th day of November, 1884, assuming to act in that regard in pursuance of an act of Congress of the United States; and

Whereas it is further alleged that a number of the deputy marshals so appointed were men of known vicious and brutal habits and wholly unfit to be placed in positions of responsibility and to be clothed with the authority of the Government; and

Whereas it is further alleged that the said marshal of the United States for the district aforesaid and his deputies, aided, assisted, and abetted by the United States district attorney for said eastern district of Virginia, did use and employ the powers assumed to be vested in them in the interest of a certain political party for the purpose of intimidation and to prevent a full and fair expression of the popular will at said election; and

Whereas it is alleged that deputy marshals were appointed to serve in said State of Virginia at said election in certain localities in violation of the express provisions of an act of Congress: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice be required and directed, as soon as the same can reasonably be done, to investigate such charges and report to this House—

First. How many deputy marshals, general and special, were appointed——

Mr. REED (interrupting the reading). I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine calls for the regular order, which is equivalent to an objection to entertaining the resolution.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I give notice that I shall present an impeachment to-morrow.

Mr. REED. That is a very good way.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, there is nothing before the House, and I therefore ask to take up for present consideration the special order, being House bill No. 5461 to establish a board of commissioners of interstate commerce and to regulate such commerce.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I do not understand that we have disposed of my resolutions. I ask, by unanimous consent, that they be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. They have been read by the Clerk, and, as a matter of course, they will go into the proceedings.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. What is the regular order?

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the morning hour for the call of committees for reports, but the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] calls up the special order, made during the last session, which the Clerk will read.

Mr. REAGAN. I also desire to submit some remarks on that bill.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I ask for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The special order which the gentleman from Texas indicates takes precedence.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Has it precedence over the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. REED. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania can raise the question of consideration. Is not there unfinished business?

Mr. KEIFER. I should also like to inquire of the Chair whether this is a special order fixed for this day?

Mr. REAGAN. It was made the special order from day to day until disposed of.

The SPEAKER. It is a continuing special order.

Mr. KEIFER. But does it do away with Rule XXVII, which provides after six days from the commencement of the second or subsequent session of a Congress all bills and resolutions, &c., of the preceding Congress shall come up in their order? Can any special order come within those six days, is the proposition I submit to the Chair, unless the special order has been set apart expressly for a day within those six days? If made by unanimous consent, perhaps we might bring it within that time. But in the absence of any such special character given to this special order, I would like to know whether it does away with the twenty-seventh rule of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair had some difficulty in determining what construction ought to be put upon that twenty-seventh rule, but found on examination it had been construed heretofore by Mr. Speaker Blaine, who held it did not prohibit the House from proceeding in its regular order. It made it imperative on the House, however, to proceed with the regular order after the expiration of six days.

Of course the question of consideration can be raised against this special order as against any other.

While there is some doubt as to the real meaning of the rule, the Chair feels disposed to adhere to the construction put upon it heretofore by Mr. Speaker Blaine.

Mr. KEIFER. What is that?

The SPEAKER. That it does not contain any negative proposition at all against the House proceeding in regular order. It is imperative, however, that after the expiration of the six days the House shall proceed with its regular orders.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I call for the morning hour, which, as I understand, is the regular order of business at this time.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Texas calls up a special order, which has precedence over the regular order.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Had this special order ever been taken up before?

The SPEAKER. It had not. The gentleman from Texas called it up during the last session of Congress on several occasions, but in every instance the question of consideration was raised against it and it was not considered. As the Chair has already said, the gentleman from Pennsylvania can raise the question of consideration if he desires to do so.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Can we raise the question of consideration against it in any other way than by demanding the morning hour?

Mr. REAGAN. I ask unanimous consent to have the bill read.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I raise the question of consideration.

Mr. REAGAN. Let the bill be read.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I raise the question of consideration against this bill, and I do so because the House is not full at this time, and this is too important a subject of legislation to be acted on without a quorum. No one understands the importance of this subject more than the gentleman from Texas, and I am sure he will not ask to have it considered at a time when the House is thin.

The SPEAKER. The matter is not debatable.

Mr. REAGAN. I hope I may be allowed to proceed without further interruption.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has raised the question of consideration.

Mr. ANDERSON. Did not the gentleman from Pennsylvania raise the question of consideration too late? The gentleman from Texas had previously called up the special order and was occupying the floor.

The SPEAKER. As soon as the gentleman from Texas called up the special order the gentleman from Pennsylvania raised the question of consideration, and the Chair thinks he was in time.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. And I think the House had now better refuse to consider it.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House proceed to the consideration of the special order indicated by the gentleman from Texas?

The House divided; and there were—ayes 130, noes 10.

So the House determined to proceed to the consideration of the special order.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask by unanimous consent of the House that the bill and substitute which I propose to offer for it shall be printed, for the convenience of members, in the RECORD.

Mr. HISCOCK. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Texas when he expects to call for a vote?

Mr. REAGAN. Just as soon as the House will consent. I desire an early disposition of the question. It seems to me it can be disposed of in two or three days.

The SPEAKER. The bill has not yet been read.

Mr. REAGAN. Let the bill and my proposed substitute be read and go into the RECORD.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5461) to establish a board of commissioners of interstate commerce, and to regulate such commerce.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all charges by any person or persons engaged alone or associated with others in the transportation of property by railroad from one State or Territory to or through one or more other States or Territories of the United States, or to or from any foreign country, shall be reasonable for such service.

SEC. 2. That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons so engaged as aforesaid directly or indirectly to charge to or receive from any person or persons any greater or less rate or amount of compensation or reward than is by him or them charged to or received from any other person or persons for like and contemporaneous service in the carrying, receiving, delivering, storing, or handling the same under substantially similar circumstances; and all persons engaged as aforesaid shall furnish, without discrimination, the same facilities for the carriage, receiving, delivery, storage, and handling of all property of like character carried by him or them, and shall perform with equal expedition the same kind of services connected with the contemporaneous transportation thereof as aforesaid. No break, stoppage, or interruption, nor any contract, agreement, or understanding, shall be made to prevent the carriage of any property from being and being considered as one continuous carriage, in the meaning of this act, from the place of shipment to the place of destination, unless such stoppage, interruption, contract, arrangement, or understanding was made in good faith for some practical and necessary purpose, without any intent to avoid or interrupt such continuous carriage or to evade any of the provisions of this act.

SEC. 3. That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in the transportation of property as aforesaid directly or indirectly to allow any rebate, drawback, or other advantage in any form, upon shipments made or services rendered as aforesaid by him or them, which, under similar circumstances, are not allowed to all other persons.

SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in the carriage, receiving, storage, or handling of property as mentioned in the first section of this act to enter into any combination, contract, or agreement, by changes of schedule, carriage in different cars, or by any other means, with intent to prevent the carriage of such property from being continuous from the place of shipment to the place of destination, whether carried on one or several railroads; and it shall be unlawful for any person or persons carrying property as aforesaid to enter into any contract, agreement, or combination for the pooling of freights, or to pool the freights, of different and competing railroads, by dividing between them the aggregate or net proceeds of the earnings of such railroads, or any portion of them.

SEC. 5. That the provisions of this act shall apply to all property, and the receiving, delivery, loading, unloading, handling, storing, or carriage of the same, on one actually or substantially continuous carriage, or as part of such continuous carriage, as provided for in the first section of this act, and the compensation therefor, whether such property be carried wholly on one railroad or partly on several railroads, and whether such services are performed or compensation paid or received by or to one person alone or in connection with another or other persons.

SEC. 6. That any railroad company, officer of such company, or other person who shall violate any of the provisions of this act shall be liable to any person injured for the actual damages caused by such violation, which may be recovered in any State or United States court of competent jurisdiction. The court before which any such action is tried, if it shall be found that the violation was willful, or continued after the notice provided by the tenth section of this act, shall make an allowance by way of additional costs to the party injured sufficient to cover all his counsel and attorney fees, and all expenses and disbursements in the action, including his own necessary personal expenses.

SEC. 7. That any corporation or person violating this act is guilty of a misdemeanor, and subject to a fine of not exceeding $1,000 for each violation. The courts of the United States shall have exclusive jurisdiction of all prosecutions arising under this section. It shall be the duty of district attorneys of the United States to institute and prosecute to effect criminal proceedings for all such violations. The provisions of this section shall not apply to the first section of this act.

SEC. 8. That there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, three commissioners, of whom one shall be of experience in the law and one of experience in railroad business, who shall be collectively known as the commission of interstate commerce of the United States, and shall be charged with the duty of carrying into effect the provisions of this act in respect of interstate commerce. One of said commissioners shall hold his office for the term of two years, one for the term of four years, and the other for the term of six years, to be respectively designated by the President, and thereafter said commissioners shall be appointed for the term of six years; and a commissioner appointed to any vacancy shall hold office for the unexpired term. Any one of said commissioners may be removed by the President for cause, but not otherwise. Said commissioners shall devote their whole time and abilities to the duties of their office, and shall not accept or engage in any office or employment inconsistent with the provisions of this act. If either commissioner, after his appointment, shall be, or shall become by inheritance or operation of law, pecuniarily interested in any railroad or railroad security, he shall, within thirty days, divest himself of such interest; and upon his failure to do so, or upon his voluntarily becoming interested in any such railroad or railroad security, his office shall become vacant. No commissioner shall participate in any hearing or proceeding in which he has any pecuniary interest whatever. Each commissioner shall receive an annual salary of $7,500, payable like the salaries of the judges of the courts of the United States: Provided, That before entering upon the discharge of their duties they shall, in addition to the oath required of them by law, take and subscribe to an oath that they are neither directly nor indirectly interested in the ownership or earnings of any railroad company whatsoever.

SEC. 9. That the said commission shall exercise only the powers by this act conferred. Said commission may appoint a clerk, whose duty it shall be to keep a full and faithful record of the proceedings of said commission, and otherwise to assist the members thereof in the performance of their duties, and who shall receive an annual salary of $2,500: and also one accountant, at an annual salary of $2,500. The Secretary of the Interior, at the request of said commission, may also furnish the commission such additional clerical, engineering, expert, or other service as they may request and he shall deem proper. Actual and necessary traveling and other expenses incurred by said commissioners, or their employés under their orders, shall be allowed them, for which vouchers shall be rendered. The commissioners, their experts and clerks, may pass and repass over any railroad engaged in interstate commerce free of charge, whenever engaged in the performance of their duties under the provisions of this act, but neither shall accept any other pass, gratuity, or favor whatever from any railroad company.

SEC. 10. That any person complaining of anything done or omitted to be done by any railroad company or person in violation or contravention of this act may, in addition to the remedies hereinbefore provided, apply to said commission by petition in writing, which shall briefly state the subject of such complaint. If the petition is signed by any board of trade or other commercial body, or, when signed by an individual, if it bears the certificate of any district attorney of the United States, or of any district or county attorney, or officer corresponding thereto, of any State or Territory, that he has examined the facts, and in his opinion the complaint is well founded, the commission is hereby required to entertain and investigate the same. In all other cases the commission shall decide whether or not the petition ought to be proceeded with. The commission may, if they think fit, before requiring or permitting any formal proceedings to be taken on any petition, communicate the same to the railroad company against whom it is made, so as to afford them an opportunity of making such observations or taking such action thereon as they may think fit. The commission shall have power, and in a proper case is required, to cause a copy of the petition to be served upon the railroad company complained against, and to issue a notice requiring such company to appear before the commission and answer the said petition. The answer shall be in writing. After the answer is filed it shall then be lawful for the commission, if it shall think fit, to direct and prosecute, in such mode and by such persons or means as it shall think proper, all such inquiries into matters of fact as may be deemed necessary to enable the commission to form a just conclusion in respect of the matters of said petition. All the proceedings before said commission shall be directed by and under general orders, which shall secure to all persons interested reasonable notice and opportunity to be heard. If it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the commission, either by the testimony of witnesses or other evidence adduced before it, or by the report of any person to whom the commission may have referred the inquiry, or any part thereof, that anything has been done or omitted to be done in contravention or violation of this act, by any railroad company or person so upon due and proper notice proceeded against, it shall be the duty of such commission to make and record its report in writing in respect of any such contravention or violation of this act, which report shall comprise and embrace the findings of the commission upon and in respect of all questions of fact in issue or involved in such proceedings. Within a reasonable time, not to exceed twenty days, after such report and findings are made by the commission, it shall cause a copy thereof to be served upon or delivered to the railroad company so found to have violated this act, to which shall be appended a notice to be issued by said commission to such company forthwith to cease and desist from such violation; and also to deliver to the district attorney of the United States for the district in which the act complained of occurred another copy of such report, findings, and notice.

SEC. 11. That upon notice that any such railroad company has neglected or refused to conform to the decision of said commission, and to desist from such violation or contravention of this act, it shall be the duty of such district attorney to apply by petition, in the name of the party aggrieved, to the circuit court of the United States for such district, for, and it shall be the duty of such court to grant, an order upon such railroad company to show cause why such company should not be enjoined and restrained against the continuance of such violation, and for such other order and relief in the premises as may be just and proper. For the purpose of making any order or decree in the premises, final or otherwise, such court shall be always open, and the day on which any such order or decree is made shall be a special term of such court. Upon the service and return of such order to show cause, and notice to the parties interested, such court shall proceed in a summary manner to ascertain whether the said report and findings are true; and whenever said court shall be of opinion that such company has done or is doing any act in violation or contravention of this act in said report and findings described, it shall so adjudge; and it then shall be the duty of said court forthwith to issue a writ of injunction, requiring such railroad company to desist from such violation, and in respect of the matters in said report contained to conform to and obey all the provisions of said act. Such court may enforce obedience to any such injunction, order, or decree, by any person or party, by fine, proceedings for contempt, and all other means within its lawful jurisdiction sitting as a court of equity. Any person interested to restrain such violation may, on application to the court, be allowed to appear and be heard, by himself or counsel; and upon proof that any district attorney has failed in any proper case for the period of ten days to apply for such order to show cause, the court may permit such application to be made and prosecuted to effect by or in behalf of any person so interested. Such court may, in its discretion, award or deny costs to any party to such proceeding. In any case where the court shall adjudge that the violation of this act by any company has been willful, or continued after notice to desist therefrom, the court may award to any party injured such a gross sum by way of costs as will reimburse all his costs, charges, expenses, counsel fees, and disbursements, to be paid by such company.

SEC. 12. That the commission may make, and from time to time amend, such general orders as may be requisite for the order and regulation of proceedings before it, including all forms for proceeding, notices and the service thereof, and for the prescribing, directing, or regulating any matters authorized by this act. All the proceedings before said commission shall be upon reasonable notice to all parties interested, and such forms shall conform as nearly as may be to those in use in the courts of the United States. Any party may appear and be heard in person or by attorney.

SEC. 13. That for the purposes of this act the commission shall, subject as in this act mentioned, have full power to ascertain and report upon all questions of fact arising under this act, and shall also have the powers following:

(a) They may, by subpœna or order to be served by a person by them authorized, require the attendance of witnesses, and of all such persons as they think fit to call before them, or before any person by them authorized to prosecute an inquiry.

(b) They may require the production of all books, papers, and documents relating to any matter before them, and to that end may invoke the aid of any court of the United States.

(c) Either of them may administer oaths and affirmations.

SEC. 14. That the principal office of the commission shall be in the city of Washington, where its general session shall be held and its records and archives be deposited. Whenever the convenience of the public or of the parties may be promoted, or delay or expense prevented thereby, the commission may hold special sessions in any part of the United States. It may, by one or more of the commissioners, or one of the persons named in the ninth section hereof, or by any person specially appointed by the commission, prosecute any inquiry necessary to its duties, in any part of the United States, into any matter or question of fact, and may specially delegate to the officer or person conducting such inquiry such powers to that end as are by this act conferred upon the commission and may be deemed necessary. Every vote and official act of either of the commissioners shall be entered of record. The commission may conduct its proceedings in such a manner as will most conduce to the dispatch of business and to justice; they may sit together or separately, and either in private or public, but any proceeding before them shall be public upon the request of either party thereto; and a majority of said commission may determine any question submitted. The commission shall prescribe a railroad year, and a system of reports covering said year to be rendered by railroad companies; examine the books and accounts of said companies at such times as may be deemed by them necessary; see that all United States laws relating to said companies are enforced; furnish such information to the several Departments of the Government, or the Government directors of any of said railroads, in regard to the tariffs of fares and freight, or the accounts of said railroads, as may be required of them or as they may deem expedient; make an annual report of their doings to Congress on or before the 1st day of January of each year; and otherwise endeavor to procure the data necessary to the gradual enactment of an intelligent system of national legislation regulating interstate railroad commerce.

SEC. 15. That the Secretary of the Interior shall provide suitable offices and a room for the public sessions of the commission in the city of Washington. Witnesses summoned before the commission shall be paid the same fees as witnesses in the Federal courts, and depositions de bene esse and under commission may be taken to be used before the commission in the same manner and upon the same conditions as in such courts. The salaries and expenses of the commission shall be provided for, audited, and paid in the same manner as the salaries of judges and other judicial expenses.

SEC. 16. That said board of commissioners shall inquire into that method of railroad management or combination known as pooling, and state the result of their inquiry in their first annual report, and whether, in their judgment, any, and if so what, legislation is expedient in relation thereto.

SEC. 17. That nothing in this act shall apply to the carriage, storage, or handling of property wholly within one State or Territory and not destined for continuous carriage beyond such State or Territory, or to property carried for the United States, or to the transportation of persons or articles free or at reduced rates for State or municipal governments or for charitable purposes, or to or from public fairs and expositions for exhibition thereat.

SEC. 18. That in the construction of this act the phrases "railroad corporation" and "railroad company" shall be held to be synonymous, and to signify a corporation which either owns or operates a railroad as aforesaid, and shall include receivers, lessees, and trustees operating railroads, and all persons named in the first section of this act. The word "person" in this act includes plurality of persons, corporate and incorporate, and all persons in any manner engaged in interstate railway commerce in whatever capacity, whether as principals, agents, or employés.

SEC. 19. That the sum of $40,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for the uses and purposes of this act for the fiscal year ending June 30, A. D. 1885, and the intervening time anterior thereto.

Mr. REAGAN'S proposed substitute:

A bill to regulate interstate commerce and to prohibit unjust discriminations by common carriers.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged alone or associated with others in the transportation of property by railroad from one State or Territory to or through one or more other States or Territories of the United States, or to or from any foreign country, directly or indirectly to charge to or receive from any person or persons any greater or less rate or amount of freight, compensation, or reward than is charged to or received from any other person or persons for like and contemporaneous service in the carrying, receiving, delivering, storing, or handling of the same. All charges for such services shall be reasonable. And all persons engaged as aforesaid shall furnish, without discrimination, the same facilities for the carriage, receiving, delivery, storage, and handling of all property of like character carried by him or them, and shall perform with equal expedition the same kind of services connected with the contemporaneous transportation thereof as aforesaid. No break, stoppage, or interruption, nor any contract, agreement, or understanding shall be made to prevent the carriage of any property from being and being treated as one continuous carriage, in the meaning of this act, from the place of shipment to the place of destination, unless such stoppage, interruption, contract, arrangement, or understanding was made in good faith for some practical and necessary purpose, without any intent to avoid or interrupt such continuous carriage or to evade any of the provisions of this act.

SEC. 2. That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in the transportation of property as aforesaid directly or indirectly to allow any rebate, drawback, or other advantage, in any form, upon shipments made or services rendered as aforesaid by him or them.

SEC. 3. That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in the carriage, receiving, storage, or handling of property as mentioned in the first section of this act to enter into any combination, contract, or agreement, by changes of schedule, carriage in different cars, or by any other means, with intent to prevent the carriage of such property from being continuous from the place of shipment to the place of destination, whether carried on one or several railroads. And it shall be unlawful for any person or persons carrying property as aforesaid to enter into any contract, agreement, or combination for the pooling of freights, or to pool the freights, of different and competing railroads, by dividing between them the aggregate or net proceeds of the earnings of such railroads, or any portion of them.

SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in the transportation of property as provided in the first section of this act to charge or receive any greater compensation for a similar amount and kind of property, for carrying, receiving, storing, forwarding, or handling the same, for a shorter than for a longer distance on any one railroad; and the road of a corporation shall include all the road in use by such corporation, whether owned or operated by it under a contract, agreement, or lease by such corporation.

SEC. 5. That all persons engaged in carrying property as provided in the first section of this act shall adopt and keep posted up schedules which shall plainly state:

First. The different kinds and classes of property to be carried.

Second. The different places between which such property shall be carried.

Third. The rates of freight and prices of carriage between such places, and for all services connected with the receiving, delivery, loading, unloading, storing, or handling the same. And the accounts for such service shall show what part of the charges are for transportation, and what part are for loading, unloading, and other terminal facilities.

Such schedules may be changed from time to time as hereinafter provided. Copies of such schedules shall be printed in plain, large type, at least the size of ordinary pica, and shall be kept plainly posted for public inspection in at least two places in every depot where freights are received or delivered; and no such schedule shall be changed in any particular except by the substitution of another schedule containing the specifications above required, which substitute schedule shall plainly state the time when it shall go into effect, and copies of which, printed as aforesaid, shall be posted as above provided at least five days before the same shall go into effect; and the same shall remain in force until another schedule shall as aforesaid be substituted. And it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in carrying property on railroads as aforesaid, after thirty days after the passage of this act, to charge or receive more or less compensation for the carriage, receiving, delivery, loading, unloading, handling, or storing of any of the property contemplated by the first section of this act than shall be specified in such schedule as may at the time be in force.

SEC. 6. That each and all of the provisions of this act shall apply to all property, and the receiving, delivery, loading, unloading, handling, storing, or carriage of the same, on one actually or substantially continuous carriage, or as part of such continuous carriage, as provided for in the first section of this act, and the compensation therefor, whether such property be carried wholly on one railroad or partly on several railroads, and whether such services are performed or compensation paid or received by or to one person alone or in connection with another or other persons.

SEC. 7. That each and every act, matter, or thing in this act declared to be unlawful is hereby prohibited; and in case any person or persons as defined in this act, engaged as aforesaid, shall do, suffer, or permit to be done any act, matter, or thing in this act prohibited or forbidden, or shall omit to do any act, matter, or thing in this act required to be done, or shall be guilty of any violation of the provisions of this act, such person or persons shall forfeit and pay to the person or persons who may sustain damage thereby a sum equal to three times the amount of the damages so sustained, to be recovered by the person or persons so damaged by suit in any State or United States court of competent jurisdiction where the person or persons causing such damage can be found or may have an agent, office, or place of business; and if the court before which any such action is tried shall be of opinion that the violation of the law was willful, it shall make an allowance, by way of additional costs, to the party injured sufficient to cover all his counsel and attorney fees. Any action to be brought as aforesaid may be considered, and if so brought shall be regarded, as a subject of equity jurisdiction and discovery, and affirmative relief may be sought and obtained therein. In any such action so brought as a case of equitable cognizance as aforesaid, any director, officer, receiver, or trustee of any corporation or company aforesaid, or any receiver, trustee, or person aforesaid, or any agent of any such corporation or company, receiver, trustee, or person aforesaid, or of any of them, alone or with any other person or persons, party or parties, may and shall be compelled to attend, appear, and testify and give evidence; and no claim that any such testimony or evidence might or might not tend to criminate the person testifying or giving evidence shall be of any avail, but such evidence or testimony shall not be used as against such person on the trial of any indictment against him. The attendance and appearance of any of the persons who as aforesaid may be compelled to appear or testify, and the giving of the testimony or evidence by the same, respectively, and the production of books and papers thereby, may and shall be compelled the same as in the case of any other witness; and in case any deposition or evidence, or the production of any books or papers, may be desired or required for the purpose of applying for or sustaining any such action, the same, and the production of books and papers, may and shall be had, taken, and compelled by or before any United States commissioner, or in any manner provided or to be provided for as to the taking of other depositions or evidence, or the attendance of witnesses, or the production of other books or papers, in or by chapter 17 of title 13 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. No action aforesaid shall be sustained unless brought within one year after the cause of action shall accrue, or within one year after the party complaining shall have come to a knowledge of his right of action. And as many causes of action as may accrue within the year may be joined in the same suit or complaint.

SEC. 8. That any director or officer of any corporation or company acting or engaged as aforesaid, or any receiver or trustee, lessee, or person acting or engaged as aforesaid, or any agent of any such corporation or company, receiver, trustee, or person aforesaid, or of one of them alone, or with any other corporation, company, person, or party, who shall willfully do, or cause or willingly suffer or permit to be done, any act, matter, or thing in this act prohibited or forbidden, or who shall aid or abet therein, or shall willfully omit or fail to do any act, matter, or thing in this act required to be done, or cause or willingly suffer or permit any act, matter, or thing so directed or required by this act to be done not to be so done, or shall aid or abet any such omission or failure, or shall be guilty of any infraction of this act, or aid or abet therein, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be fined not less than $1,000.

SEC. 9. That nothing in this act shall apply to the carriage, receiving, storage, handling, or forwarding of property wholly within one State, and not shipped from or destined to some foreign country or other State or Territory; nor shall it apply to property carried for the United States at lower rates of freight and charges than for the general public, or to the transportation of articles free or at reduced rates of freight for charitable purposes, or to or from public fairs and expositions for exhibition.

SEC. 10. That the words "person or persons" as used in this act, except where otherwise provided, shall be construed and held to mean person or persons, officer or officers, corporation or corporations, company or companies, receiver or receivers, trustee or trustees, lessee or lessees, agent or agents, or other person or persons acting or engaged in any of the matters and things mentioned in this act.

During the reading of the bill and substitute the following proceedings took place:

Mr. REAGAN (interrupting the reading). I would suggest that by unanimous consent the reading of the bill and substitute be omitted, and that they be published in the RECORD.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. This is a most important bill, and ought to be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CRISP in the chair). Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania object?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I do.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill as above.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, the subject-matter to which the bill just read relates is of perhaps as great moment to the country as any other that can be brought to the attention of the Congress of the United States. This will be realized when it is considered that it relates to regulations affecting 125,000 miles of railroad in the carrying of the commerce—what is denominated the interstate commerce—of the country, an amount of commerce certainly not less than $10,000,000,000 annually. I do not propose, however, this afternoon to enter into the general discussion of the subject.

There are two bills pending before the House: one the bill authorized by the committee, the other a substitute offered by myself as a member of the committee. I thought that perhaps this evening I had better avoid any general discussion of the measure in its constitutional aspect—avoid any discussion of the constitutional authority of Congress over the subject—and simply call the attention of the members of the House briefly to the most clearly-defined differences between the two bills. The committee's bill has good provisions in it. It has provisions that commanded the approval of a majority of the committee. It will be for the House when the subject is presented to determine whether it also meets the approval of the House or whether it desires a bill in some other form.

The seventh section of the committee's bill makes the penalty for a violation of its provisions not more than $1,000, and provides that the provisions of this section shall not apply to violations of the provisions of the first section of the bill. The first section of the bill provides:

That all charges by any person or persons engaged alone or associated with others in the transportation of property by railroad from one State or Territory to or through one or more other States or Territories of the United States, or to or from any foreign country, shall be reasonable for such service.

The only provision in the first section of the bill to which this relates is that the charges shall be reasonable. The committee's bill in fixing the penal part of the bill expressly exempts the first section from its operation, and, therefore, charges which are unreasonable and onerous, unjust or exorbitant, may be made without penalty and without a remedy upon the criminal docket against the offending party.

The substitute bill by its eighth section provides that all violations of its provisions are made penal, and the fine in any case shall be not less than $1,000. There are two differences between the two sections. The committee's bill makes the penalty not more than $1,000, while the substitute bill makes the penalty not less than $1,000. The committee's bill exempts the question as to the unreasonableness of the charges from the operation of the penal provision, while the substitute bill makes a violation of that provision a penal offense as well as the violation of any other provision of the bill.

This is the first difference to which I desire to call the attention of the House. Upon it I suggest that if we make a discrimination as to the allowance of rebates and drawbacks, and the pooling of freights and other matters named in the bill, an offense, why shall we say that unjust charges against shippers shall be less of an offense? The proposition seems to me so clear that the substitute bill is superior in its equities to the committee's bill that I do not deem it necessary to consume the time of the House by discussing that point any further.

Under the sixth section of the committee's bill the liability of a railroad company to any person suffering wrong by their action is the actual damages sustained; while under the seventh section of the substitute bill persons violating the provisions of the bill would be liable in three times the amount of damages sustained. This is a difference of some considerable moment, and I deem it best here to call attention to the reasons which induced me to believe that triple damages in such cases ought to be allowed. Wealthy litigants may be able to combat the railroad corporations in the courts of the country; but the great mass of persons who would be liable to injury by the discrimination and improper conduct of these corporations are unable to contest with them in the courts. They are unable to fee lawyers, pay their witnesses, and lose the time necessary to attend to courts if it can be avoided. But the railroad corporations have almost habitually, where suits were brought against them, undertaken to delay decisions and deter parties from the institution of suits by prolonging litigation. Their wealth, power, and influence are sufficient to enable them to do so. It is fair, therefore, it seems to me, when they provoke litigation by their conduct, to say that they shall pay three times the damages arising from their unlawful action. At the common law they would be liable for actual damages sustained; but at the common law, as has been found in the State of New York and elsewhere, private litigants are unable to contend with the railroad corporations; and it has been developed during past sessions of Congress, and was developed in the great legislative investigation in the State of New York, that men injured by the unlawful acts of these corporations were afraid to institute suits against them in order to bring them to justice for fear of their power to discriminate further against them and inflict upon them irremediable wrong. So that, all things considered, it seems to me that it is right and proper to give triple damages instead of simple common law damages to the actual amount of damage sustained. But I do not propose so much to elaborate these points now as simply to present the differences between the bills, so that gentlemen who participate in the discussion may consider them as we proceed.

Mr. LONG. Will not the gentleman refer to the provision in the committee's bill to meet just that point with regard to the allowing of costs?

Mr. REAGAN. I will read that provision of the committee's bill and will also read the provision of the substitute bill on the same subject. The committee's bill provides:

SEC. 6. That any railroad company, officer of such company, or other person who shall violate any of the provisions of this act shall be liable to any person injured for the actual damages caused by such violation, which may be recovered in any State or United States court of competent jurisdiction. The court before which any such action is tried, if it shall be found that the violation was willful, or continued after the notice provided by the tenth section of this act, shall make an allowance by way of additional costs to the party injured sufficient to cover all his counsel and attorney fees, and all expenses and disbursements in the action, including his own necessary personal expenses.

I will now read a part of the seventh section of the substitute bill:

That each and every act, matter, or thing in this act declared to be unlawful is hereby prohibited, and in case any person or persons as defined in this act engaged as aforesaid shall do, suffer, or permit to be done, any act, matter, or thing in this act prohibited or forbidden, or shall omit to do any act, matter, or thing in this act required to be done, or shall be guilty of any violation of the provisions of this act, such person or persons shall forfeit and pay to the person or persons who may sustain damage thereby a sum equal to three times the amount of the damages so sustained, to be recovered by the person or persons so damaged by suit in any State or United States court of competent jurisdiction where the person or persons causing such damage can be found or may have an agent, office, or place of business; and if the court before which any such action is tried shall be of opinion that the violation of the law was willful, it shall make an allowance, by way of additional costs, to the party injured sufficient to cover all his counsel and attorney fees.

Omitting the part about his personal expenses that is in the committee's bill, I have read the two sections, in order that the difference between them may be seen by members in proceeding with the discussion.

The committee's bill in its remedial provisions only provides legal remedies, while the substitute bill provides both legal and equitable remedies. There is a reference to equitable powers in the committee's bill, but that is not in relation to the remedial provisions of the bill, but only in relation to those provisions which concern a commission and the action of a commission in determining questions between the Government and wrongdoers and not between a citizen and a wrongdoer. I will call attention to a further part of the seventh section of the substitute bill, beyond what I have just read, in connection with this provision about conferring equitable powers in connection with the remedial provisions of the bill:

Any action to be brought as aforesaid may be considered, and if so brought shall be regarded as a subject of equity jurisdiction and discovery, and affirmative relief may be sought and obtained therein. In any such action so brought as a case of equitable cognizance as aforesaid, any director, officer, receiver, or trustee of any corporation or company aforesaid, or any receiver, trustee, or person aforesaid, or any agent of any such corporation or company, receiver, trustee, or person aforesaid, or of any of them, alone or with any other person or persons, party or parties, may and shall be compelled to attend, appear, and testify and give evidence; and no claim that any such testimony or evidence might or might not tend to criminate the person testifying or giving evidence shall be of any avail, but such evidence or testimony shall not be used as against such person on the trial of any indictment against him.

And it goes on then to extend the provisions of the Revised Statutes in regard to compelling the attendance of witnesses and the production of books, papers, and contracts, and generally gives all the powers of a court of equity for compelling discovery. I will not read the whole of the section. It is the seventh section of the substitute.

This provision that I have in part read I esteem a very important part of any legislation that may secure to the people proper remedies in cases like these. Some years back in looking to the action of State Legislatures I had occassion to see that very wholesome provisions of State legislation had not been carried into effect because of the difficulty of furnishing the testimony necessary to sustain actions. Violations of duty and the law by these corporations are generally within the knowledge of their agents and covered by their books; and in a proceeding at law against them if you call upon them or their agents to testify or to produce their books you can not compel it, unless some provision of the statute is made to enable the compulsion of such parties to testify and produce their books. You may enact the best possible provisions, but if you take away from the courts the power to compel the officers and agents of these corporations to testify, and take away from the courts the power to compel them to produce their books and papers, in many, perhaps a great majority, of the cases that would arise you could not procure convictions. But if you can open the mouths of their officers and agents and compel them to testify and go to their books for the facts which those books disclose, you may convict them of unlawful practices. So I have thought that this provision was an essential feature of any measure that would prevent a disregard of the rights of the people in connection with the transportation of their interstate commerce. At present I do not propose to enlarge on the subject, but simply to call attention to what is required in connection with these remedial provisions, and to the fact that such provision is not found in the committee's bill, as I remember it, connected with its remedial provisions.

It will be understood that I make a distinction between remedial provisions and those which relate to the action of a commission acting chiefly between the Government and the companies, and not between aggrieved individuals and the wrongdoers.

The fourth distinctive difference between the two bills is that the committee's bill does not prohibit the railroad companies from charging more for a shorter than for a longer haul, while the substitute bill does prohibit such charges. This is a very important difference, to which I wish to call especially the attention of the House. It is one that received a good deal of consideration on the part of the committee and upon which there was serious difference of opinion. It was in evidence before the Forty-fifth Congress that a car-load of ordinary freight sent from Omaha to San Francisco was charged for at the rate of $300 per car-load, while a car-load of like freight sent from Omaha to Virginia City or the Palisades, six hundred miles this side of San Francisco, was charged $800; so that for six hundred miles less haul $500 more was charged upon a car-load of freight.

It is only necessary to state this proposition in order that the monstrous wrong of such a system of charges may be realized. It will be seen that the only reason these extortionate rates were adopted was because there was no competition, and the people of Nevada were helpless to protect themselves. It appeared in evidence also that the rates between San Francisco and Virginia City or the Palisades were greatly more than the through rates between Omaha and San Francisco. I give this as a strong illustration of the wrong of the principle of allowing a corporation to charge more for a car-load of freight for a shorter than a longer distance. But, I take it, it is within the knowledge of every member of this House, I care not where he may come from, that it is habitual to charge more for short hauls than for long, where there is no competition to protect the people against improper exactions of that kind.

The argument made in answer to this proposition is that from competing points prices must necessarily be lower than from non-competing points, and that by allowing these discriminations in favor of the long as against short hauls, Western produce is brought nearer to the Eastern markets. Now, I want to call the attention of the House to a fact which I beg may be investigated by all who feel an interest in looking into this precise question. The substitute bill is based upon a principle which renders that description of discrimination unnecessary, and at the same time gives to the people whose freight requires a long haul all the advantages that they can reasonably desire. In the very first Congress in which we had proof on this subject before us the fact was disclosed that flour could be sent from Saint Louis or Chicago through Pittsburgh to the city of Philadelphia cheaper than it could be sent from Pittsburgh to Philadelphia; and a similar statement may be made with reference to points in the interior part of New York. The fact is now developed that it is the practice of the railroad corporations to attempt to grasp more business than legitimately belongs to them by low rates of freight from competing points. The substitute bill which I have offered means to prevent this and to compel these corporations to rely upon the business which legitimately belongs to them.

In connection with this matter I desire to put this question to the good judgment and common fairness of the House: Is it right that a man at a non-competing point shall pay two or three times the rightful cost of the transportation of his freights in order to enable a railroad corporation to procure business at competing points at lower rates than it can afford, thus procuring freight to which it has no legitimate right? To answer this question in the affirmative is to base one wrong upon another, instead of meeting the ends of justice. It can not be insisted that common fairness and common honesty require one man to pay for the freight of another. There is no justice, no fairness, no honesty in saying that one man shall be compelled to pay the cost of carrying the merchandise of another.

But the framework of the substitute bill obviates, as I have said, the very difficulties which here arise in the minds of gentlemen in opposition to it. In the first place, the provisions of the substitute bill require that for a given amount of freight of a given quality no more shall be charged for a shorter than for a longer distance. In settling upon this principle we have from the start found serious difficulty. This difficulty grew out of the impossibility of arriving at a precisely equitable basis on this subject. We recognize the fact that the railroad companies can not load and unload freight and carry it for short distances at as cheap a rate per mile as they can for long distances; and the object in framing the bill was, while protecting the people against wrong, to guard also these corporations against wrong. In the framework of the substitute bill, which in this respect is the same bill that passed the House during the Forty-fifth Congress, we allow the corporations to continue to discriminate in favor of long hauls, and to discriminate to the extent of the whole difference of distance. We simply say that the companies shall not charge more, for instance, for a given amount of freight for 100 miles or 500 miles than they do for 1,000 miles. But there is nothing in the bill which will prevent them from charging as much for the short haul as for the longer haul. Thus they will have all the latitude of discrimination that distance gives them; and justice can not require more. Indeed, the difficulty of getting a better basis of adjustment induced us to go further in allowing this measure of discrimination than we thought was equitable. To this I think there can hardly be a successful answer.

Mr. Speaker, I beg to call the attention of those gentlemen who have objected to the proposition on that ground that there is nothing in the substitute bill submitted by me which prevents the railroad companies from charging as low a rate if the bill shall become a law as they can charge now without the bill becoming a law. We do not pretend to regulate their rates, to say whether they shall charge much or little. We do not ask that. We do not propose in any way to embarrass them in their lawful and rightful action, but simply to abridge, to cut off, to do away so far as possible by legislation with the abuses which have characterized the exercise of their monopoly power.

It has been said this legislation was sought in hostility to the railroad companies. I wish to testify for myself, Mr. Speaker, and I think I can safely testify for every committee which has considered this subject and of which I have been a member, that there has not been any disposition to inflict injury upon these railroad corporations. In common with the members of those committees and with the members of the House I recognize the great value of railroads in the country toward the promotion of its prosperity and the welfare of the people, and toward the development and advancement of our civilization. It is not my intention or desire to advocate any measure of legislation which would cripple their usefulness or inflict loss upon those who have invested in these various railroad enterprises. I can not make this stronger than I would. I simply desire to protect the people against the abuse of the monopoly power of railroad corporations and not to injure them or their stockholders.

Now, then, I have said there was nothing in the bill preventing railroad corporations charging as low a rate for the transportation of freight as they may wish, but there is this provision in the bill: that they shall not between intermediate points charge a higher rate than for the whole distance. What right has Saint Louis or Chicago or Galveston or any other place in the Union to say that in their interest you must permit freights to be carried from those places to the great entrepôts of commerce for less rates, at a less price, at less cost than they can be carried for for one-fourth of the distance? In God's name when they can get them carried for those longer distances at as low a price as they can be carried for shorter and intermediate distances, when they can have their freights carried two or three times farther distance, they ought to be contented, it seems to me. They ought not to go further and demand that these railroad corporations shall carry their freights 1,000 or 2,000 miles at a cheaper rate than they can be carried for 100 or 200 miles.

I invite those who combat my views on this subject to meet me before the House. I invite the attention of all to the fact that we do not interfere with any charges which may be made by the railroad corporations, except that no more shall be charged for the transportation of freights for a shorter than for a longer distance on the same bulk and quality of freight, and that these charges shall be reasonable. That is all; and surely a citizen of Chicago or a citizen of Saint Louis can not complain if he secures the carrying of freight from that point—that is, from Saint Louis to Philadelphia or from Chicago to New York—as cheaply as from Harrisburg to Philadelphia.

Surely the citizen of Chicago can not complain if he gets his freight carried from Chicago to New York as cheap as the citizen of New York can have his freight carried from Albany to New York. I do not forget in this matter, Mr. Speaker, that I am stating illustrations and giving places within the boundaries of a State, which cases do not come under the proposed law; but the illustrations in themselves furnish a complete and conclusive answer to anything which may be urged in opposition to this provision. They show the injustice of hauling freights for a longer distance, of the same kind and bulk, at a cheaper rate than for a shorter distance; that is, that freights for 1,000 miles or 2,000 miles should pay less rate than for 100 or 200 miles.

But I am dwelling upon this subject longer than I desired. I regard this as one of the great essential provisions of this bill; and if the House desires to promote the remedial legislation which will protect the 50,000,000 of our American people against the rapacity of these corporations, you will never do it successfully by saying that the corporations may charge greatly more for carrying a car-load of freight 100 miles than for carrying it 1,000 miles. Such a proposition will command the approval and sense of justice and propriety of mankind.

The next point of difference between the two bills is that the committee's bill in its third section only prohibits the allowance of rebates or drawbacks and other discriminations to any one person which are not allowed to any other person, while the substitute bill prohibits the allowance of rebates, drawbacks, or advantages of any kind in all cases.

I desire to call attention to the particular wording of this bill on this subject, because I wish the House to understand what is in the bill itself. The third section of the committee's bill provides:

SEC. 3. That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in the transportation of property as aforesaid directly or indirectly to allow any rebate, drawback, or other advantage in any form, upon shipments made or services rendered as aforesaid by him or them, which, under similar circumstances, are not allowed to all other persons.

Instead of prohibiting the allowance of rebates, drawbacks, cut-rates, and other discriminating advantages, this bill goes on first to prohibit this and say then that if you allow them to one person you must also allow them to another. I submit that it simply opens the door to the whole wrong against which we are proposing to guard. And why, sir, should rebates be allowed to anybody? If they are allowed to all persons alike it simply amounts to a uniform reduction of the rates of freight to that extent. It amounts to that, and nothing else. It can not be anything else; and if, therefore, they make a uniform reduction of rates to all men, why not change the schedule and reduce the freight instead of saying that by this discriminating and swindling method of rebates and drawbacks we propose to swindle everybody alike? Have I not put the case fairly? Why permit this process at all? It amounts to saying that you shall not knock your neighbor down unless you knock some other neighbor down. You shall not steal your neighbor's hog unless you steal another neighbor's sheep. Why put it that way? Why not say that this discrimination in giving advantages to one shipper over another shall be absolutely prohibited?

In this connection I would invite the attention of the members of this House to the legislative investigation made a few years ago by the great State of New York, and contained in five large volumes, in which investigation it was shown, in the face of a written denial on the part of Mr. Vanderbilt and of Mr. Gould, that they allowed special rates. In answer to an inquiry from the chamber of commerce whether they did not make such discriminations Mr. Vanderbilt positively denied it, and the committee, members of the Legislature of New York, proceeded to take evidence, and proved the fact that within the last year preceding that time some thousands of contracts for rebates and drawbacks had been made by that company—not instances of rebates, but contracts for their daily allowance. There stands in these reports the written denial of the president of that corporation, and in opposition to it the proofs submitted to the Legislature of the State of New York. I submit this, Mr. Speaker, not to call attention to that particular man or to his road, but simply to illustrate what has been going on all over the country. If you give the power to a corporation or to the officers of a corporation to discriminate between the shippers, they will enrich their friends while they may impoverish those they do not like; and that investigation cited from New York furnishes the strongest, the amplest evidence of the truth of this statement. So I hold the substitute bill preferable to the committee's bill.

The committee's bill contains no provision requiring a railroad company to post up schedules of its rates of charges, while section 5 of the substitute bill does require such schedules to be posted up. And this is essential to secure fairness and equality in rates between shippers and as a means of evidence in determining whether discriminations have been made, and whether more than regular or schedule prices have been charged. If you leave that provision out and come to a trial in each case, you will have to prove what reasonable rates are. If you put the provision in requiring them to post up their schedules of rates, the law will presume they constitute reasonable rates, and the production of the schedules at a trifling expense would directly show the jury the amount of charges which the road had fixed, and it would then be for the court and jury to determine whether the schedule had been disregarded or not in the case under consideration. Perhaps I had better read this section of t .e substitute bill:

SEC. 5. That all persons engaged in carrying property as provided in the first section of this act shall adopt and keep posted up schedules which shall plainly state:

First. The different kinds and classes of property to be carried.

Second. The different places between which such property shall be carried.

Third. The rates of freight and prices of carriage between such places, and for all services connected with the receiving, delivery, loading, unloading, storing, or handling the same. And the accounts for such service shall show what part of the charges are for transportation, and what part are for loading, unloading, and other terminal facilities.

That last provision is as to the discrimination of rates and charges under the pretext of regulating the terminal charges. So I require by the substitute bill that the accounts shall state what portion of the amount is for freight and what portion is for terminal charges.

Such schedules may be changed from time to time as hereinafter provided. Copies of such schedules shall be printed in plain, large type, at least the size of ordinary pica, and shall be kept plainly posted for public inspection in at least two places in every depot where freights are received or delivered; and no such schedule shall be changed in any particular except by the substitution of another schedule containing the specifications above required, which substitute schedule shall plainly state the time when it shall go into effect, and copies of which, printed as aforesaid, shall be posted as above provided at least five days before the same shall go into effect; and the same shall remain in force until another schedule shall as aforesaid be substituted. And it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in carrying property on railroads as aforesaid, after thirty days after the passage of this act, to charge or receive more or less compensation for the carriage, receiving, delivery, loading, unloading, handling, or storing of any of the property contemplated by the first section of this act than shall be specified in such schedule as may at the time be in force.

You see this provision not only requires these schedules to be posted up so that the citizen when he goes to make his shipment knows what part of the product of his labor or capital belongs to him and what part must go to the common carrier, but it provides that a charging of more or less than the schedule rates shall be punished as a crime. It simply means to make them be honest and to treat all men alike. Who but the corporations can object to this? Who that seeks common fairness can object to this? The committee's bill limits its provisions to car-loads of freight, while the substitute bill extends its provisions to all amounts of freight. A bill formerly reported from the Committee on Commerce on this subject was the same in its provisions as the present committee's bill, limiting the amount of freight which should come under the influence of the bill to car-loads, but the jobbing merchants of all the great cities protested that it was unjust in not giving to them the same protection for smaller amounts of freight that was given to others for larger amounts. It seemed to me that their statement was so just and fair, that I chose to give up my former convictions and position on this subject in deference to what was demanded by justice. Therefore I submit that as one of the differences between the bills; and I think when we come to examine it we shall see that there is no just reason why we should not place all amounts of freight under the same wholesome influence of this legislation and protect the citizen against the rapacity and unfairness of the corporation.

The committee's bill requires a railroad commission to be appointed under it; and by its sixteenth section it directs said commission to inquire into the method known as pooling and to report what legislation is expedient in relation thereto, while the preceding part of the bill prohibits absolutely by its third section all pooling of freights by competing roads.

I ought to observe that the committee's bill prohibits pooling. After the provision prohibiting pooling was inserted in the bill, however, another provision was inserted in the latter part of the bill, the sixteenth section, directing the commission provided for by the bill to enter upon an investigation as to the propriety of permitting pooling.

I have but a single remark at this time to offer on that subject, and it is this: In early times the anxiety of the people to secure the advantages of railroad transportation and travel induced them to make very liberal charters, almost as liberal as could be at any time asked for. It was felt then, as we all know to be the case now, that each road was a monopoly for the transportation of the freights and carrying of the travel on its particular line. They felt that then, and they then supposed that transportation by water and by other modes of conveyance would furnish such competition as in some measure to relieve the people against the monopoly exaction of these corporations. They felt, too, that as new roads were built they would offer lines of competition with each other and by their competition reduce the rates of freight to a fair price for carriage. And they felt then, as the law authorizes us to feel and to say now, that in case water transportation and other modes of transportation and competing railroad transportation should fail to give the desired relief against the monopoly powers of these corporations—they felt and knew that they derived their life and being from the legislative authority of the country; and that the power which created them could regulate in a reasonable way their rates of charges as common carriers, as their charges and their actions have been regulated from time immemorial, just as turnpikes are regulated and as hack-drivers in cities are regulated. They derive their powers in the main from legislative authority; and if their powers are not derived from legislative authority then the corporations are engaged in public employments, that is, employments in which the public has an interest, and on both grounds the courts of England and America have always held that the right to regulate followed the creation of such corporations; otherwise we would have to assume, if that power does not exist, that the legislative authority can create something superior to itself. No wise statesman or wise statesmanship could make any such admission. The Government can not create something superior to itself. It would not dare to create something superior to itself. But I do not choose now to elaborate this point. I simply desire to state it.

The substitute bill would omit the provision of the committee bill, which requires inquiry into the subject of the right of pooling. The substitute bill assumes that pooling is wrong. I assume that it is unlawful. I believe that at common law it can be shown to be unlawful. But I do not choose to discuss that question now. The question is simply one of power. The people of this country confer upon these corporations franchises without price—large and valuable privileges—and they have the right to say to such corporations, "You may charge a just and reasonable percentage upon your capital, but you shall not levy unreasonable and unjust exactions upon the people."

The course of the English as well as the American decisions goes to this point: that the power of regulation resides with the legislative authority, but must not be abused by such legislation as will destroy the corporation or take from the stockholders a reasonable dividend upon the capital invested by them. That is the extent and character of the power to regulate transportation charges as recognized in Great Britain and this country.

The right to free competition ought to be left to the people. Pooling simply means we shall make one great mammoth corporation out of a number of smaller ones that shall take from the people all hope of protection against extortionate charges, denying to them the rights which grow out of free competition.

One other point as to the difference between these bills. The greatest defect in the committee's bill is that for many injuries to individuals it does not give an adequate legal or equitable remedy, but refers such matters to a railroad commission which is to determine questions between the wrong-doing railroad companies and the Government, while in many cases no remedy is provided for wrongs done to individual citizens.

Mr. LONG. Will not the individual citizen get the benefit of the investigation?

Mr. REAGAN. He may in a remote degree—indirectly. The substitute bill, on the other hand, gives complete legal and equitable remedy without delay through the ordinary courts of the country to citizens for every injury within the purview of this bill done them by such corporations.

I wish to say a word in relation to the proposed appointment of a commission. If it is the judgment of the House that we should have a commission on this subject I shall of course bow to the decision of the House. But I doubt the expediency of providing for such a commission, and will state why. If we provide for the appointment of a railroad commission either by the President or any other authority (and if provided for it would seem most natural that the members should be appointed by the President), however honest and patriotic his intentions may be in making such appointments, we must remember that the railroad corporations, few in number as to the heads that control them, can easily combine their influence and bring to bear by indirection, if they dare not do it directly, influences which will be likely to control in the appointment of commissioners.

If we get commissioners appointed in the interest of these corporations we can hardly expect either recommendations or direct action that will materially benefit the people.

It has been said that it was difficult even to get the representatives of the people to act on this great question. We know the power of these corporations (with their experts and other officers filling the committee-rooms and corridors and often placing themselves upon the floor of this House with their attorneys, the ablest in the United States, all of them paid out of the people's money by levying a little more tribute upon the people) to secure or prevent legislation. If Congress has found now for nine years the impossibility of legislating upon this great question, what is to be the fate of the people if their interests are left in the hands of three men upon whom all these influences can be concentrated. I do not deny that it may be possible to secure men who will be faithful to the great trust committed to them; but to undertake to perform the duties of such a commission would expose any men to the severest trials that can be imposed upon them.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman from Texas be kind enough to point out the difference between the difficulty of getting good commissioners and the difficulty of getting good judges of the Supreme Court?

Mr. REAGAN. My friend from Iowa asks me if I can point out the difference in point of difficulty between getting honest commissioners and the difficulty of getting honest judges. I do not know that I can point out the difference in such a way as will be satisfactory to him. But judges are appointed with reference to the general legal powers which they are to exercise, while these commissioners would be appointed with reference to the specific duties provided for in this act relating to railroads. Judges have many motives in connection with subjects of jurisdiction other than railroads to preserve their integrity. I have said I do not doubt that it is possible to get men who will act fairly in this capacity. But, in my judgment, when we look at what has occurred in the majority of the States that have appointed commissioners, when we remember that State Legislatures have been suborned, that courts of justice have been corrupted, that even governors of States have been improperly influenced in their action by the power of these corporations, we should rather trust the rights of the people in the hands of the courts of the country than commit them to three particular individuals, whose jurisdiction at most can only be partial.

But I propose now, Mr. Speaker, to antagonize this idea of a commission by providing that certain things shall not be done, and that the doing of them shall be a violation of the law, and that certain things shall be done, and the non-doing of these things shall be a violation of law. I propose to give a civil remedy to the party injured, in the State or Federal court where these parties or their officers can be found, in civil damages for the wrong done. I propose to give a criminal remedy in the courts of the United States for the same wrongs where the penalty on conviction shall be not less than $1,000. If you put the lowest penalty on these corporations they will laugh at you in most cases; but you must make them respect the law and teach them that you are passing laws that must be obeyed, and not such as will tempt them to wrongdoing first by want of vigor in its provisions——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask, Mr. Speaker, permission of the House to conclude what I have to say on this question, which I will be able to do in a few minutes.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I move, by unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the chairman of the Committee on Commerce be allowed an extension of time sufficient to complete what he has to say on the subject.

Mr. REAGAN. I only wish to finish the sentence which I began.

The SPEAKER. What time does the gentleman ask?

Mr. REAGAN. Only for a few moments.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and the gentleman's time will be extended as he desires.

Mr. REAGAN. In opposition to placing this great interest in the hands of a commission, as I have already stated, the substitute bill declares what shall be done and what shall not be done. Among the things which it is declared shall be done the first is that the rates shall be reasonable, then that there shall be no discrimination in freight rates; that there shall be no rebate, no drawbacks, no cutting of rates, no discrimination. In the next place, more shall not be charged for a shorter than for a longer distance for the same amount and character of freight. In the next place, that there shall be no pooling of rates. And after giving all the necessary remedies on the crirainal and civil docket, I propose to give equitable powers, so as to compel parties to testify and produce books and papers, in order that the ends of justice may be fairly attained and that our efforts at legislation shall not be thwarted by closing the mouths and the books of those who represent these corporations.

The effect of the substitute bill I propose is to make each court, to make every Federal court, a jurisdiction for the trial of the rights of parties concerned in this transportation or for the punishment of the violators of the law, and to make every State court a tribunal for the trial of civil cases, so as to make them a place where the citizens can go. For example, in a State like Texas or California or any of the large States, to require a citizen to go to a great distance to a Federal court results in giving him no remedy. By giving the citizen in the courts of his State this civil remedy, if he is unable to prosecute a criminal remedy in the Federal court, he can at least secure the civil remedy for the civil wrong done him in the court of his own State and vicinage.

In contrast, this, sir, has no provision creating a commission, and I prefer it to the creation of a commission. While I know there are others who agree with the majority of the committee in favor of a commission, I also know that all the railroad companies and railroad attorneys and railroad experts seek a commission instead of that legislation which will enable the citizen to go right directly to an honest court and an honest jury. They are all the time struggling to get up a commission and to clothe it with power to make reports about something, to make them investigate something. This bill provides they shall report information which will enable Congress to legislate advisedly on this subject. To my mind it is a wrong assumption that we have not now the information necessary to enable us to legislate properly.

If we were attempting to make regulations, if we were attempting to fix the price of freight, I agree with you a commission might be necessary; but we are trying to do no such thing; we are trying by conservative legislation to prohibit the abuses of monopolies and prohibit the corporations from doing the things which all men know ought not to be done. We do not propose to do anything in this Congress which requires, so far as I know, the assistance of any railroad expert. What we propose to do is that which is dictated by common honesty and demanded by a proper consideration for the rights of the American people—simply that there shall be no injustice, no inequality in the transportation of freight, no discrimination in charges of more for a shorter than a longer distance, no pooling of freights and denying to the people the rights growing out of competition.

Mr. Speaker, I have thus had occasion to go hurriedly through with as good a statement as I am able to make of the differences between the two bills; and I desired to do so at this point because others than the members of the committee might not at first sight observe the difference between them. I have chosen to take this course in order that the attention of the members of the House might be called to the provisions of the two bills, and I thank them most cordially for their kind attention and patience during the delivery of my remarks.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I want to ask the gentleman from Texas before he takes his seat if he will not ask consent of the House that this bill and the proposed substitute may be printed in bill form as well as in the RECORD, so that we may have them on our tables for comparison when we again come to the consideration of this question?

Mr. REAGAN. I think the suggestion is a good one, for many members are calling for copies. I have a few, but not enough to supply all.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I understand that the committee's bill is quite exhausted, and we should have a reprint of them.

The SPEAKER. Without objection there will be an order made for a reprint of the bill of the committee and also for the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Texas in bill form.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, if no gentleman desires to go on with the discussion this evening I will move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Pending the motion to adjourn the Chair desires to lay before the House certain executive communications and requests of members.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

A bill (S. 1031) for the relief of W. C. Marsh.

REPORT OF EXPENDITURES BY THE CLERK OF THE HOUSE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report of expenditures by the Clerk of the House of Representatives; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Accounts.

REPORT OF BOARD OF VISITORS TO THE MILITARY ACADEMY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a report of the Visitors on the part of the House to the Military Academy, upon the discipline, instruction, police, administration, and fiscal and other affairs of the Military Academy at West Point, with accompanying reports thereon of the several committees appointed to consider the same; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MAIL CONTRACTS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster-General, transmitting a draught of a bill regulating the method of letting mail contracts, and recommending the same as a substitute for House bill 640, now on the Calendar; which was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

REPORT OF THE COMPTROLLER OF THE CURRENCY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Comptroller of the Currency, transmitting the twenty-second annual report of that officer, as required by section 333 of the Revised Statutes; which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. FINERTY, indefinitely.

To Mr. JOHN S. WISE, for the remainder of this week.

To Mr. CAMPBELL, for three days, on account of important business.

To Mr. WOOD, for one week, on account of important business.

COMMERCIAL CONVENTION BETWEEN UNITED STATES AND MEXICO.

On motion of Mr. HEWITT, of New York, from the Committee on Ways and Means, it was ordered that report No. 1848, to accompany the bill (H. R. 7366) to carry into operation the convention between the United States of America and the United States of Mexico, signed on the 20th day of January, 1883, be reprinted and sent to the document-room for the use of the House.

And then the motion of Mr. REAGAN was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CALDWELL: Petition of Saint Cecelia's Academy, Nashville, Tenn., to refer claim to Court of Claims to correct errors in the decision of the late Southern Claims Commission—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. CLEMENTS: Petition of George W. F. Lamkin, Floyd County, Georgia, for reference of his claim to Court of Claims to correct errors in decision of the late Southern Claims Commission—to the same committee.

By Mr. DUNHAM: Petition of T. H. Patterson, of Chicago, favoring passage of House bill 7492—to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

By Mr. EATON: Papers relating to the claim of James Evelette—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. A. S. HEWITT: Petition of Mary F. Blake, for an increase of pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HOLTON: Papers relating to the claim of George Calvert—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. HOUK: Papers relating to the pension claim of Julia A. Darrell—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. LIBBEY: Papers relating to the claim of Nancy Brown—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. OSSIAN RAY: Petition of George S. Stockwell and 43 others, of Lancaster, N. H., praying that a pension be granted to Mary L. Carr—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. C. A. SUMNER: Petition of Stuart Taylor and others, relative to the claim of Chaplain C. M. Blake—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, December 3, 1884.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

WILKINSON CALL, a Senator from the State of Florida; JOHNSON N. CAMDEN, a Senator from the State of West Virginia; ORVILLE H. PLATT, a Senator from the State of Connecticut, and HARRISON H. RIDDLEBERGER, a Senator from the State of Virginia, appeared in their seats to-day.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

THE GARFIELD STATUE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting the report of the commission designated to select a site and supervise the erection thereon of a pedestal for a statue of the late President Garfield; which was read, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, December 1, 1884.

The Secretary of War has the honor to inform the United States Senate that the commission, consisting of the Secretary of War, the chairman of the Joint Committee on the Library, and the chairman of the Garfield monumental committee of the Society of the Army of the Cumberland, designated by the act of Congress approved July 7, 1884, to select a site and supervise the erection thereon of a pedestal for a statue of the late President James A. Garfield, held a meeting on November 24, 1884, at which the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

"That the commission select as a site for the monument the circle at the foot of the Capitol grounds, situate at the intersection of First street and Maryland avenue southwest, in the city of Washington, D. C."

ROBERT T. LINCOLN,
Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore United States Senate.

The letter, with the report, was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of April 18, 1884, the official report of Lieut. Frederick Schwatka, Third Cavalry, of his military reconnaissance in 1883, from Chilkaht Inlet to Fort Selkirk, on Yukon River, Alaska. If there be no objection the letter will be printed, and, as the accompanying papers are quite voluminous, if there be no objection the letter of the Secretary of War and the accompanying papers will be referred to the Committee on Printing for consideration in respect of printing the document.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. DOLPH presented a memorial of members of the Bar Association of the Counties of Spokane, Adams, Lincoln, and Douglas, in the Territory of Washington, calling attention to the necessity of certain amendments to the act entitled "An act providing for two associate justices of the supreme court of the Territory of Dakota, one additional justice of the supreme court of the Territory of Washington, and for other purposes;" which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LOGAN presented a petition of citizens of Canton, Ill., praying for the repeal of statutes affixing a tenure of four years to certain offices; which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. FRYE presented the petition of Hannibal Hamlin and other citizens of Maine, praying that Charles Morris Blake, post-chaplain, United States Army, retired, be granted certain relief; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HOAR presented the petition of Timothy Ingraham Post, No. 121, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Massachusetts, praying the publication of photographic illustrations in the Official Records of the War of the Rebellion; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GROOME (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2390) granting an increase of pension to Joseph H. Potts; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DOLPH introduced a bill (S. 2391) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," approved June 10, 1880; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I ask leave to introduce a bill, which, for information, being very short, I should like to have read at length, in order to call the attention of the Senate to it.

The bill (S. 2392) to suspend the coinage of the silver dollar was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That on and after the passage of this act the coinage of the silver dollar shall be suspended.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, authorized and directed, on and after the passage of this act, not to reissue any United States notes of the denominations less than $5 then in the Treasury, or which may thereafter be received, and to cancel, destroy, and not reissue, all United States notes of a less denomination than $5 in the Treasury or thereafter received, and to cease engraving or printing all such notes.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, upon the deposit of silver bullion in such subtreasury as he shall designate, to issue to the depositor thereof silver certificates having upon their face the weight and market value of the metal so deposited, calculated in United States gold dollars, at the rate of 25.8 standard grains to the dollar.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and required, on the presentation of any silver certificates issued under the provisions of this act by the legal holders thereof, to redeem the same by delivering to the depositor silver bullion of the weight and fineness certified upon the certificate, and to immediately cancel and destroy said certificate.

Mr. ALDRICH introduced a bill (S. 2393) to change the name of the Slater National Bank, of North Providence, R. I.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WILSON introduced a bill (S. 2394) for the appointment of railway postal clerks, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. GARLAND introduced a bill (S. 2395) to amend section 823 of the Revised Statutes of the United States touching certain fees in the United States courts; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, introduced a bill (S. 2396) for the relief of Bvt. Maj. Gen. William W. Averell, United States Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2397) to define and supplement an act entitled "An act re-establishing the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims, and for the distribution of the unappropriated moneys of the 'Geneva award,'" approved June 5, 1882; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LOGAN introduced a bill (S. 2398) granting a pension to Cyrus Reeser; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, introduced a bill (S. 2399) for the relief of Maj. Michael P. Small; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MANDERSON introduced a bill (S. 2400) granting an increase of pension to Eliza Willson Thornburgh; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MCPHERSON introduced a bill (S. 2401) for the relief of Joseph E. Moore; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

LEASES OF INDIAN LANDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. "Concurrent or other resolutions" being now in order, the Chair lays before the Senate the resolution submitted yesterday by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], which went over under the rule. It will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be instructed to inquire what leases of lands in the Indian Territory for grazing or other purposes have been made by the tribes of Indians therein, the number of acres embraced by each of said leases, the terms thereof, and the persons, corporations, or associations named therein as lessees; also, that the committee inquire as to the circumstances under which said leases were made and the means used for obtaining the same, and whether said leases are authorized by existing legislation or are conducive to the welfare of the Indians in said Territory.

That the committee have power to send for persons and papers, and shall report by bill or otherwise.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. CONGER. With the consent of the mover of the resolution I move to amend, after the words "Indian Territory," in line 2, by inserting the words "or Indian reservation;" and at the end of the first paragraph, after the word "Territory," by inserting "or Indian reservation;" so as to embrace not only the Indian Territory, but the Indian reservations elsewhere.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed, in line 2, after the word "Territory," to insert "or Indian reservation;" and at the end of the first paragraph to add the words "or Indian reservation;" so as to read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be instructed to inquire what leases of lands in the Indian Territory or Indian reservation for grazing or other purposes have been made by the tribes of Indians therein, the number of acres embraced by each of said leases, the terms thereof, and the persons, corporations, or associations named therein as lessees; also, that the committee inquire as to the circumstances under which said leases were made and the means used for obtaining the same, and whether said leases are authorized by existing legislation or are conducive to the welfare of the Indians in said Territory or Indian reservation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Michigan.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

Mr. VEST. On the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, I move, in line 11, to strike out "shall report by bill or otherwise" and insert:

And employ a stenographer, and report by bill or otherwise, and that the actual and necessary expenses of said investigation be paid, on the approval of the chairman of said committee, out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, I wish to make a suggestion to the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs about the scope of the investigation and the report to be made of the result of it to the Senate.

Undoubtedly the investigation itself, in view of the statements that have been made, and in any event, is very desirable and entirely proper to be made; but some result ought to grow out of it; something ought to be done or recommended by the committee to be done as the result of whatever discoveries they may make. I am not speaking now particularly about the allegations which were made by the Senator from Missouri yesterday as to the alleged fraudulent acts of which he spoke that led to the making of one of these leases; but I refer to the lands themselves. There are large areas of pasture lands, and probably agricultural lands also, embraced within Indian reservations, both inside and outside the Indian Territory, which are occupied by persons who have obtained in one way and another grazing and other privileges. Now, the question which presents itself at once is whether those lands are to remain the property of the Indians, and, if so, whether subject to their control solely or to their control in connection with the Executive Department of the Government; and, if the latter, under what regulation or rule of procedure they shall be occupied. This is a very important matter, which no mere investigation will settle, because, if it be determined that the occupancy now is illegal, the question comes at once, How shall occupancy be made legal, or shall there be a positive inhibition against any occupancy at all?

This is not a new question in any phase in which it is presented now, except in regard to the magnitude of it. For many years, and I think ever since there have been Indian reservations, those reservations have been used more or less for grazing purposes by white people, sometimes by white people of the character described by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] yesterday as "squaw-men," that is, men who made the fact of their marriage, as they called it, into the tribe an excuse or opportunity for occupancy of the land, for the acquisition of privileges more or less valuable which other white men could not get; by other persons again who, under the guise of beef contractors or as public employés, in some way have been able to get a legal entry upon the reservations, and by means of that legal entry have made negotiation with the Indians in some shape or other whereby they were permitted to remain on the reservations with stock and perhaps for other purposes as well; and again by persons who by reason simply of negotiation made by the individual with an individual Indian or with more than one Indian but not with the whole tribe, have under the shelter of the right of the Indian with whom the negotiation was made gone upon the reservation and not only pastured cattle but cut timber and done various other things which were a profit to them and perhaps a damage to the reservation.

These things have been going on, as I have said, for many years, and what is being done now and what has been the subject of animadversion here and elsewhere, and which will be investigated under the pending resolution, is only a phase of this more or less general practice.

In addition to that I may say in regard to the particular reservation which was mentioned yesterday by the Senator from Missouri, the Cherokee reservation, the action of the present Secretary of the Interior is not out of keeping, in fact is directly in keeping, with that of one of his predecessors, and I think more than one. I know at all events that the Secretary of the Interior under the administration of Mr. Hayes, the question being presented to him, decided that the Cherokee tribe had the right to give licenses to graze upon those particular lands. They were not for any particular length of time, as I understood, but perhaps were for a year by fair intent; that is to say, the Indians charged the person pasturing stock so much per head per annum, and the payment of that sum would probably have carried the right to keep the cattle there for a year. The Interior Department held that the Cherokee tribe had the right to grant that privilege and to exact that tax, as, I think, it has in other cases held that the Indians have a right to exact a tax for driving cattle across the reservation, which is only another way of saying that the right to occupy the reservation for some time, long or short, may be granted by the Indians.

In the case of the Quapaw reservation in the Indian Territory, a question was presented somewhat similar to that under discussion here in connection with this resolution by the execution of certain leases to white men not members of the tribe by the council of that tribe of Indians for the occupancy for farming purposes of certain lands belonging to that tribe in the Indian Territory. After some consideration the Department decided that those leases, I do not know for what term of years, I am only speaking now from a somewhat general recollection, but I know the Department decided that the leases, such as they were, were legal and proper, and authorized the persons holding the leases to go upon the lands and occupy them. The leases were formally approved, and I presume such occupancy has been continued from that day until this. This was also under the administration of Mr. Hayes; and this was the condition in which the present Secretary found this question when he came into office. It may not be hard to say that these lands or any lands shall not be occupied; it is undoubtedly within the power of Congress to do that; but it would be hard to prevent under any rule of that kind some occupancy other than that of members of the tribe. On the other hand I undertake to say that that would not be a wise declaration. There is no reason why the lands of the various tribes of Indians, if they are to be held by Indians—the Indians themselves do not wish to cultivate or make other practical use of them—should not be occupied for useful purposes by other people any more than there is why the State of Texas should withhold the large body of its grazing lands from occupancy simply because it designed at some future time to do something else with them. It has been the policy of that great State, which leads all the States in the cattle interest, to lease its lands upon proper terms, subject to such conditions as it sees proper to impose, for grazing purposes, and it does that notwithstanding the fact that it designs ultimately to dispose of them to agricultural settlers.

An investigation will undoubtedly disclose the fact that many lands held by the Indians are lands which they do not need, lands which they will never make any beneficial use of, lands which, in a sense at least, are needed to-day for occupancy by settlers who wish to go upon them and make homes. I think when this question comes to be treated by the Committee on Indian Affairs, as I hope it will be, in a thorough and exhaustive manner, we shall have the benefit of the judgment of that committee in regard to the final disposition to be made of these lands; and, pending such final disposition, that we shall have their judgment also as to the regulations under which occupancy of the lands shall be either inaugurated or continued as now existing.

I wish to say one other thing about the action of the Secretary of the Interior. I have stated in substance that the present Secretary of the Interior has followed the action of his predecessor, except that he has not gone so far in approval of leases as his predecessor. The Secretary called the attention of Congress very promptly to what had occurred between persons claiming to lease these lands and the Indians themselves and asked for the direction of Congress on the subject. I do not think it is quite true, as the Senator from Missouri stated yesterday, that the entire Army of the United States has been used for the purpose of expelling persons who were there seeking to graze upon those lands, but who did not hold leases. It may be true that some expulsions have been made. I do not know of any such, however; but I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the position of the Secretary, as expressed in his annual reports, simply is that as between those who have the permission of the Indians to remain upon the reservation for the purpose of pasturage and who pay for the same and those who do not have such permission and who do not pay or propose to pay for the privilege they seek to exercise he will discriminate in favor of the former. He is constantly called on to exercise a discrimination between persons seeking entrance upon Indian reservations in order that the laws may not be violated and the rights of the Indians may be preserved.

As I understand, he regards these leases, so called, as simply temporary expedients, as giving temporary rights; that finding them in existence he simply says, "these persons being there in good faith and paying for the privilege, until some other arrangement is made I will not permit persons who do not propose to pay or who have made no arrangements to pay, who have not obtained permission of the Indians to go upon the lands, to disturb them," and with this he submits the whole matter to Congress for its direction. He does not say that he regards these persons as having rights there of a kind which he can not determine or which can not be determined by legislation, but recognizes simply the status, a condition of things which in the main has existed for a long time—except that now the Indians are receiving some value for the privilege instead of nothing, as heretofore—he permits the continuance of the arrangement until such time as Congress shall determine otherwise, or until it shall be seen that this is against the interests of the Indians.

It is true, as the Senator from Missouri says, that the law forbids a lease, so called, but at the same time there is a section of the statutes, the number of which I do not call to mind, which seems to imply that the Indians may give privileges of grazing, because the statute says that if a person shall graze cattle on Indian land without the consent of the Indians a certain punishment shall follow.

Mr. INGALLS. It is section 2117.

Mr. PLUMB. The number of the section, my colleague states to me, is 2117. There is a provision of the statutes, also, whereby leases made in a certain way, and under certain formalities, are recognized as legal and may properly be approved by the Secretary.

These various sections have been incorporated in the Revised Statutes to meet different classes of cases undoubtedly, and they involve, when they come to be grouped together, some contrariety. Now that this subject is up, we ought to have some rule established by law as the result of the proposed investigation, upon the recommendation of the committee or otherwise, which shall relieve the situation from doubt, and which shall either command all persons upon Indian reservations to leave entirely and dedicate forever the reservations to no use or which shall permit their use upon terms to be prescribed by Congress or the Executive wisdom.

But I am unwilling that this opportunity shall pass without calling attention to the fact that much of the land in the Indian Territory and elsewhere embraced within reservations is fit for agriculture; that they are lands not only fitted for agriculture, but such as the Indians themselves do not need; and that the time has come when by the exhaustion of the public domain it is proper for Congress to consider whether some of them ought not to be, and at a very early day, opened to settlement.

I have in mind now a tract of land in the Indian Territory which I think Congress has the undoubted right to open to settlement. The withholding of settlement from it any longer I regard as unwise and as unnecessary for the maintenance of faith with the Indians and as injurious in every respect. I refer to what is called Oklahoma, at all events the unoccupied portion of it. That land was acquired from the Creek Indians. It is true it was acquired for a specific purpose, for the location of freedmen or friendly Indians upon it, at a time when, in 1866, it was the policy of the Government apparently to locate all the Indians of the United States practically in the Indian Territory, for the purpose of bringing them together in a compact body, so that they could be better controlled and that ultimately the Indian problem could all be worked out in a small area of country. Subsequently, however, that idea was abandoned. The lands have never been required for such a purpose. They have been fully paid for, and the Creek Indians have no title to them. The title is in the Government. It may be said that it is burdened by a condition, having been acquired for a certain purpose, but I think when we come to that Congress has a perfect right to say that it will use the lands for settlement if in so doing the interests of the Indians are not imperiled. I think the time has come when Congress ought to make that declaration and ought by law to open those lands to settlement. I think so not only from the standpoint of those who seek to settle upon them, but from the standpoint of the Indian himself. The Indian Territory remains substantially as a barrier between great States of the Union. It is an anomaly in government and civilization which must in time disappear. It can not long remain. We shall either dispose of the question by degrees, that is to say, opening part of the lands at a time and adjusting the Indians to new relations from time to time and working forward, or we shall wait until population has grown to such a density on the borders of the Territory and the demand for the settlement of its land so overwhelming that the whole structure will disappear at once, and the adjustment of the Indians to the new relation be made under circumstances of great difficulty and with much less chance that full justice will be done them or that they will be fitted for the contact thrust upon them.

The time has come to commence the process of settling up the Indian Territory, and thereby settling that branch of the Indian problem. As the result of this investigation or of any other investigation which touches upon the status of things in the Indian Territory the Committee on Indian Affairs ought to address itself at once to this, at least as grave a portion of the problem as any other one that is presented.

In this connection I wish to call the attention of the committee to the fact that at the last session of Congress I introduced a bill having in view this very idea, the opening to settlement of Oklahoma, or a portion of it, such portion as is not occupied by the Indians, that portion which as we all know the Government never located Indians upon, and which it never will use for that purpose. I do not speak of this because I am wedded to that bill or because I think that in many of its features it is not subject to criticism. It may not go far enough; but it embraces the proper idea and is a starting point for the accomplishment of the object. The subject, of course, is not free from difficulty in the fact that some government perhaps would have to be provided for settlers there before the final break-up came; but at all events something can and ought to be done. A government could be improvised. The lands are there waiting for the occupancy of settlers. It is just as well that the settlers should be there to-day as to postpone it until to-morrow or until the next day or the next year. The country needs the development of the fruitful resources of the Territory. There are men who by reason of their contiguity to those lands, by reason of the exhaustion of the public lands within reach in other quarters, are desirous of going upon them. Already invasions of the Territory have been made. I know they have been characterized harshly here and elsewhere, but I say that they are not more in violation of law or of the rights of the Indians than others which have been made heretofore and which Congress has recognized, if not as constituting a right, at all events as creating a necessity that called for and was followed by Congressional action.

Take the case of the Black Hills, for instance, a portion of the Sioux reservation. When gold was discovered thousands of people went in there. This was in violation of the treaty rights of the Indians, but Congress simply said you can not keep the people out of there any longer, and consequently made a treaty with the Indians whereby they relinquished their rights to those lands and they were opened to settlement. The lands in the Territory to which I have referred will never pass from the Government for any other purpose than that of settlement. They answer no good use in their present condition. Upon what ground, then, can there be any argument for delay? Better act now, and thereby prevent being some day in the near future confronted, if not with the necessity of acting under compulsion, at all events with a very grave situation, made so by the delay which, as I think, is without warrant.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution was agreed to.

PRINTING OF THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask to have the following order made:

Ordered, That there be printed for the immediate use of the Senate the usual number of the message of the President and the reports proper, without appendices, of the heads of the several Executive Departments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. MORRILL. That is hardly necessary.

Mr. HAWLEY. It is a matter of form, being the usual resolution practically. There can be no possible objection to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will not be referred unless there be objection. The question is, Shall the resolution be now considered? The Chair hears no objection. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

MESSENGER TO COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask for the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to appoint an additional messenger, to be assigned to the Committee on Military Affairs; and that the Secretary of the Senate be authorized to pay him out of the contingent fund at the rate of $1,440 per annum.

I desire to state, so that the Senate may understand it, that the Military Committee, although having 37 per cent. of all the business of the Senate before it at the last session of Congress (and that is only a sample of what it has at every session of Congress), has never had a messenger, and it is the only important committee of seven, I think, which has not. I offered a resolution like this at the last session of Congress and it was referred to the Committee on Contingent Expenses, but I never could get it reported. I found no objection to it, but I could not get the resolution reported to the Senate. I now ask that the Senate may take action on this resolution. If they do not desire the committee to have a messenger, be it so; but if it is to have one, I want it provided for at the beginning of the session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CONGER. Let the resolution be reported again.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution.

Mr. INGALLS. I have no objection to the adoption of the resolution, but the rules require that all appropriations of money from the contingent fund shall be referred to the Committee on Contingent Expenses. I presume that unanimous consent could waive the effect of the rule, however.

Mr. LOGAN. I said that if any one objected to the resolution that would be sufficient. I referred, as I will state for the benefit of the Senator, to the fact that the Senate at the last session of Congress sent a similar resolution to the Committee on Contingent Expenses, and I think I applied to the chairman of that committee a dozen times to have it reported, but I could not get it brought before the Senate. No one objected to it, for it is certainly fair that a committee having the business which that committee has before it should have a messenger. Once or twice at the last session of Congress I asked openly to have the resolution reported, but I could not get it done. I desire now that the resolution shall be acted on unless there is objection to it. If there is, of course I do not desire to press it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the paragraph of the twenty-fifth rule which requires, as the Senator from Kansas has suggested (the Chair had forgotten it), that all such resolutions as this, "directing the payment of money out of the contingent fund of the Senate or creating a charge upon the same," shall be referred to the Committee on Contingent Expenses, be suspended for the purpose of passing this resolution. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask the consent of the Senate at this time that I may be relieved from further service upon the Committee on Claims.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska asks that he be relieved from further service upon the Committee on Claims. The question is, Will the Senate discharge the Senator from Nebraska from service upon that committee?

Mr. MANDERSON was excused.

Mr. SLATER. I ask the Senate to excuse me from further service upon the Committee on Fish and Fisheries.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon asks to be excused from further service upon the Committee on Fish and Fisheries. Will the Senate agree to this request?

The request was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask the Senate to excuse me from further service upon the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama asks to be excused from further service upon the Committee on Indian Affairs. The question is, Will the Senate agree to the request?

The request was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. I ask to be excused from service on the Committee to Examine the Several Branches of the Civil Service.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks to be excused from further service upon the standing Committee to Examine the Several Branches of the Civil Service. Will the Senate agree to his request?

The request was agreed to.

MELISSA G. POLAR.

Mr. PIKE. I desire unanimous consent to call up House bill 2344, being No. 919 in the order of business on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent to call up for consideration at this time Order of Business 919, being the bill (H. R. 2344) for the relief of Melissa G. Polar. Is there objection?

Mr. CONGER. There is a bill which was under consideration at the adjournment yesterday. I suppose it will not be displaced by this.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill under consideration at the adjournment yesterday became the unfinished business and will be laid before the Senate at 2 o'clock.

Mr. CONGER. All right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the present consideration of the bill called up by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 2344) for the relief of Melissa G. Polar, which provides for the issue of certain duplicate certificates of indebtedness of the District of Columbia amounting to $18.80.

Mr. PIKE. I desire to say that a bill to accomplish the purpose that this bill contemplates has already passed the House of Representatives and the Senate, but by some error in enrollment it was found ineffectual to accomplish the purpose intended, and this bill is merely to correct that error. This bill also contains some errors, and amendments have been proposed by the Committee on Finance to correct them.

The first amendment of the Committee on Finance was, in section 1, line 6, to strike out the word "huddred" and insert "hundred;" so as to read "eighteen hundred and eighty-four."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 2, after the name "Polar," to insert "the duplicate certificates as provided for in section 1, she;" and in line 5, after the word "paid," to strike out "the duplicate certificates as provided for in section 1," and insert the word "and" in lieu thereof; so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That before said auditor shall deliver to said Melissa G. Polar the duplicate certificates as provided for in section 1, she shall furnish satisfactory proof to said auditor of the loss of said certificates, and that the same have not been paid, and the said Melissa G. Polar shall execute and deliver to said auditor her bond of indemnity, in double the amount of the said certificates, with two sufficient sureties, to be approved by said auditor, payable to the District of Columbia, which bond shall be filed by said auditor in the archives of said office.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

SAINT CROIX RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to take up Order of Business 897, being the bill (S. 2297) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Saint Croix River at the most accessible point between Stillwater and Taylor's Falls, Minn. This bill was reported at the last session and has been upon the Calendar since.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair). The Senator from Minnesota asked that the bill referred to by him be taken up by unanimous consent. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2297) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Saint Croix River at the most accessible point between Stillwater and Taylor's Falls, Minn.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Amendments were reported by the Committee on Commerce to conform to the recommendations of the War Department and to obviate all the objections made to this class of bills.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on Commerce was, in section 2, line 11, after the word "bridge," to strike out "and of such" and insert "and other;" and in the same line, after the word "works," to insert "provided for in this act;" so as to read:

And in order to secure compliance with these conditions the corporation, previous to commencing the construction of the bridge, or of the accessory works designed to secure the best practical channel-way for navigation and confine the flow of the water to a permanent channel at said point, shall submit to the Secretary of War a plan of the bridge and other accessory works provided for in this act, together with a detailed map of the river at the proposed site of the bridge and for a distance of a mile above and below the site, together with all other information touching said bridge and river and accessory works as may be deemed requisite by the Secretary of War to determine whether the said bridge, when built, will conform to the prescribed conditions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 40, after the word "boats," to insert "vessels and other water-craft;" so as to read:

Provided also, That said draw shall be opened promptly upon reasonable signal for the passing of boats, vessels, and other water-craft.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the words "water-craft," in line 40 of section 2, to insert the following proviso:

Provided, however, That no bridge shall be built under the provisions of this act except there also be built, at the time of the erection of the piers, proper sheer-booms or other proper protections to safely guide boats, vessels, rafts, and other water-craft through said draw-spans, and at the expense of the company or corporation erecting said bridge.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendments were, in section 3, line 10, before the word "accessory," to insert "other;" in the same line, after the word "works," to insert "provided for in this act;" in line 13, after the word "or," to strike out "said" and insert "other;" in the same line, after the word "works," to insert "provided for in this act;" and in line 16, after the word "War," to insert "not, however, to be in anywise inconsistent with the provisions or conditions of this act;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed, upon receiving any such plan and map and other information, and upon being satisfied that a bridge built on such plan and with such accessory works and at such locality will conform to the prescribed conditions of this act, to notify the company that he approves the same; and upon receiving such notification the said company may proceed to an erection of said bridge, conforming strictly to the approved plan and location; but until the Secretary of War approve the plan and location of said bridge and other accessory works provided for in this act and notify the company of the same, the bridge shall not be built; and should any change be made in the plan of the bridge or other accessory works, provided for in this act, during the progress of the work thereon, such change shall be subject likewise to the approval of the Secretary of War; not, however, to be in anywise inconsistent with the provisions or conditions of this act.

The amendments were agreed to.

The next amendments were, in section 4, line 2, after the words "according to," to strike out "the terms and limitations thereof" and insert "its provisions and conditions;" and in line 13, after the word "bridge" at the end of the section, to insert "and the United States shall have the right of way for postal-telegraph and telephone lines, free of charge, across said bridge;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. That any bridge and accessory works, when built and constructed under this act and according to its provisions and conditions, shall be a lawful structure; and said bridge shall be recognized and known as a post-route, upon which also no higher charge shall be made for the transmission over the same of the mails, the troops, and the munitions of war of the United States than the rate per mile paid for the transportation over the railroads or public highways leading to said bridge; and said bridge shall enjoy the rights and privileges of other post-routes in the United States; and Congress reserves the right at any time to regulate by appropriate legislation the charges for freight and passengers over said bridge; and the United States shall have the right of way for postal-telegraph and telephone lines, free of charge, across said bridge.

The amendments were agreed to.

The next amendments were, in section 5, line 2, after the word "War," to strike out "on satisfactory proof that a necessity exists therefor;" and after the word "bridge," at the end of line 4, to insert "authorized by the provisions of this act;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 5. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War to require the company or persons owning said bridge to cause such aids to the passage of said bridge authorized by the provisions of this act to be constructed, placed, and maintained, at their own cost and expense, in the form of booms, dikes, piers, or other suitable and proper structures for confining the flow of water to a permanent channel, and for the guiding of rafts, steamboats, and other water-craft safely through the draw and raft spans, as shall be specified in his order in that behalf; and on the failure of the company or persons aforesaid to make and establish such additional structures within a reasonable time the said Secretary shall proceed to cause the same to be built or made at the expense of the United States, and shall refer the matter without delay to the Attorney-General of the United States, whose duty it shall be to institute, in the name of the United States, proceedings in any circuit court of the United States in which such bridge, or any part thereof, is located, for the recovery of the cost thereof; and all moneys accruing from such proceedings shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States.

The amendments were agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 7, in the following words:

SEC. 7. That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ARMS ACCOUNT OF MONTANA.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask leave to call up Senate bill 1921, Order of Business 546. It is a little bill, adjusting the account for arms between the Territory of Montana and the United States. It is reported favorably by the Military Committee—a bill of a single section, recommended by the Secretary of War.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana asks that the bill named by him may be considered at this time. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1921) authorizing the Secretary of War to adjust and settle the account for arms, ammunition, and accouterments between the Territory of Montana and the United States.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read in this case. I believe it is not long.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. HARRISON April 30, 1884:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1921) authorizing the Secretary of War to adjust and settle the account for arms, ammunition, and accouterments between the Territory of Montana and the United States, respectfully report:

That, in response to a letter addressed to the Secretary of War upon the subject, the committee have received the following communications:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, April 24, 1884.

SIR: In response to your letter of the 16th instant, inclosing S. 1921, a bill "authorizing the Secretary of War to adjust and settle the account for arms, ammunition, and accouterments between the Territory of Montana and the United States," and requesting the views of the Department thereon, I have the honor to transmit herewith a report, dated the 22d instant, from the Chief of Ordnance of the Army, to whom the subject had been referred.

Attention is respectfully invited to the recommendation of the Chief of Ordnance with reference to relieving the Territory of Montana of the charge of $67,561.50 now standing against it on account of the issue of 1867, which is concurred in by me.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ROBERT T. LINCOLN,
Secretary of War.

Hon. BENJ. HARRISON,
Of Committee on Military Affairs, United States Senate.

ORDNANCE OFFICE, WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., April 22, 1884.

SIR: I have the honor to return letter of 16th instant, from Senator BENJAMIN HARRISON, inclosing bill S. 1921, "authorizing the Secretary of War to adjust and settle the account for arms, ammunition, and accouterments between the Territory of Montana and the United States," and to report:

In 1867 a large issue of arms, &c., was made to the Territory of Montana upon the recommendation of Lieutenant-General Sherman and General Grant, and the approval of the Secretary of War, amounting to $67,561.50. I inclose copy of these recommendations and approval, which show that the issue was to enable the people of Montana to "protect themselves" and relieve us (the Army) to that extent, and that the arms were "to be distributed under the directions of General Sherman."

Since that time arms, &c., to the value of $1,735.27 have been issued to Montana. The aggregate amount, $69.296.77, has been reduced by the credit of annual quotas for arming and equipping the militia, so that at the present time the indebtedness of the Territory is $39,551.97. There have since been issued to Montana 1,000 Springfield breech-loading rifles, caliber .50, &c., under the act of May 21, 1872, and 500 more under the joint resolution of July 3, 1876. These 1,500 arms, &c., are not included in the above, nor charged to the quota of the Territory, nor included in the above present indebtedness of $39,551.77.

The 1,200 old muzzle-loading guns stated by Senator HARRISON as being in possession of the Territory of Montana are a portion of the issue of 2,500 made in 1867. These arms are charged on our books at $11.94 each. The present market value of these arms is not more than one-fourth of that charged.

It will be noticed, however, that in 1872 and 1876 1,500 breech-loading rifles, with accouterments, and 225,000 cartridges were issued to the Territory. Although these were not of the latest caliber and model, they were excellent arms.

As the issue in 1867, amounting to $67,561.50, was for a special purpose, under an exigency, and was a relief to the Army in protecting the people of Montana, it would seem proper to relieve the Territory of that charge. In 1875 Congress relieved the different States of charges on their quota, under the law for arming and equipping the militia, for arms issued and which were used during the rebellion. This of Montana is in a sense a parallel case, and I recommend that the Territory be relieved of this charge of $67,561.50.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. V. BENÉT,
Brigadier-General, Chief of Ordnance.

The Hon. SECRETARY OF WAR.

[From Saint Louis.]

OFFICE UNITED STATES MILITARY TELEGRAPH, WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., February 20, 1867.

To General U. S. GRANT:

I think very well of your proposition to let the governor of Montana have 2,500 stand of arms to arm the militia of the Territory. There is a good class of people in Montana, and if they can protect themselves it relieves us to that extent.

W. T. SHERMAN, Lieutenant-General.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY, March 26, 1867.

Respectfully forwarded to the Secretary of War, with the recommendation that 2,500 infantry arms and a battery of mountain howitzers be issued to the Territory of Montana, to be distributed under the directions of General Sherman.

U. S. GRANT, General.

MARCH 28, 1867.

Approved, and referred to the Chief of Ordnance for issue.
By order of the Secretary of War.

ED. SCHRIVER, Major-General.

Respectfully submitted to the Secretary of War, with the recommendation that the ammunition and also accouterments be issued.

A. B. DYER,
Brevet Major-General, Chief of Ordnance.

MARCH 29, 1867.

I would suggest that 300 rounds per gun, both small-arms and howitzers, be furnished on the within orders.

U. S. GRANT, General.

WAR DEPARTMENT, March 29, 1867.

Approved, as recommended by General Grant and the Chief of Ordnance.
By order of the Secretary of War.

L. H. PELOUZE,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

The committee recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SELECT COMMITTEES.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to submit a resolution respecting the organization of the Senate, which is privileged.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the select committees of the Senate in existence July 7, 1884, be revived and continued during the present session, with all the powers and authorities heretofore given by the Senate to each of the select committees on the respective subjects to which they relate.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the Senator whether under the rules that order does not already exist.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will say that several Senators who have examined it think not. They think this order is necessary as to select committees, but the standing committees do remain during the Congress.

Mr. COCKRELL. I thought they were all on the same footing; but this can do no harm.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know that I am justified in quoting the opinion of the permanent presiding officer, but it is his opinion and the opinion of several Senators that committees which were made by special order have expired unless continued by some such resolution as this. I submit it for present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The rule upon the subject will be read, that it may appear in the RECORD.

The Secretary read from Rule XXV as follows.

STANDING COMMITTEES.

The following standing committees shall be appointed at the commencement of each Congress, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution offered by the Senator from Ohio? The Chair hears none.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

COMMITTEE VACANCIES.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to offer another resolution in the same line, to authorize the President pro tempore to fill any vacancies which have occurred in the standing committees by death or otherwise or that may occur within a few days. One of our members is dead and there are several vacancies. I make that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio moves that the President pro tempore of the Senate be authorized to fill any vacancies that have occurred in the standing or select committees.

Mr. SHERMAN. That have occurred or that may occur during the present week.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Or that may occur during the present week. Is there objection to the present consideration of that motion? The Chair hears none.

The motion was agreed to.

FORFEITURE OF OREGON LAND GRANT.

Mr. SLATER. I give notice that on Monday next I shall move to take up Order of Business 761, being the bill (H. R. 181) to declare forfeiture of certain lands granted to aid in the construction of a railroad in Oregon. I desire to say that I shall press the bill to a passage at as early a day as possible after it is taken up.

GOVERNMENT'S INTEREST IN ENCUMBERED PROPERTY.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Resolutions are still in order. If there be no further resolutions, the Calendar under Rule VIII is now in order. Order of Business 314, being the bill (S. 1733) to provide for protecting the interests of the United States in respect of any incumbrances on property wherein they have an interest, was passed over yesterday. Order of Business 320, being the bill (S. 1170) for the relief of Richard Hawley & Sons, was under consideration yesterday, and became the unfinished business.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND], who reported Senate bill 1733, is here.

Mr. GARLAND. I understand that the committees by resolution have been continued as they were on the 7th of July. I desire to make a motion to recommit to the Committee on the Judiciary what is known as Order of Business 314, being Senate bill 1733, for further examination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas moves that Senate bill 1733 be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVES DUNCAN AND EVINS.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, communicated to the Senate resolutions passed by the House on the announcement of the death of WILLIAM A. DUNCAN, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania, and like resolutions passed by the House on the announcement of the death of JOHN H. EVINS, late a Representative from the State of South Carolina.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Several messages in writing of an executive character were received from the President of the United States by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

Mr. INGALLS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty-eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 1 o'clock and 46 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 3, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

The following additional members appeared:

Messrs. BINGHAM, CLAY, DEUSTER, GREEN, GUENTHER, HENLEY, NEECE, RANNEY, RUSSELL, SHELLEY, WEAVER, WADSWORTH, and YOUNG.

WILLIAM S. HOWARD.

Mr. HOLMAN, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Accounts:

Resolved, That William S. Howard, authorized to be employed as a page during the first session of this Congress and assigned to duty at the subcommittee-room of the Committee on Appropriations, be continued in such employment during the present session, and that he be paid out of the contingent fund of the House the same compensation as other pages of the House from December 1, 1884.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK, HILLSBOROUGH, OHIO.

Mr. HART. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the House Calendar the bill (H. R. 7428) to authorize the Hillsborough National Bank to change its name to that of the First National Bank of Hillsborough, Ohio, and put the same upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read subject to objection.

The bill was read, and is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the name of the Hillsborough National Bank of Hillsborough, Ohio, shall be changed to the First National Bank of Hillsborough, Ohio, whenever the board of directors of said bank shall accept the new name by resolutions of the board, and cause a copy of such resolutions, duly authenticated, to be filed with the Comptroller of the Currency: Provided, That such acceptance be made within six months after the passage of this act.

SEC. 2. That all debts, demands, liabilities, rights, privileges, and powers of the Hillsborough National Bank of Hillsborough, Ohio, shall devolve upon and inure to the First National Bank of Hillsborough, Ohio, whenever such change of name is effected.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio if this bill has the approval of a committee of the House.

Mr. HART. It has the unanimous approval of the Committee on Banking and Currency.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the House Calendar, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HART moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. COX, of New York, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Clerk be authorized to employ Harry Blair Smith as a page at the Clerk's desk in the Hall, and pay him at the rate of $2 per day out of the contingent fund of the House until further ordered.

Mr. COX, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LIEUT. JAMES M. BLADES.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 7511) granting an increase of pension to Lieut. James M. Blades, Company H, Sixth Regiment Illinois Cavalry Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF HEALTH OFFICER OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, by unanimous consent, also introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 288) authorizing the printing of 2,500 extra copies of the annual report of the health officer of the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed.

BRIDGE ACROSS SAINT CROIX RIVER.

Mr. WASHBURN. I ask unanimous consent to take from the House Calendar for present consideration the bill (H. R. 3258) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Saint Croix River at the most accessible point between Stillwater and Taylor's Falls, Minn.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read for information, after which objections, if any, will be in order.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Minneapolis, Sault Sainte Marie and Atlantic Railway Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Wisconsin, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct and maintain a bridge, and approaches thereto, over the Saint Croix River, between the States of Minnesota and Wisconsin, at the most accessible point between the city of Stillwater and the village of Taylor's Falls, on said river. Said bridge shall be constructed to provide for the passage of railway trains, and, at the option of the corporation by which it may be built, may be used for the passage of wagons and vehicles of all kinds, for the transit of animals and for foot passengers, for such reasonable rates of toll as may be approved from time to time by the Secretary of War.

SEC. 2. That any bridge built under this act shall be constructed and built without material interference with the security and convenience of navigation of said river beyond what is necessary to carry into effect the rights and privileges hereby granted; and in order to secure a compliance with these conditions the corporation, previous to commencing the construction of the bridge, or of the accessory works designed to secure the best practical channel-way for navigation and confine the flow of the water to a permanent channel at said point, shall submit to the Secretary of War a plan of the bridge and of such accessory works, together with a detailed map of the river at the proposed site of the bridge and for a distance of a mile above and below the site, together with all other information touching said bridge and river and accessory works as may be deemed requisite by the Secretary of War to determine whether the said bridge when built will conform to the prescribed conditions of this act. That said bridge shall be constructed and built without material interference with the security and convenience of navigation of said river beyond what is necessary to carry into effect the rights and privileges hereby granted: Provided, That as to any bridge built under this act, if the said bridge shall be made with unbroken and continuous spans, it shall not be of less elevation in any case than fifty feet above extreme high-water mark, as understood at the point of location, to the bottom chord of the bridge, nor shall the spans of said bridge be less than one hundred and fifty feet in length, and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel with the current of said river, and the main span shall be over the main channel of the river and not less than one hundred and fifty feet in length: And provided also, That if any bridge built under this act shall be constructed as a draw-bridge, the same shall be constructed as a pivot draw-bridge, with a draw over the main channel of the river at an accessible and navigable point, and with spans of not less than one hundred and ten feet in length in the clear on each side of the central or pivot pier of the draw: Provided also, That said draw shall be opened promptly upon reasonable signal for the passing of boats; and said company or corporation shall maintain, at its own expense, from sunset to sunrise, such lights or other signals on said bridge as the Secretary of War shall prescribe.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed, upon receiving any such plan and map and other information and upon being satisfied that a bridge built on such plan and with such accessory works and at such locality will conform to the prescribed conditions of this act, to notify the company that he approves the same; and upon receiving such notification the said company may proceed to an erection of said bridge, conforming strictly to the approved plan and location; but until the Secretary of War approves the plan and location of said bridge and accessory works and notify the company of the same, the bridge shall not be built; and should any change be made in the plan of the bridge or said accessory works during the progress of the work thereon, such change shall be subject likewise to the approval of the Secretary of War.

SEC. 4. That any bridge and accessory works, when built and constructed under this act and according to the terms and limitations thereof, shall be a lawful structure; and said bridge shall be recognized and known as a post-route, upon which also no higher charge shall be made for the transmission over the same of the mails, the troops, and the munitions of war of the United States than the rate per mile paid for the transportation over the railroads or public highways leading to said bridge; and said bridge shall enjoy the rights and privileges of other post-routes in the United States; and Congress reserves the right at any time to regulate by appropriate legislation the charges for freight and passengers over said bridge.

SEC. 5. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved; and the right to require any changes in said structure, at the expense of the owners thereof, whenever Congress shall decide that the public interests require it, is also expressly reserved.

SEC. 6. That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill which has just been read?

Mr. GIBSON. I object.

Mr. WASHBURN. I will state to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GIBSON] that this bill has been unanimously reported by the Committee on Commerce and that it has all the provisions found in any bridge bill. This railroad is nearly built, and it is very important that the bill should be promptly passed.

Mr. GIBSON. I observe that the spans provided for are very much less than those provided for in the case of other streams.

Mr. WASHBURN. But this is a very small stream and the navigation is very unimportant; only small boats navigate it. This bill was fully considered by the Committee on Commerce on that very point, and on investigation they were satisfied the spans were sufficiently wide. I will state also that the bill is recommended by the Secretary of War.

Mr. GIBSON. Is it unanimously recommended by the Committee on Commerce?

Mr. WASHBURN. It is.

Mr. GIBSON. I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there further objection? (After a pause.) The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WASHBURN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC RAILROAD LAND GRANT.

Mr. COBB. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 7162) to forfeit the unearned lands granted to the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific coast, and to restore the same to settlement, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments, for the purpose of moving nonconcurrence in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The amendments of the Senate will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The amendments of the Senate were read, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "forfeited," in line 19, on page 1, down to and including line 7, on page 2, and insert:

"And the title thereto resumed by the United States and said lands declared to be part of the public domain, but not subject to disposal under the general laws of the United States until after the termination of the legal proceedings prescribed by this act."

Page 2, at the end of line 7, insert:

"Provided, That the price of the lands so forfeited and restored shall be the same as heretofore fixed for the even-numbered sections within said grant."

"SEC. 2. That jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the circuit court of the United States for the western district of Missouri to hear and determine all questions and controversies concerning the rights and equities in said forfeited lands that are claimed or asserted by the United States, or by any person or corporation claiming the same under or in consequence of any law of the United States, or any act of its lawfully authorized agents, and to enforce any judgment or decree, either interlocutory or final, that said court shall render in respect of said lands or any interest therein.

"SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the district attorney of the United States for the western district of Missouri, under the direction of the Department of Justice, immediately to proceed, in the circuit court of the United States for the said district, by bill in equity in the name of the United States of America as plaintiff, against any corporations or persons that claim any interest in the lands hereby declared forfeited arising under said act of Congress approved July 27, 1866, or under this act, so as to bring before said court for its determination the validity of such claim, whether the same be legal or equitable."

"SEC. 4. That any person or corporation not made a party defendant in said proceeding, but claiming any interest under the laws of the United States in the lands or any part thereof which are declared forfeited by this act, may present such claim by petition in said cause, duly verified by oath, and if the court, upon consideration thereof, shall decide that the adjudication and settlement of such claim is necessary to do complete justice in said cause, the court shall direct that such further proceeding be had upon such petition as that the same may be fully heard and determined, and shall proceed to decree upon the same as fully as if such petitioner had been made a party defendant in said suit: Provided, That no such petition shall be filed after twelve months from the date of the filing of the bill in said cause.

"SEC. 5. That the court, if it shall see fit, may tax all the costs of the suit under the third section of this act against the United States, and shall apportion the costs of any proceeding under the fourth section of this act between the parties according to justice and equity. Any party to the suit instituted under this act shall have the right of appeal from any final decree therein to the Supreme Court of the United States in the same manner and under the same conditions as are prescribed by law and the rules of said court of appeals in equity cases; And the Supreme Court shall cause said appeal to be advanced on the docket so that the same shall be speedily determined. But no right of appeal shall exist after six months from the time when said final decree is entered on the records of the circuit court of the United States.

"SEC. 6. Nothing in this act shall be construed to recognize the right of said company to any land in the Indian Territory or claim thereto on condition or otherwise, except the right of way and land for stations."

There being no objection, the amendments of the Senate were nonconcurred in.

Mr. COBB moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. COBB. I now move that a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses be asked for by the House.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER subsequently announced as the members of the committee of conference on the part of the House, Mr. COBB, Mr. HENLEY, and Mr. PAYSON.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent to take up for present consideration the bill which I have sent to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. REAGAN. I shall have to object.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. This will take but a moment; it is a very brief bill.

Mr. REAGAN. That may be so, but time is precious.

Mr. RANDALL. With consent of the gentleman from Texas——

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been called for.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to make a motion to dispense with the morning hour in order to reach in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union the consideration of the bill making temporary provision for the naval service.

Mr. REAGAN. I will give way for that purpose, if thereby the regular order is not displaced.

Mr. RANDALL. The order in regard to the gentleman's bill makes exception in favor of appropriation bills; and of course the consideration of the bill I desire to bring up will not displace the measure in which the gentleman from Texas is interested.

The SPEAKER. Not at all. That bill will retain its place. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] moves to dispense with the morning hour.

The motion was agreed to (two-thirds voting in favor thereof).

TEMPORARY APPROPRIATIONS FOR NAVAL SERVICE.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill I have indicated.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. COX, of New York, in the chair, and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7510) making temporary provision for the naval service.

The Clerk having read the bill the first time for information,

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, unless some member of the House desires to discuss this bill at length I shall ask unanimous consent that general debate may be regarded as closed. For my own part I feel that under the five-minute rule I shall be able to explain the provisions of the bill without consuming time under the hour rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that general debate on this bill be regarded as terminated. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Clerk, proceeding to read the bill by paragraphs for amendment, read the following:

Be it enacted, &c., That for the purpose of providing for the expenses of the naval service for the six months ending June 30, 1885, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, one-half, or 50 per cent., of the sums of money (and for the like purposes and continuing the same provisions relating thereto) as were appropriated for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, by the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1883 (except as hereinafter declared), subject to all the limitations and conditions in respect to the disbursement of the appropriations hereby made that were imposed by said act and the other laws of the United States upon or in respect to the appropriations made by said act: Provided, That nothing is appropriated by this act for the purposes set forth in said act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year 1884 under the heading "Increase of the Navy" and preceding the heading "Naval Academy," "For special ocean surveys and the publication thereof," or "For the purchase and manufacture, after full investigation and test, in the United States, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, of torpedoes adapted to naval warfare, or of the right to manufacture the same, and for the fixtures and machinery necessary for operating the same;" nor is there reappropriated any balance of the appropriation made for commencing the manufacture of steel rifled breech-loading guns, with carriages and ammunition, that remained unexpended during the fiscal year 1883; but in lieu of such reappropriation there is hereby appropriated for such manufacture, during the six months herein provided for, the sum of $25,000; and that the clause under the heading "Bureau of Yards and Docks" commencing "For general maintenance of yards and docks" is amended so as to appropriate for the six months herein provided for the sum of $110,000.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania what is the balance of the appropriation made for the fiscal year 1883 for the manufacture of steel rifled breech-loading guns. I see that in lieu of the reappropriation of that balance this bill proposes to appropriate $25,000.

Mr. RANDALL. I think a brief recital of the history of the original appropriation for this purpose may prove to be a satisfactory response to the very proper inquiry of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BLOUNT. I shall be glad to hear such a statement.

Mr. RANDALL. There was originally appropriated by the act for the fiscal year 1883 $100,000 for the manufacture of rifled guns, with carriages and ammunition. By the act for the fiscal year 1884 there was made a reappropriation of any unexpended balance of the sum of $100,000. I believe $82,000 remained unexpended, which sum was subsequently expended. So that this was the amount reappropriated by that act. When the act providing appropriations for the naval service for the first six months of the present fiscal year came to be administered some doubt arose as to the effect of the 50 per cent. clause on this item in the act for 1884 reappropriating the balance of the $100,000 originally appropriated. That question was left to the judgment of the First Comptroller, who decided that the act known as the six-months act had the effect of creating an appropriation of $41,000—a sum equal to one-half of the unexpended balance which had previously been reappropriated. Under that construction of the law, to which as a layman I do not give my entire acquiescence, there has been or will be expended about $25,000 of the $41,000. There is therefore remaining unexpended of the $41,000, which the Department has claimed the right to expend under the six-months act, about $16,000. But the committee did not feel desirous to confirm the construction of the law which actually gave the Department, based upon the original appropriation of $100,000, $141,000, of which $125,000 have been expended. The committee preferred to revoke all past legislation bearing on this subject and start afresh with a distinct appropriation, thus avoiding this technical if not doubtful construction.

The effect is to save $16,000 on the first six-months act, and again to use language no longer capable of the construction placed on said act.

Twenty-five thousand dollars will be a sufficient sum, as we understand, to meet fully the requirements of the Navy Department for work in progress. It is true the Department has asked for $25,000 more for the purpose of purchasing foreign steel to be used in the manufacture of a type-gun of 12-inch caliber. But the committee preferred to postpone any legislation on that subject until Congress should have the benefit of the opinion of the gun-foundery board and also the opinion of a committee of the Senate and a committee of the House in relation to that subject.

Mr. BLOUNT. Then, as I understand, the effect of the provision in this bill is the reduction of the appropriation to the extent of about $32,000 for the year.

Mr. RANDALL. Yes. The effect of this entire legislation, to wit, the original appropriation of $100,000, together with the reappropriation in the act of the following year, taken in connection with the construction placed upon the six-months law of last session, would be an appropriation during the three years of $150,000, the six-months act having been construed as creating an appropriation of $41,000, based on one-half of the amount fixed as an unexpended balance which was before reappropriated. We propose by this bill a new appropriation of $25,000 for the next six months, the Department having already expended or contracted to expend for this purpose during the first half of the current fiscal year $25,000. We gave a like amount for the last six months of the current fiscal year. The aggregate amount appropriated for and expended for this purpose during the entire year up to June 30, 1885, will probably be about $50,000.

Mr. BLOUNT. I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania to say that under the act of 1884 some eighty-odd thousand dollars was left.

Mr. RANDALL. Under the law for 1884 known as the reappropriation clause there were $82,000 left that had to be reappropriated, or otherwise under another general law they would have lapsed or gone back into the Treasury.

Mr. BLOUNT. I understood further they claim that by operation of the act of 1884 a sum of money equal to eighty-odd thousand dollars was appropriated, and that for the first six months they could expend forty-one-odd thousand dollars, and that they had actually expended about $25,000. This bill provides they shall not exceed $25,000 additional for the last six months, which would make for the year a saving of about thirty thousand odd dollars.

Mr. RANDALL. I understand they did expend all of that $82,000, or nearly so. They did claim the right during the first six months of this fiscal year to expend $41,000, but have expended only about $25,000 of that amount. The Committee on Appropriations deem that during the second six months the amount already expended, or that is likely to be expended, during the remainder of this first six months would be sufficient for the next six months. I do not understand any one in the committee or any one of the officials of the Navy Department objects to this, only that they ask an additional $25,000 for the purchase of foreign steel.

Mr. BLOUNT. I was not asking with a view of dissenting, but I could not tell from the language of the act what it meant.

Mr. RANDALL. The interpretation placed on the law has had the effect of making it difficult to explain in terms exactly what was meant. I have endeavored to do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not understand there is any amendment pending on which this debate is proceeding.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no substantial amendment to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. Then debate is not in order.

Mr. RANDALL. I move, then, to strike out the last word.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether I correctly understood him to say there is here an appropriation for the purpose of purchasing foreign steel?

Mr. RANDALL. The amount asked for of $25,000 in excess of what is herein appropriated for the second six months was, as we were informed, for the purpose of purchasing foreign steel to be used in the manufacture of a 12-inch breech-loading gun. The committee did not think, in the presence of a report not yet made to the House but which

I noticed the President referred to in his annual message as to the capability of American manufacturers to make steel for this purpose, it was necessary to make any appropriation for the purchase of foreign steel, and it has therefore omitted to do so.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That was the question I wished to ask, whether the rumor we have heard is true that we are not able in this country to supply the steel required for the manufacture of breech-loading guns.

Mr. RANDALL. The committee were not willing by indirection or in direct words to affirm anything in connection with that matter. We were not willing to anticipate the conclusions of the two or three organizations now making investigation into the subject. I join with the gentleman from Ohio in the expression of the hope that it will be made conclusive that American manufacturers can produce as good steel for any purpose as any foreign steel which can be brought into the United States.

As there seems to be no further questions to be asked, Mr. Chairman, I will by unanimous consent now withdraw my formal amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

That all appropriations made by the act of July 7, 1884, making temporary provision for the naval service for the six months ending December 31, 1884, or any balances thereof that may be unexpended at that date, except any balance for the manufacture of steel rifled breech-loading guns as aforesaid, be, and they are hereby, reappropriated, continued, and made available for the remainder of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of saying a word. This clause reappropriates and continues all balances, except for steel rifled breech-loading guns, that may remain unexpended December 31 of the appropriations made for the six months ending that date to June 30, 1885.

It is for the purpose of making the two six-months acts come together, or merging the first with the last, and thus avoid a settlement of the books at the end of the first six months of the fiscal year. In other words, sir, the effect of this clause is to make these two appropriation bills as though but one appropriation bill for the maintenance of the Navy had been passed, and that for the entire year. I withdraw the formal amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now read the third and concluding paragraph of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the whole amount appropriated by this act for the support of the naval service for the six months herein provided for shall not exceed, exclusive of the amounts herein reappropriated and the amount payable from the income from the naval pension fund for the support of the Naval Asylum at Philadelphia, the sum of $6,734,717.11.

Mr. RANDALL. I will now move to strike out the last word, so as to say, in order, that the total amount appropriated by this act for the six months ending June 30, 1885, is $6,734,717.11; amount appropriated for six months ending December 31, 1884 (including $2,150,100 for steel cruisers and $41,632.50 under reappropriation for steel rifled breech-loading guns), $8,901,449.61; total amount for 1885, $15,636,166.72; amount of law for 1884, $15,894,434.23; reduction of 1885 under 1884, $258,267.51. I withdraw the formal amendment, and now move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COX, of New York, reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7510) making temporary provision for the naval service, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. RANDALL demanded the previous question.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. This being a general appropriation bill, under the rule the vote on its passage will be taken by yeas and nays.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 235, nays 0, not voting 87; as follows:

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE with Mr. VALENTINE, for this day.

Mr. PRYOR with Mr. BELFORD, for this day.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The SPEAKER. The House now resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5461) to establish a board of commissioners of interstate commerce and to regulate such commerce. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SEYMOUR] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SEYMOUR. Mr. Speaker, if the importance of this bill is to be measured by the number of bills concerning interstate commerce which were referred to the Committee on Commerce at the last session, then the remark of the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] that it is one of the most important bills now pending was fully justified. The committee have appreciated its importance and have given the subject patient and careful consideration for many weeks. As the result of their deliberations they have presented the bill reported by them with the understanding, perhaps the unusual understanding, stated in the report, that it shall be considered no mark of disrespect toward the committee for its individual members to offer such amendments as may make it conform to their individual views.

Taking advantage of that understanding, I shall at the proper time submit at least one amendment, which it seems to me will tend to perfect the bill and make it more acceptable to the House.

But at this point I desire to call attention to the scope and object of the bill as it stands. Briefly and generally, its purport is to declare certain specified acts of interstate railroads unlawful, to furnish sundry remedies, to provide sundry penalties, and to create a railroad commission, with power to prevent and put a stop to such unlawful acts, to assist in applying the remedies and enforcing the penalties, and also (and herein lies the chief merit of the bill, in my opinion) to investigate all grievances brought to its notice, with power, after careful examination, to make such recommendations to Congress for future legislation respecting interstate commerce as may reach all well-founded complaints and remedy the evils complained of, thus taking the detailed examination of the complaints upon which the demand for legislation is based out of Congress in the first instance, and placing it in the hands of commissioners, who have not only more time to devote to it, but who, by the inspection of books and papers, schedules and contracts, by the investigation of real instead of hypothetical cases of complaint, can act more intelligently than a committee of Congress can possibly do.

These objects which the bill seeks to accomplish certainly ought to be accomplished in some way. But too much faith must not be put in any legislation aiming to govern the operations of trade and commerce. Over legislation respecting details attempts to regulate every particular act by special statute, instead of relying upon an enforcement of those general principles which are the sure foundation of our common law, aided and re-enforced by such general statutes as may from time to time be necessary, are to be avoided as far as possible.

And there is danger that in attempting to interfere too minutely with the methods of trade more harm than good will result. There are certain natural "laws of trade" which will, in a country where competition is open and capital for new enterprises abundant, in the main and in the end prevail, combinations and selfishness to the contrary notwithstanding. If this bill seems to lose sight of these principles in any of its provisions, and I think it does in one particular at least, to which attention will presently be called, it can easily be amended, and should be amended so as to conform to them. Its general object is beneficent, namely, as I have already said, to declare certain indefensible acts unlawful, to provide specific remedies for evils which it is claimed exist, together with penalties for its violation, and to create a board of commissioners with powers and duties as provided in the bill.

Now permit me to explain more particularly the provisions by which it is sought to carry out these objects, that the House may judge of their efficiency and determine whether all of them are wise and expedient, or whether some had better be omitted or amended. The bill begins by re-enacting the common-law principle that all charges for services by persons engaged in interstate commerce shall be reasonable. The purpose of this re-enactment is twofold: first, to emphasize the principle, as the keynote of the proposed legislation; and, second, to make the bill harmonious and symmetrical. It is, then, made unlawful for those affected by the act to charge or receive any greater or less amount of compensation from one person than they charge or receive from any other person for like and contemporaneous services rendered under substantially similar circumstances. They are required to furnish, without discrimination, equal facilities to all for the carriage, receiving, delivery, storage, and handling of all property of like character carried by them, and to perform with equal expedition like services for all.

No one can justly find fault with these provisions, which it was represented to the committee are necessary for the protection of freighters, nor with the one which follows them, making it unlawful in the transportation of property directly or indirectly to allow any rebate, drawback, or other advantage in any form upon shipments made or services rendered which under similar circumstances are not allowed to all other persons.

It was urged by some that no rebate or drawback should be allowed to any one under any circumstances. But it is a sufficient answer to such claim that a rebate or drawback which is allowed to all, if to any, ceases to be a discriminating rebate. It can not harm customers, but may help them and the railroad alike. If, for example, after freight has been shipped from Chicago to New York upon schedule rates over one of the trunk lines, it is discovered that one of the other lines is carrying upon cheaper terms, there is no unfairness in permitting the former line to rebate enough from its schedule rates to make its charge conform to that of the latter line, and so retain its customer, doing injustice to no one.

Without provisions permitting such action a statute forbidding rebates altogether would be unjust to carriers and customers alike. We should strike at unjust, unequal rebates, but not at those which are entirely justifiable, as are those in the supposed case.

The bill reported by the committee then goes on to make it unlawful for the railroads embraced in the act to enter into any contract or combination for the pooling of freights, or to, in fact, pool the freights of different and competing railroads by dividing between them the aggregate or net proceeds of the earnings of such railroads or any portion of them.

The pooling proposed to be legislated against is pooling by the division between competing railroads engaged in interstate commerce of their aggregate or net proceeds. The term "pooling" has become somewhat odious.

It has been assumed that the pooling of earnings by railroads is necessarily hostile to the interests of freighters and consumers. Such assumption is unwarranted, in my judgment.

It was shown to the satisfaction of a portion at least of your committee, in the course of this investigation, that there may be a pooling of freights or earnings, so called, which inures to the advantage of freighters and consumers.

It was argued that it may be and often is a powerful means of preventing railroad wars and the cutting of freights; that whatever may be the momentary and seeming result of railroad wars and freight cutting, its ultimate effect is to the disadvantage of freighters; that freighters are interested in having uniform rates; that their contracts are based upon existing rates, and that fluctuations created by railroad wars are necessarily injurious to freighters as a class, even though individual freighters may gain temporary advantage in consequence of them.

Then, again, it may be suggested, and experience warrants the suggestion, that the losses to the railroads occasioned by such wars are uniformly made up by increased rates, or in some other way, when peace is restored, so that, as I have already said, freighters as a class, and in the long run, and consequently consumers also, are losers by these railroad disturbances. These and other arguments, leading me to distrust the soundness of any claim that real honest advantage can be gained by any class through business disturbances, force me to believe that our true policy lies in so regulating these pooling contracts as to make only those unlawful the intent, purpose, and effect of which are to raise charges above reasonable rates and are calculated to divide earnings on any other basis than a reasonable accordance with service to impair reasonable competition. And to provide against any evasion of this wholesome restriction it should be enacted that every such contract shall be open and in writing, and that a copy thereof shall, as soon as executed, be sent by the parties thereto to the board of commissioners created by this act.

At the proper time I propose to offer an amendment to carry out these suggestions, which, if passed, will prevent the evils which are attributed to pooling, and preserve to the public any advantages claimed in its behalf. And if it should turn out, upon full investigation of the subject by the commissioners, that pooling for any purpose is incompatible with public policy, they will so report, and Congress will no doubt hasten to forbid it.

All through its text the bill is guarded by provisions, in different sections and parts of sections, against its evasion by collusive or unnecessary breaks, stoppages, or interruptions, made to prevent the carriage of any property from being continuous, or to make it appear to be local traffic when in fact it is interstate traffic, such as the bill is intended to effect.

For the violation of any of the provisions of the act any railroad company, officer of such company, or other person is made liable to the injured party for the actual damages, and when the violation is found to be willful the court may allow, by way of additional costs, a sufficient sum to cover his counsel fees and his expenses, charges, and disbursements.

Now, the gentleman from Texas animadverted upon this bill as not being sufficiently strong in its penal provisions, as you will remember. I think he had forgotten—I had, I am sure, at that time—the full scope of the bill in respect to the additional costs which might be allowed for any breach of the provisions of the bill.

In addition the offender is held guilty of a misdemeanor and subject to a fine of not more than $1,000 for each violation. And it is made the duty of the district attorneys of the United States to institute and prosecute to effect all violations within their jurisdiction to prosecute; it being provided, however, for manifest reasons, that these penal provisions shall not apply to the first section of the act, which enacts that charges for service shall be reasonable, it being thought inexpedient to expose persons to a penalty for a mistake in judgment regarding a charge for services rendered.

I wish to call the attention of the House to the argument made by the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] upon that particular clause of the bill. He finds fault specifically with the bill of the committee, for the reason that the first section was taken out from the operation of the penal provisions of the bill. Now, I ask my distinguished friend, and I ask other gentlemen of the House who may give attention to this subject, to answer me whether in their judgment it would be a fair and proper measure to subject the directors of a railroad company to the highly penal clauses of this bill simply for what may be a mistake in judgment in fixing the rate for carrying an article of freight from Chicago to New York, for instance? I should be glad if they would point out to me the rule or criterion of judgment which would enable a jury to arrive at the reasonableness of the charge; and I ask them if there is anybody better qualified to understand what would really be the reasonableness or unreasonableness of such charges than the directors of the roads themselves, who are enabled by their position to inform themselves of the various items of cost which enter into such transportation and all of the various elements which go to make up the sum total of the expenditures of the road in performing such service? To enforce a penalty upon them under the provisions of this bill would be simply imposing a penalty for what might be a mistake in judgment; and there is this further objection, that a jury in one State might hold that a charge against which objection was made was unreasonable, while a jury in another and neighboring State might hold that it was not unreasonable. Who is to decide between the two? It is an attempt to make that a criminal offense which in the very nature of things ought not to be so made.

The honest judgment of the directors of the road may be that the charge for carrying that freight was entirely reasonable, and it seems to me that nobody would under the provisions of this Reagan bill, as I call it by way of distinction from the committee's bill, be willing to accept the office of directorship of any railroad company being subject to its penalties; for any mistake in judgment which he may make in fixing the rate for carrying the produce of a shipper from one State into another, which rate the jury may find was extortionate, would subject him to all the penalties prescribed. For these reasons the committee, or a large majority of the committee as I remember now, thought the provisions of the first section should be taken out of the operations of this penal provision.

So much for the declaratory, remedial, and penal provisions of the bill. Its further effect is to create a board of three commissioners of interstate commerce, one, at the first appointment, to hold office for two, one for four, and one for six years, and thereafter each for six years. They are removable only for cause, are not to be interested pecuniarily in any railroad or railroad security, are given a salary of $7,500 a year and actual and necessary traveling and other expenses incurred by them. They may appoint a clerk with annual salary of $2,500 and an accountant at annual salary of $2,000. The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to furnish such additional clerical, engineering, expert, or other service as the commissioners may request and he deem proper. In the performance of their duties the commissioners, their experts, and clerks may pass over any railroad engaged in interstate commerce free of charge, but shall accept no other pass, gratuity, or favor from any railroad company.

The commissioners are charged with the duty of carrying into effect the provisions of this act in respect to interstate commerce. Persons complaining of any violation of this act may, in addition to the other remedies provided, apply to the commissioners in writing, briefly stating their complaint. If the petition is authenticated, as provided in the act, the commissioners shall, and in other cases may, entertain and investigate the same. The modes of such investigation are pointed out in the bill. There is not time, nor is there need, for me to recapitulate them. The question in this part of the discussion will be upon the policy of creating a board of commissioners at all. If they are to be appointed, I confidently submit that the provisions regarding their powers and duties are thoughtfully drawn and carefully guarded. That portion of the act relating to commissioners seems to me the best part of the proposed legislation. They are given ample powers to examine witnesses, books, and papers in order to decide upon the merits of the complaints made to them. They may issue orders to offenders to desist from violating the provisions of this act. If the offender refuses to obey the order and to desist from its violation, it is made the duty of the district attorney to apply to the proper circuit court of the United States to grant an order upon him to show cause why he should not be enjoined against continuing such violation, and the power of the court to enjoin is ample. All the machinery is provided, and, best of all, a capable board is created to hear and examine, as no Congressional committee can, all complaints; to listen to all excuses and defenses, and year after year to intelligently advise Congress what legislation is actually needed in order to settle, upon an equitable basis the relations between carriers and their customers in this vast system of interstate commerce.

Of all the bills before your committee this seems the best. Some went too far in their restrictions and their penalties. They assumed that the directors and managers of our great railroad system were banded together to willfully cheat and defraud the public.

No allowance was made for the difficulties necessarily incurred by honest and honorable men in managing a business so vast and intricate to the satisfaction of all the conflicting interests. I do not suppose that any one thinks this bill perfect in its present shape nor likely to be made so by amendments.

But two or three amendments which are proposed to be offered will make it as good, perhaps, as a committee with limited time and no opportunity to thoroughly test complaints could make it, and at any rate it serves by its very imperfections to emphasize the necessity of a commission to investigate before violent changes in legislation are attempted. It is a tentative measure, therefore, looking to further legislation upon the subject, and I trust it will commend itself to the consideration of the House. Such, in brief, are the provisions of the bill reported by the committee.

In contradistinction to this bill we have what is known as the "Reagan bill," which was offered by the distinguished gentleman from Texas yesterday as a substitute for the bill now pending before the House. This substitute bill is in my judgment too strict and too minute in all of its particulars to be a practical measure. It is so minute in its details as to interfere materially with the very laws of trade, and so strict as to defeat the very object of the bill itself, which is of course a good object. That is the criticism I would make upon the bill of the gentleman from Texas, and that is the criticism that I know other members of the committee made upon it, and which will necessarily arise in the mind of every member of the House who examines closely its provisions. In conclusion I want to say a word in regard to the name of the two bills pending before the House, as confusion will be apt to arise in the minds of gentlemen because of the fact that the bill reported from the committee was reported by the distinguished gentleman from Texas the chairman of the committee, and is therefore known as the "Reagan bill," while the substitute which is pending before the House is also known as the Reagan bill. The bill reported by the committee, was, as will appear by its title, a substitute for a number of bills which had been referred to the committee; among others, the "Reagan bill" itself, strictly so called. When that was brought up before the House on yesterday the gentleman from Texas proposed his bill as a substitute for the committee's bill, and both are now pending for consideration.

The bill which is reported from the committee as a substitute for all the bills before it, including the Reagan bill, is House bill No. 5461, to establish a board of commissioners of interstate commerce and to regulate such commerce. And the House will remember that last night, after that bill was read, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] then offered as a substitute what was known in the committee as the Reagan bill. But the bill I have been discussing is the substitute bill, on which the committee agreed, with the condition, as I have said, that every individual member of the committee was at liberty to offer such amendments as he might see fit.

How much of my time remains?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. OATES in the chair). The gentleman from Connecticut has thirty minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. LONG. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Commerce agree that legislation is demanded and is desirable on the subject of interstate railroad transportation. They differ only as to the method of procedure. In discussing the bill which they have reported it is as important not to get up steam against evils which it is not our province to remedy as to consider how most effectually to cure those which we ought to reach. There is no subject of easier declamation, or at which the impassioned orator can fire his gun with a louder report on a small charge of powder than the railroad system of the country. But for the purpose of this debate I do not believe it is profitable to call that system either an angel of beneficence or a monster of iniquity. We all know that it has developed our country, turned the wilderness to a garden, peopled our great territorial domain into flourishing States, belted the Republic together, cheapened transportation, and, best of all, laid at the feet of the poorest citizen by means of mutual and prosperous exchange the products, whether of shop or farm, of every section of the Union. On the other hand, we all know that it has been the raw material, if that term shall offend no sensitive ear, of wild and ruinous speculation, and that the red blood of its stocks has often been watered till in too many cases it has only swashed a bloated corpse, offensive to the nose and damaging to health.

But the question before us is not a question of speculation in railroad investments or of watered stocks. Be the evils that thence arise as grievous as the plagues of Egypt, they are not for us to remedy. Thanks to our Federal Constitution of blessed memory, they lie within the jurisdiction of the States which create railroad corporations and regulate their existence and financial operation.

Nor is it a question directly of political power or of local monopolization. Nor is it ours to attempt any Utopian scheme of leveling the inequalities of human fortune. These exist by natural laws, which are practically beyond our legislative and artificial control.

It is certainly a good rule in legislation to let alone as much as possible, not to contend against but to co-operate with natural laws—especially the laws of competition—and to leave them to work out their own results till the necessity of interference is plain. I take it we are not here to make a raid on railroads simply because, as a sort of public institution, they are accessible and easy of assault, any more than on any of the great private businesses of the country, which often quite as sharply affect the pockets of the people and even more brutally burden them. Indeed, in this whole matter of the railroad hearing, which for two months during the winter we had before our committee, what struck me more than anything else was not only the entire absence of any outcry against the railroads from the people at large, but also the limited complaint from anybody else.

There has been complaint, and, let me say, just complaint, especially in former years, but it has generally come from the middlemen of commerce, who stand between the producer and the consumer, and who, having to share profits with the railroad carrier, naturally and properly incline to reduce as much as possible his charges in order, as he flings back, to increase their own.

The National Board of Trade, which met in this city last winter, expressly, and with hardly a dissenting vote, declared against what is known as the Reagan bill, and recommended a commission such as the bill we have reported provides for. The fact is that the agitation for the last ten years of this railroad question, while it seemed ineffectual at the time because it resulted in no act of Congress, has shown how much more effective is public opinion, open debate, and full exposure than an arbitrary and rusty statute. The very discussion of the problem has half solved it, and many of those who knocked at your doors in former years are now indifferent, because content.

The statistics show a steadily improving diminution of rates in the interest of the people. Look at some of the figures. The $6,000,000,000 or more invested in the 125,000 miles of railroads in the United States pay only about 3 per cent. per annum to their stockholders. The rate of freight ten years ago was 2½ cents per ton per mile. This year, under what is charged as the enormities of the railroad monopoly, it has come down to less than 1 cent per ton per mile. We were told that in Belgium and France it is nearly twice that, and in England still more. Under the operation of natural laws evils have tended to cure themselves, rates have come down, discriminations have lessened. This has happened because it is found with public institutions as with individuals that the nearer the approach to square and fair dealing the better it pays in the long run, although human selfishness and corporate soullessness both learn the lesson slowly and reluctantly. There are no saints running our railroads. On the contrary, there is there as everywhere else a body of selfish, timid—as capital subject to legislation is always timid—but prudent men, and in obedience to their own interest, if to nothing else, they are wisely more and more consulting and more and more meeting every year the public demand and doing more justice to the public.

As Edward Atkinson, a good statistical authority, says, the voluntary reduction in railroad rates in the last twelve years, not forced by law but resulting from natural causes, is greater than the whole sum of the public debt. The development of the West, the value of its herds and farms and crops, the rescue of its corn from voluntary commission to the flames and its transfer to the remunerative markets of the world, are due to the cheap transportation of the railroads; a cheapness for the great realms of the Western people which has been secured somewhat indeed at the cost of local high rates, especially in the East, but in the main has aided in the distribution and cheapening of food for all the people, who buy it and who in exchange for it find a market for their own manufactured products. Our railroads, says the United States Railroad Commissioner, employ nearly 2,000,000 persons in their operation and construction, thus furnishing vast employment to labor. We were told that they cost less per mile for construction, even with the tariff on railroad iron and steel rails, than those of any of the great European countries; about one-fourth of those of England, and one-third of those of France. A barrel of flour is hauled from Chicago to New York, 1,000 miles, for 30 cents. If a man eats one pound a day, the transportation charge for him is less than $1 a year. The freight on meat from Chicago to New York is 32½ cents per 100 pounds. If a man eats one pound a day its transportation costs him $1.20 a year, or about one day's wages for the transportation of his year's bread and meat.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, the evil is not that of general extortion upon the country, except as those discriminations and preferences, to which I shall afterward refer as the real grievance, increase the general cost, as perhaps they do to a slight extent, by favoring some at the expense of others. The competition of railroads among themselves and the abundant water ways which it ought to be the sagacious policy of Congress to develop and improve reduce the general rates of freight to a reasonable price, which still goes on constantly diminishing; and the United States Railroad Commissioner says in his report that ours is the cheapest railroad transportation in the world.

THE REAL GRIEVANCE.

What is the evil, then, at which we should direct legislation? It is the evil of unjust discrimination and undue preferences. Rates are generally reasonable and on the whole generous to the people. But there have been, less now than formerly as and for the reasons I have stated, unjust, indefensible, harassing, and impolitic discriminations, which, so far as they affect interstate commerce, it is our province to correct. While I have less faith than some in the utility of legislative restrictions, I yet believe the time has arrived when, in obedience to public sentiment as well as to the actual demands of business, especially the demands of our mercantile houses and middlemen, something can be done by statutory enactments.

Shippers make complaints, with which every community is familiar and which are well established, that they suffer from unjust discriminations and from rates which, though low, are not uniform or equal. They complain that by favoritism on the one hand and discrimination on the other, in the form of special rates, drawbacks, private contracts, &c., they are wronged; that thereby one mercantile house is enriched at the expense of the ruin of another; that one local shipper is bolstered up and his neighbor crushed out by the malice or the interest of the railroad company, and that the natural and fair competition of commerce and trade is destroyed by the artificial and partial preferences and discriminations of these great overriding public carriers. And, Mr. Speaker, these complaints have in too many cases been well founded. Grossest injustice has been done. Certain shippers have had undue preferences. Certain others have suffered loss by unjust discriminations. Certain places have withered in their local prosperity from unequal rates, and certain others have been favored and stimulated by special indulgences. This evil, so far as it is involved in interstate commerce, we are in duty bound to meet, and so far as that I have very little question of our constitutional power to throttle it.

THE BILL LIMITED TO RAILROAD TRANSPORTATION.

The first question is, How far shall we go in our legislation? Shall we limit our scope to railroads, or embrace in it water ways, transportation by lake and coast, river and canal? It would seem at first as if consistency required the latter. But it is evident that there should be some limit. Undue preferences and unjust discriminations may exist in express companies or in ordinary horse or ox carriage transportation. But there is this distinction: your highways and your water ways are free to all, and carry with their very existence their own unbounded freedom and facility of competition for all alike. But your railway is exclusive. By right of eminent domain it has been invested with the absolute sole use of its road-bed, monopolizing usually the best and shortest cut between two given points. Highways and water ways can well be left to the laws of the free competition which they invite.

The railroads alone are of such monopolistic sort as, in the judgment of your committee, to justify legislative interference at this time. We have therefore submitted a bill which deals only with railroads. I know that it is plausibly and perhaps logically urged that it should embrace the whole subject of interstate transportation, and not that only which is by railroad. But I am certain that if we attempt that we shall involve so many complications and array so many interests, that we shall fail altogether and be knocked out of accomplishing anything. And it is possible that the wish for such a result may be with some who oppose any legislation at all the father of the thought.

THE QUESTION STATED.

We come, then, to this question. Granted a system of interstate railroads, doing the great carrying business of the country, with its inestimable effect upon the prosperity and welfare of the people—the value of its freight $15,000,000,000, or ten times that of our whole foreign commerce; given also the fact that in this business there is more or less of injustice in the way of undue preferences and unjust discriminations, which pervert the natural and healthy development of trade, and which subject not only individuals but municipalities themselves to the caprice or arbitrary pleasure of railroad corporations—how shall we promote a remedy? There are two methods suggested. The first is to enact remedial statutes, prohibiting under severe penalties certain specified injustices and wrongs and leaving the injured party in every case to bring his action in the courts for the enforcement of his statutory remedy and for the recovery of damages, or to depend on the ability or zeal of a criminal prosecuting attorney.

This is the cast-iron, inflexible, perfunctory method, terrible on paper as an army with banners, but practically as ineffectual as a Chinese gong. In my judgment it would avail little or nothing. In the first place, hardly any remedy of this sort is proposed that does not already exist at common law or that has not been enacted into the statutes of various States, and in either case been hitherto found wanting, insufficient, and inefficient. In the second place, no such statute can be made specific and close-fitting and all-fitting enough to reach all cases or even a large part of them or strong enough to elude the ingenuity of railroad counsel and railroad devices. In the third place, the law's delays and the courts' weary and expensive litigation, guard against them as you may, practically bar in all such cases the poor man or any man who is dependent on the good-will of a railroad from getting that prompt, immediate, equitable, constant, and self-recurring relief which is alone of any value to the business community.

It is for these reasons that I regard the bill introduced by Judge REAGAN, and which he asks to substitute for the one reported by the committee, as brutum fulmen—attacking the evils of railroad injustice as the Irishman did the fly—when he put his finger on it and it was not there. I understand how taking and simple his bill seems at first sight, carrying with it the impression that it is the long-sought curb which at last will bring down the high horse of the railroad to obedient and docile service. But I predict it would be a dead letter, so far as being of any use to the people, from the day of its passage if it stood alone; or that, if enforced except through the elastic and automatic adaptation of the commission recommended in the bill of the committee, it would only embarrass business, increase rates, and add to the burden of the people's cost of transportation. Let me read what the present United States Commissioner of Railroads says on that subject:

> The universal use and absolute dependence of interstate commerce upon railroads give constant rise to new questions under new conditions, which only experience can properly solve. It would seem that true wisdom would hasten slowly in dealing with this great problem, seeking the fullest information as the only true basis for wise legislation. The solution must lie in the just application of the laws of trade and commerce, with such authoritative regulation by law as will hold abuses in check, and this power can be derived only from Federal law of universal application. I have felt it to be my duty to again call attention to this subject, although I have not thought it appropriate to discuss the question in detail.
> Any law not based upon full information might work great injustice to the companies and be inadequate to the proper protection of the people. Experience has shown that unreasonable laws can not be enforced, and in many instances have worked such great embarrassment to transportation as to become inoperative by common consent. Many such laws hastily enacted have been quickly repealed.
> I therefore respectfully renew my former recommendation, that a commission be appointed to take into consideration the whole subject and report to Congress the facts necessary for intelligent and efficient action upon the subject.

THE BILL OF THE COMMITTEE.

It is for these reasons that a majority of the Committee on Commerce, desirous to find some real and effective remedy, guided by careful study of the problem and following the lead of the best authorities who have investigated it, as well as the example of those States which have done most to solve it, agreed that the only way to meet this Protean, this ever-shifting and recurring danger and pest of railroad discriminations, is to adopt certain remedial provisions somewhat after Mr. REAGAN'S plan, but instead of leaving them to rust on the statute-book, to establish for their application and elastic enforcement an interstate commission, which shall have close, constant, immediate supervision of interstate railroad commerce; which shall obtain that "full information" which our present Commissioner says is necessary as a basis for legislation; to which complaints may be made, not under the tedious and expensive forms and delays of court practice, but informally and freely and without expense, at any time, anywhere, by any person, however humble or remote; which shall expose to the sunlight of public gaze every infraction of its regulations and every wrong against fair and uniform dealing, and which shall have power to investigate each case, bring parties to explanation and account, obtain injunction and compel steady obedience and speedy justice. Its very existence and impendence and the right to invoke its interference at any time would make the cause and need of invoking it less frequent, and so enable it to do its work, which at first thought might seem too extensive for any one commission. Let me read some of the provisions of the bill.

It provides—

That there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, three commissioners, of whom one shall be of experience in the law and one of experience in railroad business, who shall be collectively known as the Commission of Interstate Commerce of the United States, and shall be charged with the duty of carrying into effect the provisions of this act in respect of interstate commerce.

Then follow provisions as to tenure, qualifications, and salary, which are matters of detail. It then further provides—

SEC. 10. That any person complaining of anything done or omitted to be done by any railroad company or person in violation or contravention of this act may, in addition to the remedies hereinbefore provided, apply to said commissioners by petition in writing, which shall briefly state the subject of such complaint. If the petition is signed by any board of trade or other commercial body, or, when signed by an individual, if it bears the certificate of any district attorney of the United States, or of any district or county attorney, or officer corresponding thereto, of any State or Territory, that he has examined the facts and in his opinion the complaint is well founded, the commission is hereby required to entertain and investigate the same. In all other cases the commission shall decide whether or not the petition ought to be proceeded with. The commission may, if they think fit, before requiring or permitting any formal proceedings to be taken on any petition, communicate the same to the railroad company against whom it is made, so as to afford them an opportunity of making such observations or taking such action thereon as they may think fit. The commission shall have power, and in a proper case is required, to cause a copy of the petition to be served upon the railroad company complained against, and to issue a notice requiring such company to appear before the commission and answer the said petition. The answer shall be in writing. After the answer is filed it shall then be lawful for the commission, if it shall think fit, to direct and prosecute, in such mode and by such persons or means as it shall think proper, all such inquiries into matters of fact as may be deemed necessary to enable the commission to form a just conclusion in respect of the matters of said petition. All the proceedings before said commission shall be directed by and under general orders, which shall secure to all persons interested reasonable notice and opportunity to be heard. If it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the commission, either by the testimony of witnesses or other evidence adduced before it, or by the report of any person to whom the commission may have referred the inquiry, or any part thereof, that anything has been done or omitted to be done in contravention or violation of this act, by any railroad company or person so upon due and proper notice proceeded against, it shall be the duty of such commission to make and record its report in writing in respect of any such contravention or violation of this act, which report shall comprise and embrace the findings of the commission upon and in respect of all questions of fact in issue or involved in such proceedings. Within a reasonable time, not to exceed twenty days, after such report and findings are made by the commission, it shall cause a copy thereof to be served upon or delivered to the railroad company so found to have violated this act, to which shall be appended a notice to be issued by said commission to such company forthwith to cease and desist from such violation, and also to deliver to the district attorney of the United States for the district in which the act complained of occurred another copy of such report, findings, and notice.

SEC. 11. That upon notice that any such railroad company has neglected or refused to conform to the decision of said commission, and to desist from such violation or contravention of this act, it shall be the duty of such district attorney to apply by petition, in the name of the party aggrieved, to the circuit court of the United States for such district, for, and it shall be the duty of such court to grant, an order upon such railroad company to show cause why such company should not be enjoined and restrained against the continuance of such violation, and for such other order and relief in the premises as may be just and proper. For the purpose of making any order or decree in the premises, final or otherwise, such court shall be always open, and the day on which any such order or decree is made shall be a special term of such court. Upon the service and return of such order to show cause, and notice to the parties interested, such court shall proceed in a summary manner to ascertain whether the said report and findings are true; and whenever said court shall be of opinion that such company has done or is doing any act in violation or contravention of this act in said report and findings described, it shall so adjudge; and it then shall be the duty of said court forthwith to issue a writ of injunction, requiring such railroad company to desist from such violation, and in respect of the matters in said report contained to conform to and obey all the provisions of said act. Such court may enforce obedience to any such injunction, order, or decree, by any person or party, by fine, proceedings for contempt, and all other means within its lawful jurisdiction sitting as a court of equity. Any person interested to restrain such violation may, on application to the court, be allowed to appear and be heard by himself or counsel; and upon proof that any district attorney has failed in any proper case for the period of ten days to apply for such order to show cause, the court may permit such application to be made and prosecuted to effect by or in behalf of any person so interested. Such court may, in its discretion, award or deny costs to any party to such proceeding. In any case where the court shall adjudge that the violation of this act by any company has been willful, or continued after notice to desist therefrom, the court may award to any party injured such a gross sum by way of costs as will reimburse all his costs, charges, expenses, counsel fees, and disbursements, to be paid by such company.

Then follow provisions empowering the commission to summon witnesses, require the production of books and papers, and to administer oaths; also requiring them to have public sessions, to examine the accounts of railroad companies, to make reports to Congress, to investigate "pooling," and, in short, to be the eyes, ears, and fingers of Congress in the work of supervising in the interest of the people and under constant and immediate responsibility to their representatives the doings, charges, accounts, and conduct of these great interstate railroad carriers.

All this is a simple, equitable, and speedy system of relief. It has been tried in Massachusetts for nearly twenty years and has worked with unqualified success. In that State, too, it has no such powers as we give in the present bill—indeed no power at all. All the railroad commissioners of Massachusetts can do is to investigate and recommend. And yet I believe that in no case has any railroad company dared to resist or failed to comply with the mere recommendation of the railroad commission. To show how close this system comes to the personal convenience and little wants of the body of the people, I recall that it has been applied successfully even to the matter of carrying the small parcels of suburban passengers. In short, the great remedy for all such wrongs is to let on light, more light.

A corporation may be as powerful as an ancient baron, it may laugh at statutory penalties, but it goes on its knees, it trembles with terror at entire exposure. Nothing can stand the illumination of the public gaze. This has been the tendency in Massachusetts, and it is to be remembered that the board there has been made up of men from the ordinary walks of life, so that the success has been more in the system than in the men who work it, important and vital as is the choice of these. Mr. Adams, now a distinguished railroad authority, was nothing of the sort when he went upon that board. To-day one member sits upon it, who, to his credit, was promoted as a practical man, representing the railroad operatives, from the cab of a locomotive. And that commission, of which Judge Russell is now the able chairman, is a safeguard and protection to our people such as mere cast-iron statutes—and we have them lying rust-eaten and forgotten on our statute-book—could never effect. Indeed, I do not recall an instance where these statutes, with their idle thunders, have been invoked, while the commission is constantly called upon to express its quiet but ever-obeyed influence.

I admit that in some States a commission has not succeeded, while in more it has, thus showing that in the former the conditions and not the principle have been at fault. I also admit that in so great a sphere as the interstate commerce of the whole country this system will not fulfill its work if the best men be not selected to constitute the board. But in view of the vast importance of the trust and its jurisdiction, I know and you know that public sentiment will demand and find such men, whoever be the appointing power. Thank God, an independent public opinion has secured a hold in this country that compels, in the great business interests of the people, something more than favoritism or partisanship. With such a choice as Adams, Cooley, Thurman, and a score of others who might be named this bill would furnish a remedy that would set in motion the true diagnosis and cure of the railroad evil. Much as I differ on many points from the distinguished chairman of our committee, Judge REAGAN, I would sooner, as a measure of legislative relief, constitute him sole railroad commissioner, responsible to Congress, than merely enact his list of bristling and fulminating prohibitions and penalties and nothing more.

In the one case we should at least have honest and attentive regulation and oversight; in the other, only the echo of a threat as empty as the dungeon of a mediæval castle. If we are to put the railroads under restraint against unjust discriminations and undue preferences, as I think we should, I want it to be a restraint that means something and that is constantly in operation. Such would certainly not be the result if we merely passed a penal statute and left it to execute itself in rare spasms.

Consider the great value and advantage of the reports to Congress and the country of a commission made up of such men as I have suggested, of the steady growth of the science of remedial regulation, and of the gradual subordination of the railroad power to salutary and beneficent obedience to the supremacy of the popular will as expressed and manifested by these responsible agents of the National Government.

Compare with this elastic, self-adjusting, and sufficient system the stunted and utterly ineffectual method of a dormant statute, too expensive and too like a boomerang for any poor shipper, whose property is at the mercy of the humor of the railroads, to set in motion. To furnish him only that would be to give the people a stone when they cry for bread, a serpent when they ask for fish. Better to give him the constant backing of a commission. I believe that those who best appreciate the necessity of reform and most thoroughly have studied the problem have little faith in Judge REAGAN'S plan of an iron-clad statute, with its overweight of prohibitions and penalties, through which the railroad lawyer would drive his coach-and-six, and to which the people, especially the men of small means, would no more resort than they would risk their fingers in a chopping-machine to save a runaway nickel. And yet, in order to give the people a bill, in order to make sure of having every string to our bow, in order to meet every aspect of the case and give the railroads no rope or quarter, the Committee on Commerce have united in prefacing to the sections establishing a commission with full powers a number of sections embracing as many of Judge REAGAN'S provisions as a majority of us regarded practicable. We have omitted none that we think the judgment of the country will demand in this new and tentative measure of legislation. We have admitted one which I trust we shall strike from the bill and thereby amend it.

THE COMMITTEE'S BILL COMPARED WITH THE REAGAN BILL.

Let me read these two remedial sections of our bill and compare them with the bill which Judge REAGAN proposes to substitute. Section 1 provides that all charges—and it will be remembered that all this proposed legislation applies only to interstate railroad transportation—shall be reasonable. Section 2, that no discrimination shall be permitted in favor of one shipper against another under similar circumstances, and that transportation shall be continuous from shipment to destination. These two sections are practically the same as Judge REAGAN'S first section except in form—the provision that charges shall be reasonable—which is simply a declaration of the common law, having been taken out and made a section by itself.

REBATES AND DRAWBACKS.

Our third section is:

That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in the transportation of property as aforesaid directly or indirectly to allow any rebate, drawback, or other advantage in any form upon shipments made or services rendered as aforesaid by him or them, which, under similar circumstances, are not allowed to all other persons.

This is the same as Judge REAGAN'S second section, save that in forbidding rebates and drawbacks it excepts those "which under similar circumstances are * * * allowed to all other persons." Now, why do we add this exception? Or rather, so plain and just is the provision it makes, why should we strike it off? In the first place, by adding it we simply carry out the very plan of equal dealing with all parties and the very purpose of the bill. There ceases to be any discrimination if the same rebate is allowed to one man that is made to another.

In the second place, experience shows that there must sometimes from the necessity of the case be rebates and drawbacks. Our revenue laws are full of provisions for such cases. Suppose the case of a mistake or of a sudden great fall in rates and prices by reason of some glut in the market or some local calamity or riot or flood; suppose some instance of special hardship falling upon a whole mercantile community; in short, suppose the plainest possible case conceivable in which, as often happens, an allowance on the contract price of transportation would be not only innocent but necessary if made alike to all in the same circumstances. Is it wise, is it statesmanlike, to be prevented from this by a statute which fitted to one set of circumstances is unfitted to every other?

It is argued that if there be the least let-up advantage will be taken by secret arrangements to evade the law. But this will occur any way, only it will certainly occur all the more if in addition to your prohibition of what is wrong you prohibit just as inflexibly what is right, and thereby fail to meet natural and honest contingencies. When you do that you are taking the very steps to invite and tempt the secret evasions and preferences you would avoid.

In the third place, it was in evidence before our committee that a drawback or rebate is sometimes desirable in order to aid in exporting to foreign markets the products of American labor. For instance, staves are imported into England from the United States and from Norway. In the competition for this trade the American producer of staves is at a disadvantage, and he has asked of the railroads a rebate on their freight charges to aid him in paying his way across the ocean and in meeting his Norwegian competitor. If the railroads are willing to make a rebate in such a case when staves are transported for export and to extend to all who under similar circumstances transport them for the same purpose, it is a positive good, because it helps American labor and products to a larger market. It does no harm. No one is injured. Not the stave manufacturers, certainly, for they sell more goods; nor any one of them, for they all are treated alike. Not the American consumers of staves, for the slight rebate on railroad transportation is balanced by the charge for ocean carriage. Among themselves the American consumers fare alike, and as against the English consumers the ocean charge to them balances the slight rebate on the railroad transportation of which they get the advantage. How unstatesmanlike and impolitic would be a statute that should forbid uniform and honest rebates in such cases for the encouragement of American industry.

In the fourth place, the existence of competing lines between the same two centers of interstate commerce frequently makes rebates just and necessary. There are three or four such lines between New York and Chicago. They are sharp competitors. Suppose a grain merchant in New York receiving his goods by one line finds that another merchant in exactly the same business is receiving exactly the same goods at the same time and under the same circumstances at a less freight-rate by another line. Unless his own carrier allows him a rebate and thereby puts him on a level in the market with his competitor he suffers an injury and an unjust discrimination, which is the very thing we are seeking to avoid. And yet the Reagan section would forbid the allowance of a rebate to him in this most just case, while our bill grants him relief on the one sole equitable condition that it be extended also to all others who are dealing with the same line under the same circumstances. Which provision is most sensible, most valuable to the mercantile interests and to the people, most in accord with fair dealing? The very necessities of commerce require elastic provisions of law, that will regulate rather than congest, and that will adapt themselves to the public convenience and interest, and not by offering temptation to violation of law wrench everything out of gear.

But admit, as admit we must, that under either form of the section the cupidity and selfishness of human nature will seek to evade the statute and to permit preferences to one shipper over another. Yet, surely, the elastic provision will permit less of this than the other; and, inasmuch as the need is of some constant regulation and control, how can these in any way be so well obtained and applied as by the commission which we propose, which can hear and investigate each complaint and meet and answer its demands at once. The commission makes our section entirely safe. The last thing I would do is to fail to recognize the danger and injustice of unequal discriminations, or fail to correct them so far as we can. But I am confident the best and most complete correction will be in an elastic remedy under steady and responsible supervision.

RECOVERY OF DAMAGES.

Section 6 of our bill gives to an injured party, in addition to his right of resort to the commission, an action for damages for violations of the provisions of the bill, and in case of recovery allows costs sufficient to cover all his expenses in obtaining it. The object of this is, of course, to enable those who have suffered perhaps great and repeated annoyance but small pecuniary loss, to bring and maintain their suits and be vindicated in their rights; for it is claimed that now no man of small means can afford to prosecute a small claim against the railroads because of its expense and especially the delays to which he is subjected. Mr. REAGAN'S bill gives triple damages; but the committee are of opinion, first, that it is indefensible and bad principle to give to a party in a matter of contract three times the amount of his damage; second, that three times the damage where the damage is small—say, $20, $30, or $50—would often not meet the expense; and third, that the actual damage and the actual expense of getting it, which our bill gives, would be such an exquisite fitness of compensation as to reach the very ideal of poetic justice on a very prosy matter.

PENALTIES.

And it is because this remedy which we give in the court is so full, and exact, and, so far as a mere statute goes, so punitive upon the railroads, that I would make an amendment to the bill and strike out section 7, with its fine of a thousand dollars. This section is a mere cumulation of the agony and piles it up at the risk of destroying the whole effect. To the inquisitorial powers of the commission, to the right to recover all damages and all expenses, including personal expenses and counsel fees, it further adds, in case a single one of the provisions of our bill are violated, a criminal action and a fine of not exceeding $1,000 for each violation. This, in homely phrase, is running the thing into the ground. I think Judge REAGAN'S bill, as he originally introduced it, piled successive Ossas even upon this Pelion, and tempted a new swarm of spies and informers by offering them half the fine recovered. The bill will be much wiser and more practicable if we strike section 7 from it. It is going a good ways to make a party liable in damages and full remunerative costs because he charges one man more than another for the same work, but to make him a criminal is extravagant.

With this amendment, and perhaps other minor ones, this will be, I am inclined to believe, not by any means a perfect piece of legislation or beyond criticism, but a good beginning. I believe the people at large and the railroads and merchants who are more particularly affected will see in it an honest purpose to solve the problem that has so long vexed them and knocked at our doors.

THE REAGAN BILL.

It only remains to consider section by section the Reagan substitute.

Section 1 of the Reagan bill is substantially sections 1 and 2 of ours.

Section 2 forbids drawbacks and rebates, and only lacks the words which in our bill forbid only those which under similar circumstances are not allowed to all other persons. I have already discussed this section.

THE LONG AND SHORT HAUL.

Section 4, which is omitted in our bill, forbids a larger charge for a longer than for a shorter haul, and is as follows:

SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in the transportation of property as provided in the first section of this act to charge or receive any greater compensation for a similar amount and kind of property for carrying, receiving, storing, forwarding, or handling the same for a shorter than for a longer distance in one continuous carriage; and the road of a corporation shall include all the road in use by such corporation, whether owned or operated under a contract or lease by such corporation.

For one I am not inclined to deny the abstract correctness of the principle here stated. But, like all abstract principles, its application depends upon the circumstances of each case. A similar provision is in the statutes of Massachusetts, though there limited to cases where the comparative hauls are in "the same direction." Last winter it passed the Connecticut house of representatives and was defeated in the senate. It is better adapted perhaps to the narrow limits of a State than to the whole country, in which its too rigid enforcement might operate very severely against the great grain and meat producing regions of the West.

If a less-than-a-through rate must never under any possible circumstances exceed a through rate, then the West must give up the present marvelously cheap transportation of its products and the people of the East must pay the increased freight-cost of their provisions. This question becomes by no means a simple one when this broader view of the consequences to the whole country are considered. If we were to have no interstate commission there would be more reason for this provision, but with that to investigate, sift, and correct every instance of unreasonable discrimination, the provision is in the judgment of your committe not desirable. It exists, as I have said, in Massachusetts and perhaps in some other States. But there, as would be the case in the Federal statutes, it is, I believe, practically a dead letter. I do not recall an instance where in my own State any injured party has resorted to it in the courts of law, though such may have occurred.

Nor is this requirement altogether free from difficulties. Take some instances. The Saint Louis bridge cost, say, $12,000,000. Ought no more to be charged, either as a practical or an abstract proposition, for a haul over it a distance of one or two miles than over a dozen miles of the continuous road to Chicago or Kansas City, which cost, say, one two-hundredth as much per mile? Is it unjust to charge more for a haul of five miles through the Hoosac tunnel, which cost, say, $4,000,000 a mile, than for a haul of ten miles over another part of the same road that cost a hundred times less per mile? Take a more ordinary and appropriate illustration. By river from Memphis to New Orleans a bale of cotton is carried for, say, $1. Meantime a railroad is built from New Orleans to Winona, in Mississippi. It is a great public benefaction It makes an outlet for Mississippi cotton, and takes it from Winona to New Orleans for, say, $2.50 a bale—a great reduction on former charges. Everybody is happy. An increasing spirit of enterprise extends the railroad to Memphis, and Winona has now two arms. But lo! discontent and unhappiness. For as the river freight from Memphis to New Orleans is $1 a bale, the railroad, if it would get any through carrying business, must also take it for $1 a bale.

What follows, if you enforce this proposed provision of law? This: if the railroad charges $1 from Memphis to New Orleans, then it must practically, in view of intervening points, charge less than $1 from Winona to New Orleans. But it can not do business at that rate. It must therefore stop running, or else it must keep up its former local rates and increase its through rates from Memphis to New Orleans to, perhaps, $3 or $4. But if it does that, the competition and cheaper rates of the steamboats leave it no through business to do at all. It at first seems, of course, unjust that it should charge more from Winona to New Orleans than from Memphis to New Orleans, the longer distance. But Winona made no complaint and was happy so long as the railroad ran only to her threshold; in other words, as long as she had only half her present facilities. The through line having its track and equipment can, if it maintains its local rates, afford to take through freight at a very low figure, at a mere fraction above cost. Competition is in that way promoted in the interest of the general public if not of Winona, and all transportation is cheapened. But this proposed provision of law would forbid all this because of the special wrong to Winona. But stop! What wrongs Winona? Is it the railroad? No; for without it she would be at her original disadvantage. What wrongs her is not the railroad but the river, the natural advantage which Memphis has of water communication.

Understand me, I use Winona only as an illustration, and beg her pardon for the presumption. I do not know that I state the exact figures, or that she makes any complaint; nor do I undertake to say in such case whether the railroad is right or wrong, whether the charges are fair or unreasonable. It serves only to illustrate the difficulty of this whole problem, and to suggest the accidental and varying elements that enter into all cases and forbid the indiscriminate application to them of one unyielding iron-clad rule. Suppose a city set on a hill. It withers because it is inaccessible. At enormous cost a railroad is carried to it from the port of Jericho, at the foot of the mountain. Its grateful people willingly pay the heavy charges which the expensive building of the railroad necessitated. Inspirited, they extend their new railroad down the other side to Jerusalem on the plain, which has, fortunately for itself, a river winding around the mountain to the same port at Jericho. The mountain road pays its way with its local rates. But if it would compete with the river in carrying freight over the mountain from Jerusalem to Jericho it must carry for the same price, thereby instituting a competition with the river which would be of great benefit to the poor people of Jericho and Jerusalem. Ah! if you do that, say the hill people, you must do our work for less, for we on the summit are only half way on your through line. But, answereth the railroad, I must either give up this through business and surrender it to the river and confine myself to your local business, charging you for it what you know it is worth and were at first glad to pay, or you must let me do this through business at through river rates and without reduction of your local rates except so far as any slight profit I may get from this additional through business may enable me gradually to favor you. In such a case who discriminates against the hill folk? Is it the railroad? No. Is it the hill? Yes. In other words, we must not, as we are sometimes inclined to do, charge against the public carrier what is really the natural disadvantage of local situation. No statute, no penalty, can ever make up for an interior village in New York the magnificent natural advantage which the Hudson River gives to Albany, even if that village be half way to the ocean on some circuitous through railroad line running between Albany and the seaboard. The same difficulty occurs where our trunk lines come in competition with the lakes and the Canadian railroads.

As I say, I do not undertake to go into the right or wrong of each case. You can multiply instances of all sorts of wrongs in this matter. Their very infinity and variety show at once the impossibility of a single statute that will meet them all, and the absolute necessity of a general, constant, automatic supervision. I do not pretend that any one illustration covers even a fraction of the ground. There are cases where gross, rank, outrageous injustice is done by the railroads in charging more for a short haul than for a long one, such as Judge REAGAN referred to in opening this debate. They ought to be brought up with a round turn, and a commission would bring them up. There are other cases where they must charge less for a long through haul than for a short local one, or else give up all through competition, which is the very life and safety of the people—the great body of consumers—who must have every aid to cheap transportation. What then? Shall we permit the outrages? No. Shall we forbid the benefit? No. The ends of our noses are too convenient to justify us in cutting them off. We will regulate. We will leave the matter as a part of that reasonable freight-charge provided for in our first section to the interstate commission, who will have full power to act and to do justice in each case. Here is just one of those cases where an iron-clad law would only work mischief and where a commission with elastic powers can do justice and conserve all interests.

SCHEDULES OF RATES.

The fifth section of Judge REAGAN'S proposed substitute bill is in the opinion of most of the committee impracticable. It requires the posting of all schedules of freight-rates in two places in every depot five days before going into effect. Add to this period the time necessary for the actual posting, which in a great trunk road would not be inconsiderable, and you have a week or more during which rates are as absolutely invariable, whatever exigency occurs, as the revolutions of the planets. In other words, all competition between different domestic interstate roads is impossible, while during that period the rival water lines and Canadian railroads can, by reducing their charges a fraction take away not only all business from our own trunk lines but also all chance for them to compete for it. Railroad companies of course should publish their tariffs and not vary from them capriciously; but here again it is better, in the interest of wholesome competition and reasonable rates, to put them under the supervision of the commission than to manacle them; better to regulate than to incarcerate.

Section 6 of the Reagan bill is the same as section 5 of the committee's bill.

Section 7 of the Reagan bill is that relating to penalties, the objections to which I have already referred to.

CONCLUSION.

For one I am satisfied that the Reagan bill as offered by its author is insufficient and would be ineffectual, defeating itself. The committee's bill is by no means perfect. We offer it as the best practical step that can be taken at this time. We, too, would control the railroads and stop their exactions, but not, on the other hand, cripple their usefulness by restrictions that would injure them less than they would the public. We have no pride of opinion. We have adopted all the remedial clauses of Mr. REAGAN'S bill that did not seem positively impracticable. We have annexed to them the system of a commission with full powers. We want to make the railroads the agents of the law, not its violators; the servants of the people, not their defiant adversaries. We have meant business. Our single purpose has been to consummate the passage of an act and not to have another session of Congress go by with no other result than the report of a measure certain to be defeated. We believe the people will see in our action an earnest of our purpose to meet their demands. [Loud applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the bill (H. R. 2344) for the relief of Melissa G. Polan.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 1921) authorizing the Secretary of War to adjust and settle the account for arms, ammunition, and accouterments between the Territory of Montana and the United States.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5461) to establish a board of commissioners of interstate commerce and to regulate such commerce.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Speaker, for every wrong legislation should furnish a remedy. I am aware that there are some wrongs for which general legislation can not furnish a remedy. What are the wrongs properly chargeable to common carriers in connection with the subject of this bill? Let me precede the answer to this inquiry by the statement that the cost of transportation is a tax upon production. Let me illustrate.

Take, for instance, the article of wheat in the market of Liverpool. What is it that fixes the price of a bushel of wheat in the market of Liverpool? It is the demand for and the supply in that market of that article. What fixes the price of a bushel of wheat in the city of New York? It is the price of the bushel of wheat in Liverpool, less the cost of transportation of that bushel of wheat from New York to Liverpool. The grain merchant in the city of New York has no power absolutely to fix the price of a bushel of wheat in that city. He must take into consideration the price of a bushel of wheat in Liverpool and the cost of the transportation of a bushel of wheat from New York to Liverpool.

Then carry it out farther to the West. What fixes the price of a bushel of wheat in Kansas City? It is not the grain merchant in Kansas City who fixes it. He takes the price of a bushel of wheat in New York and deducts from it the cost of transportation from Kansas City to New York; and that is the price of a bushel of wheat in Kansas City. And then what is the price of a bushel of wheat in the granary in Kansas? Kansas has raised this year 48,000,000 bushels of wheat. She can consume only about 8,000,000 bushels of wheat; perhaps I should say in round numbers 10,000,000 bushels of wheat, including all that she can eat and all that she can plant. There is a surplus of 38,000,000 bushels of wheat that must find a market outside of her borders. How is the price for a bushel of wheat in the granary of Kansas fixed? It is not fixed by the producer. It is fixed by the price of the bushel of wheat in Kansas City, less the cost of transportation from the granary of Kansas to Kansas City.

After all, we are brought right back to the proposition that the cost of transportation is a tax upon production, and that the producer must pay for the transportation of a bushel of wheat. In short, wherever the market for the excess of any product is located, the demand and the supply—the demand for that article and the supply of that product—fixes its value at that point; and the cost of transportation from the field of production to that point, deducted from its value at that point, is the price realized by production. To state the proposition in a shorter form, the producer, as I said before, must pay the cost of the transportation of his article to market. It is so not only in relation to wheat, but it is so in relation to any manufactured product in the eastern portion of the United States. The manufacturer, either directly or indirectly, must pay the cost of the transportation of his manufactured product to the market which it must seek. The producer can not fix the price upon his product; and it is perhaps well that he can not. It is a wise dictate that the demand for and the supply of a product fixes the price of the product. The common carrier should not be allowed to fix the price of a product. Neither should he be allowed to have any voice in the fixing of the price of that product. Every one will assent to that proposition, it seems to me, who will consider it for a moment. It is much more reasonable that the producer should have the power to fix the price upon his product than that the common carrier should have the power to fix the price upon the product which the producer produces.

The law of demand and supply in its relation to the value of a product is an arbitrary one. It takes no notice of the cost of transportation; it takes no notice of the cost of production. But if the common carrier charges unreasonable rates for transportation it does not change the price of the product in the market, but it simply lessens the compensation which the producer receives for the production of that product. It does not benefit the consumer, but, on the other hand, it injures the producer. In short, it increases the tax upon production, not for the benefit of the producer or consumer, but for the benefit of the common carrier.

We can then return to the answer to the question which I before stated: What are the wrongs properly traceable or chargeable to common carriers in relation to this subject? And I answer: First, an unreasonable tax upon production; second, an unjust discrimination between shippers; and third, an unjust acquisition of power by combinations. And under these three general classes every single wrong, every single complaint that has ever been made or that can be made against a common carrier, can be brought. Every single wrong is embraced within one of these general classes which I have stated.

I need not stop to argue that an unreasonable tax upon production is wrong. I need not stop to argue that unjust discrimination between shippers is wrong. I need not stop to argue that an unjust acquisition of power by reason of the combination of railroad interests or common-carrier interests is wrong. The very statement of these propositions in the language used leads the unbiased mind to the conclusion that these are wrong. The disputing, if any there be, must be as to the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the tax upon production; as to the justice or injustice of the discrimination between shippers; as to the justice or injustice of the acquisition of power by combinations. First, then, as to the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the tax upon production.

Fair and reasonable compensation for the transportation of a product is right. Such a compensation is a just tax upon production. Against such a tax the producer has no right to complain. More than this the common carrier has no right to demand. An unreasonable charge for transportation by a common carrier is an unreasonable tax upon production. The evidence that unreasonable charges are demanded and received is overwhelming. Legislation by almost every State in this Union upon the subject is evidence of the existence of this wrong. Twenty of the States of this Union, perhaps more, have adopted laws in relation to this question; and the very fact that twenty States of this Union have had their attention called to the necessity for legislation upon this question is of itself an evidence that these wrongs exist. The fact that one of the important committees of this House has for years had this subject before it is of itself evidence that these wrongs have existed in the past and do exist in the present. The very fact that this House to-day under a special order is considering this very bill is of itself evidence that these wrongs have existed in the past and do exist in the present. There must be some power behind this body that brings this question forward and asks of the House a consideration of it; otherwise we should not consider it in the nature and under the rulings of a special order.

I might cite the numerous instances that were presented to the Committee on Commerce showing the existence of these wrongs. I might cite instances that have come under my own observation. But I will not take the time of the House to do that. I will say that if there is a single instance in the United States where a single railroad charges an unreasonable rate for the transportation of a single article, then legislation of the nature of this bill is demanded. And why? Because legislation in the nature of this bill can not injure any railroad that is not engaged in making unreasonable charges. The common carrier that is not guilty can not be injured by judicious legislation on this subject. Ay, more, the common carrier that is not guilty, that does not make unreasonable charges for the transportation of freight, will desire the passage of a law which will prevent its competitor from charging unreasonable rates. The common carrier that is dealing honestly and squarely with the producer and the shipper will not oppose remedial legislation on this subject. It is the guilty common carrier that "feels the halter draw with poor opinion of the law."

I pass now to the second proposition, and ask, Are there instances of unjust discrimination between shippers? That discriminations have been made and are now made is admitted. Railroad authorities claim that discrimination is necessary, but claim also that there is such a thing as just discrimination in transportation. I seriously question whether there can be such a thing as a just discrimination between shippers; but I will not argue upon that proposition. I do assert, however, without the fear of successful contradiction, that there can be no just discrimination for like and contemporaneous service under substantially similar circumstances. I assert that this proposition can not be successfully refuted. Here, again, I may say that the common carrier that is not guilty of unjust discrimination need not fear and will not oppose the passage of a judicious law upon this subject.

I come now to the third class of wrongs—the unjust acquisition of power by combination of interests. Combination of interests always weakens and oftentimes destroys competition. Competition is an important feature in all commercial transactions. The producer takes it into consideration in his plans and his promises. The merchant considers it in fixing the prices upon his merchandise. The professional man considers it in fixing the compensation for his professional services. The absence of competition means the presence of extortion. Competition is the friend of the masses and the foe of monopolies. It is the friend of honest toil and the foe of luxuriant idleness. It is the friend of fair-dealing and the foe of swindling. It is the friend of honest accumulation and the foe of gambling. It is an element that has always entered into all business transactions until its enemy, "pooling," was discovered by the genius of the common carrier.

I must differ with the position taken by my distinguished friend from Connecticut [Mr. SEYMOUR] in relation to this question of pooling. I am opposed to allowing it as a right or as a discretion to the common carrier. I believe, as I have already stated, it either weakens or destroys competition, and whatever does that is injurious to the large productive and consuming interests of the United States. What community in an American town would for a moment knowingly submit to the pooling of any business interest in its midst? Is there any reason why the railroad interest or the common-carrier interest should be allowed to eliminate this factor from its business transactions? Is there any reason why this interest should be allowed to "hamstring" this friend of honest endeavor? Whatever tends to destroy competition in any class of business is an unjust discrimination against the patrons of that interest.

One of the objects of pooling is to secure better compensation for transportation than could be secured without it. Otherwise there would be no object in the railroad interests pooling.

Another object of pooling is to enable the railroad interest to fix its rates of compensation arbitrarily and without reference to other business interests or conditions. In short, it is to obtain a power which does not legitimately belong to it and which can not in the nature of things be obtained by other business interests. It divorces this railroad interest from the laws and usages and influences of trade and commerce, and makes the trade and commerce of the country subject to its whims, its caprices, and its avariciousness. It can by pooling destroy competition; it can place its clutch upon the throat of production.

I will not now, Mr. Speaker, enter into any discussion of the merits or demerits of pooling. I will not discuss the necessity of some such system to insure the prosperity of the common-carrier interest. It is enough for me to know it places the interest of production to some extent at least in the power of the interest of transportation. It is enough for me to know that permission to exercise this power cripples production. If I must choose between crippling production and crippling transportation, then I am ready in the face of the 55,000,000 consumers in the United States to submit to the annoyances of crippled transportation.

It may be urged that if charges for transportation are reasonable, and if this is required to be enforced by legislation, there would then be no necessity for laws prohibiting pooling. Now, this at first blush seems tenable, but it will not bear investigation. The reasonableness of charges for transportation can not be determined alone by the cost of transportation. What is asked and received for transportation of an article must always be taken into consideration in the absence of law. Custom in the absence of law may become law itself. The customary price for transporting an article may, in the absence of law, become a reasonable price for transporting that article. By destroying competition the railroad interest might make customary its rate, and if not notoriously in excess of the cost of transportation such rate might be deemed by the courts reasonable. With competition such a rate might not be customary, and in the absence of this potent factor in judicial construction the courts would deem the same rates unreasonable. But, aside from all this, I deem the destruction of healthy competition in any class of business as wrong. This general proposition, it seems to me, can not be successfully controverted.

The wrongs, then, to be remedied are:

First. Unreasonable tax on production.

Second. Unjust discrimination between shippers; and,

Third. Unjust acquisition of power by combination.

Now, how shall these wrongs be remedied? And this brings me to an analysis of the bill presented by the Committee on Commerce. I refer to House bill No. 5461, which was reported by the chairman of the committee under the instructions of that committee and as representing the sense of the majority of its members.

I am aware that this bill stands before this House in a very peculiar position. It is, if you will allow me the expression, an orphan. It has neither father nor mother in that Commerce Committee. I believe that I was the only member of that committee that was in favor of the bill as reported from beginning to end. I am in favor of it without changing the dotting of an "i" or crossing a "t."

My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] has so thoroughly presented its features to the House that I need not carry my analysis into detail. It will be apparent from the arguments presented by that gentleman that he regards the commissioner part of the bill as the most important. In this I do not agree with him. I regard the features of the bill outside of those connected with the commissioner system as of equal importance with those connected with that system. The two features of the bill are necessary to each other. They should go together and should stand together.

The first section of the bill, and the most important in my judgment, is as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all charges by any person or persons engaged alone or associated with others in the transportation of property by railroad from one State or Territory to or through one or more other States or Territories of the United States, or to or from any foreign country, shall be reasonable for such service.

It provides that the charges for transportation shall be reasonable charges. That declaration includes in its scope almost everything in connection with the wrongs I have enumerated. If charges are reasonable, then there can be no unjust discrimination between shippers. If charges are reasonable, then there can be no unjust acquisition of power by combination. If charges are reasonable, then there can be no destruction of competition. If charges are reasonable, then there can be no objection to a rebate. In short, if the charges for transportation are reasonable in the United States there would not be a single individual in all the length and breadth of this land who would complain.

The second section is as follows:

SEC. 2. That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons so engaged as aforesaid directly or indirectly to charge to or receive from any person or persons any greater or less rate or amount of compensation or reward than is by him or them charged to or received from any other person or persons for like and contemporaneous service in the carrying, receiving, delivering, storing, or handling the same under substantially similar circumstances; and all persons engaged as aforesaid shall furnish, without discrimination, the same facilities for the carriage, receiving, delivery, storage, and handling of all property of like character carried by him or them, and shall perform with equal expedition the same kind of services connected with the contemporaneous transportation thereof as aforesaid. No break, stoppage, or interruption, nor any contract, agreement, or understanding shall be made to prevent the carriage of any property from being and being considered as one continuous carriage, in the meaning of this act, from the place of shipment to the place of destination, unless such stoppage, interruption, contract, arrangement, or understanding was made in good faith for some practical and necessary purpose, without any intent to avoid or interrupt such continuous carriage or to evade any of the provisions of this act.

It declares that like charges for like articles under substantially similar circumstances shall be made in all cases. That is a fair and equitable proposition, and one that should receive, I think, the recognition and support of the common carrier himself.

The third section is as follows:

SEC. 3. That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in the transportation of property as aforesaid directly or indirectly to allow any rebate, drawback, or other advantage in any form, upon shipments made or services rendered as aforesaid by him or them, which, under similar circumstances, are not allowed to all other persons.

It prohibits rebate or drawback unless granted to all alike. Can there be any objection to this? If there is a rebate granted to a citizen in my town on a certain article I have no right to complain if the same rebate is granted to me on the same article.

The fourth section is as follows:

SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in the carriage, receiving, storage, or handling of property as mentioned in the first section of this act to enter into any combination, contract, or agreement, by changes of schedule, carriage in different cars, or by any other means, with intent to prevent the carriage of such property from being continuous from the place of shipment to the place of destination, whether carried on one or several railroads; and it shall be unlawful for any person or persons carrying property as aforesaid to enter into any contract, agreement, or combination for the pooling of freights, or to pool the freights of different and competing railroads, by dividing between them the aggregate or net proceeds of the earnings of such railroads, or any portion of them.

That section of the bill demands continuous carriage and prohibits pooling. But I have already adverted sufficiently to the question of pooling. I believe that to be one of the most important features of the bill. I am opposed to striking out of the section that portion which prohibits pooling, as is contemplated by my friend from Connecticut [Mr. SEYMOUR].

The fifth section is as follows:

SEC. 5. That the provisions of this act shall apply to all property, and the receiving, delivery, loading, unloading, handling, storing, or carriage of the same, on one actually or substantially continuous carriage, or as part of such continuous carriage, as provided for in the first section of this act, and the compensation therefor, whether such property be carried wholly on one railroad or partly on several railroads, and whether such services are performed or compensation paid or received by or to one person alone or in connection with another or other persons.

That section provides that the provisions of this bill shall apply to all property and to all common carriers. But I need not touch upon that question further than I have already done.

Now we come to the penalties by which the remedies in this bill are enforced; and to this I wish to call the attention of the members of this House. I glory in the fact there is within this bill the power to enforce its provisions.

The sixth section is as follows:

SEC. 6. That any railroad company, officer of such company, or other person who shall violate any of the provisions of this act shall be liable to any person injured for the actual damages caused by such violation, which may be recovered in any State or United States court of competent jurisdiction. The court before which any such action is tried, if it shall be found that the violation was willful, or continued after the notice provided by the tenth section of this act, shall make an allowance by way of additional costs to the party injured sufficient to cover all his counsel and attorney fees and all expenses and disbursements in the action, including his own necessary personal expenses.

That section gives a civil remedy for actual damages and punitive remedy in case of willful violation. This punitive remedy is not given where there is not a willful violation of the provisions of this law. Nor do I believe that it should be given where there has been no willful violation of the provisions of this law; but wherever there has been a willful violation, then the punitive damage can be enforced, including costs, expenses of attorneys' fees, and expenses of attendance on trial, &c. This is in addition to allowing the party to recover the actual damage sustained by the violation of the law. This is one provision for the enforcement of the remedies provided by this law. In addition to this there is a provision for the enforcement of all the provisions of the bill with the exception of the first section, which is criminal in its nature.

The seventh section makes a violation of the provisions of this law, with the exception of the first section, a misdemeanor, and subjects the party to a fine of not exceeding $1,000. That section is as follows:

SEC. 7. That any corporation or person violating this act is guilty of a misdemeanor, and subject to a fine of not exceeding $1,000 for each violation. The courts of the United States shall have exclusive jurisdiction of all prosecutions arising under this section. It shall be the duty of district attorneys of the United States to institute and prosecute to effect criminal proceedings for all such violations. The provisions of this section shall not apply to the first section of this act.

As has been well stated, the reason why the first section was exempted from the provisions of this criminal section was that a man might by error of judgment make an unreasonable charge for the transportation of an article from one place to another, and it was not deemed just or equitable to punish a man criminally for an error of judgment on his part. That is certainly right; that is certainly equitable; that is certainly fair between man and man, and what is fair between man and man is fair between men and corporations.

Now, then, after the splendid argument which has been offered by my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] in relation to the commissioner system, I need not dwell on that part of the subject any further. He has so forcibly and so succinctly presented the reasons for the adoption of the commissioner system, in connection with part of the bill I have given, that I know of nothing I could add further in support of it.

For a few moments I will call the attention of the House to some objections which were presented by the distinguished gentleman from the Committee on Commerce [Mr. REAGAN] on yesterday to this bill, in the speech which he made on the floor in opening the pending discussion.

One of the first objections that was made to this bill by the chairman of the committee is the exemption of the provisions of its first section from the operation of the penalty clause of the bill. I have already adverted to that in the course of my argument and will not now refer to it again. One of his original objections was in relation to the amount of the penalties imposed. There is this difference, it will be observed, between the bill as proposed by the committee and the one that is proposed by the chairman, namely, that the bill reported by the committee provides that the penalty for a violation of its provisions shall not exceed $1,000, while the substitute proposed by the chairman provides that the penalty shall not be less than $1,000.

My experience and observation in relation to the penalty for violation of law lead me to the conclusion that it does not depend so much upon the amount of the penalty as upon the certainty of its enforcement. I therefore believe, as we have given under the provisions of this bill a remedy in the way of a civil action, a remedy in the way of a criminal action, and also an additional remedy by an appeal to the commissioners, and, if found good and sustained by them, by calling in the aid of or to the aid of the parties aggrieved the courts in granting an injunction to stay and enjoin the further doing of this wrong—I believe that with all of these remedies we have sufficient to enforce the provisions of this bill.

Another objection made by the chairman to the bill was that it does not confer enough power upon the courts. Now, I beg to call the attention of the House to the provisions of the bill in relation to that specific point, and to state in brief that courts, as a matter of course, have the power to compel the attendance of witnesses and to compel the production of all books and papers, and there is no necessity for the passage of any law to enlarge that power.

The only additional power conferred by this bill is the power that is given to the commissioners to compel the attendance of witnesses, as well as to compel the production of all books and papers in an investigation that may be brought before that board. So that it seems the objections to the bill as made by the gentleman from Texas do not properly apply to it in that regard.

Mr. REAGAN. If my friend from Kansas will allow me to interrupt him for a moment, I desire to call his attention to a point which I made in that connection, and it was that the provisions referred to are only invoked by your bill in cases between the Government and the railroads, and not in favor of the aggrieved individual, which was my objection to it. I want to do something that will help the citizen.

Mr. PETERS. The provisions of this bill, so far as they apply to the commissioner system, are only invoked between the railroads and the Government, but other provisions apply the remedies to be enforced by the courts, in which cases the same provisions apply as apply to all other cases and that are inherent in the power of the courts themselves—namely, the power to compel the attendance of witnesses, the production of books and papers, and everything of that kind necessary and relevant in an investigation before them.

Mr. REAGAN. But I beg to call the attention of my friend from Kansas to the fact that I think he is totally mistaken. There is no such power in the bill in the case of private litigation.

Mr. PETERS. I do not assert that these powers are specifically enumerated in the bill, but that they are powers that do exist inherently in the courts themselves, and it is unnecessary by a provision of this bill to undertake to confer them.

Mr. REAGAN. But my friend from Kansas will pardon me for interrupting him, as I desire to call his attention again to what, in all respect for his ability as a lawyer, I must regard as a mistake on his part. In a suit at law you can not invoke the powers of an equity court, and therefore the bill of the committee fails in affording relief in cases of private litigation, while in the substitute bill there is a power expressly given to invoke the equity powers of the court as a remedy in cases of private wrong. Now, the committee's bill provides no such remedy. You make no provision in such a suit at law for invoking equity jurisdiction and discovery as a remedy between the individual and the corporation.

Mr. PETERS. Suppose that in an action for civil damages, as provided by the sixth section of this bill, it should be necessary for the court to require the attendance of witnesses on the trial and it should be necessary to summon the production of books and papers in the trial, would not a court have the power to enforce such a provision inherently in itself? Would not any court have that power, whether a court of the United States or any court operating under a code?

Mr. REAGAN. Of course all courts of sufficient jurisdiction can by subpœna compel the attendance of witnesses; but courts at law, as I understand, can not compel, without statutory authority and without invoking the rules of equity, the production of books and papers.

Mr. PETERS. With all due deference to the distinguished gentleman from Texas, the chairman of the committee, I must still adhere to my original proposition, that when a suit has been brought under the provisions of this bill by a party who has been damaged by a violation of the law there is inherent in the courts themselves, and in the United States courts especially, the power to enforce not only the attendance of witnesses, but also the power to enforce the production of all books and papers necessary to the completion of the litigation before the court.

Now, then, the fourth point of difference is that the bill does not prohibit charging a greater rate for a shorter haul than for a longer haul, and upon this question the distinguished gentleman the chairman of the committee made a very strong and very plausible argument. But I desire to call attention again to the importance of the provisions of the first section in this bill. I agree with that distinguished gentleman that it is a wrong to charge a citizen in Albany as much for the transportation of an article from Albany to New York as is charged for the transportation of an article from Chicago to New York. But how would such a charge be determined to be a reasonable charge?

Suppose that a charge is made for the transportation of an article from Pittsburgh to New York that is equal to a charge that is made for the transportation of an article from Saint Louis to New York, would such a charge be adjudged to be a reasonable charge? Concede that it would be adjudged to be a reasonable charge, the Pittsburgher has no right to complain.

I say that the question of legislation upon short or long hauls should all be left under the legislation enacted by the first section of this bill. It is enough for me to know that if a charge is reasonable, the shipper has no right to complain of that charge, regardless of what the charge may be from some other point to some other point.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, I have now about covered the objections that have been made to this bill and the points that I had prepared in relation to its discussion. I believe that all legislation that is initiatory in its nature upon any subject should be conservative and not radical. I believe that one of the great injuries that result from initiatory legislation is that it is nearly always too radical in its terms. Legislation of this kind at all events, which is initiatory in its character, which is but beginning to cover the ground, should be conservative, so that as we obtain experience and knowledge upon the question we may add to its provisions and thereby strengthen its power and its force to do good. I therefore glory in the fact that one of the important elements of this bill is its conservatism upon this great question of interstate commerce. I glory in the fact that the interests of the transporter or of the common carrier are carefully guarded as well as the interests of the shipper and the producer. I glory in the fact that it is legislation not in the interest of the shipper and producer alone, but that it is legislation in the interest of the common carrier as well as in the interest of the producer and the shipper. I am not one of those who believe in decrying the grand and glorious results that have accrued to this country by reason of the successful building of railroads throughout its borders. I am not one of those who believe in losing sight of the immense interest that is in this country invested in railroad property; but I desire to take all measures relating to this question and consider them in the same light that I would consider all measures which relate to any other business interests. I desire to treat the question of railroad interests as it bears upon other interests the same as I would treat the manufacturing interest as it bears upon other interests. And that I believe has been the steady purpose of the language as well as the very substance of this bill.

I believe, so far as my judgment goes, there is not a single amendment to the provisions of this bill that I would propose. I therefore ask the members of this House to carefully read and examine it in detail, and I believe they will be prepared to vote for it just as it was reported to this House by the committee. I thank the House for its attention.

Mr. ANDERSON was recognized.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. MORRISON. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] yields to me that I may make a privileged motion. I move that when the House adjourns to-morrow it stand adjourned until Monday next.

The question being taken on Mr. MORRISON'S motion, there were—ayes 102, noes 41.

So (further count not being called for) the motion was agreed to.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] has been recognized.

Mr. REAGAN. If the gentleman from Kansas will give way I will move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. ANDERSON. I am willing to yield for that motion. I would rather wait.

Mr. REAGAN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. Pending the question on the motion to adjourn the Chair desires to lay before the House certain exeecutive communications.

There was no objection.

ACCOUNTS SETTLED BY FIRST COMPTROLLER.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Treasurer of the United States, transmitting copies of accounts rendered to and settled with the First Comptroller for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884; which were referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF DISBURSING OFFICERS OF WAR DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting reports of disbursing officers to accompany annual report of the inspector-General for the year 1884; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, and ordered to be printed.

ZUÑI INDIAN RESERVATION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the House of Representatives of June 24, 1884, reports from the Office of Indian Affairs and the General Land Office, with accompanying papers, relating to alleged claims to portions of the Zuñi Indian reservation in New Mexico and Arizona; also transmitting copies of letters from the Department of the Interior to Hon. JOHN A. LOGAN in reference to the order setting apart said reservation; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. J. J. ADAMS: Memorial of Church E. Gates, E. Christian Körner, and others, citizens of New York, asking Congress to authorize the Secretary of War to contract with Charles Stoughton and his associates for the entire work of improving the Harlem River, New York, &c.—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. BOUTELLE: Petition of Hannibal Hamlin and others, for the relief of Chaplain C. M. Blake—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CUTCHEON: Petition of citizens of Allegan, Mich., praying for a branch of the National Soldiers' Home in the State of Michigan—to the same committee.

By Mr. DIBRELL: A bill making an appropriation to complete the improvement in the Tennessee River at Muscle Shoals—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. A. S. HEWITT: Petition of the board of commissioners of the pilots of New York, for a resurvey of the harbor of New York—to the same committee.

Also, the petition of citizens of New York, for election of President and Vice-President by the people and limiting the term of office to six years—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. HITT: Memorial of the survivors of the Fifty-fifth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, for the passage of an act authorizing the honorable discharge or muster-out of Capt. Francis H. Shaw, Company C, Fifty-fifth Illinois—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MATSON: Petition of William Allen, for a pension—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CHARLES O'NEILL: Petition of Mary E. Fillebrown, widow of Thomas Scott Fillebrown, for a pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. W. F. ROGERS: Memorial of Wilson & Adams, Manchester & Philbric, and others, citizens of New York, asking Congress to authorize the Secretary of War to contract with Charles Stoughton and his associates for the entire work of improving the Harlem River, New York, &c.—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Also, the petition of George E. Fell, M. D., to establish the metric system of weights and measures—to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

By Mr. ROCKWELL: Papers relating to the claim of Lester Noble—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. YOUNG: Petition relating to the claim of C. B. Bryan & Co.—to the Committee on Claims.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, December 4, 1884.

RANDALL L. GIBSON, a Senator from the State of Louisiana, appeared in his seat to-day.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. WILSON, on his own motion, was excused from further service upon the Committee on Mines and Mining.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of July 3, 1884, a report from Col. A. F. Rockwell, United States Army, in charge of public buildings and grounds in the District of Columbia, in relation to a comprehensive system of telegraph and telephone for Government service in Washington on the Waring or other systems of underground cable; which was ordered to be printed, without the map, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter of the Chief of Ordnance, submitting report of tests of iron and steel and other materials for industrial purposes, made by Maj. F. H. Parker, commanding Watertown arsenal, with the United States testing-machine, during the year ending June 30, 1884, and stating the necessity for another machine, if work for private parties is to be continued. If there be no objection, the letter will be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, some of which are quite voluminous, referred to the Committee on Printing for consideration in relation to the question of printing voluminous documents.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Treasurer of the United States, transmitting, in compliance with the requirements of section 311 of the Revised Statutes, copies of the accounts rendered to and settled with the First Comptroller for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1884.

The communication was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

REPORT OF VISITORS TO WEST POINT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from W. S. ROSECRANS, president of the Board of Visitors to West Point Military Academy, transmitting the report of the board appointed to examine the affairs of the United States Military Academy at West Point; which was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter, together with the report, if there be no objection, will be printed and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CONGER. Would it be proper to ask that the maps referred to be also printed with the report?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The maps are not in the possession of the Senate. The president of the board informs the Senate that the maps were transmitted to the War Department, to be there printed.

Mr. CONGER. They should be published and distributed with the report in order to make it intelligible.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that could only be regularly accomplished by a resolution calling on the Secretary of War to transmit the maps or copies of them here so that they may be printed under the direction of the Senate.

Mr. CONGER. Does that need a resolution?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. CONGER. Or a motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion might as well be in the form of a resolution. Of course the Chair would not insist upon its being made in writing.

Mr. CONGER. I will submit a resolution in this form: That the Secretary of War be instructed to furnish to the Committee on Printing a copy of the maps accompanying the report of the Board of Visitors to West Point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be reduced to writing by the Secretary.

Mr. CONGER. Having called attention to it, at the suggestion of members of the Committee on Printing that either from that Department or otherwise they will procure the maps to be printed with the report, I shall not press the motion.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MAXEY presented the petition of Fenwick & Lawrence, of Washington, D. C., representing certain patentees and inventors, praying for an amendment to the patent law; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. HOAR presented the petition of Mary Sullivan, of Worcester, Mass., praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of Mary E. Williams, of Clinton, Mass., praying for a renewal of her pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of the survivors of the Fifty-fifth Regiment Illinois Infantry, praying for the passage of an act authorizing the honorable discharge or muster-out of Capt. Francis H. Shaw, formerly captain of Company C, Fifty-fifth Illinois Infantry; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the petition of Charles Devens Post, No. 27, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Massachusetts, praying for the publication of photographic illustrations in the Official Records of the War of the Rebellion; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DAWES presented the petition of John Bidwell, of California, praying that certain relief be granted Charles Morris Blake, post-chaplain, United States Army, retired; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

FRENCH AND AMERICAN MEDALS.

Mr. MORRILL introduced a bill (S. 2402) authorizing the Secretary of State to procure duplicates of certain French and American medals; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask that the bill may be read at length.

The bill was read the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of $75 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to enable the Secretary of State to procure duplicates of certain French and American medals presented to Congress by George W. Erving for the use of the National Library, A. D. 1822, which, being shipwrecked and lost, were replaced by Mr. Erving, and which were destroyed by the fire in the Library in 1851.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to say that in 1822 Mr. Erving, our former minister to Spain, procured from the French Government a very valuable series of medals and presented them to the Library of Congress. They were executed during the Napoleonic era and were undoubtedly some of the finest specimens of engraving and of medals. This gentleman shipped them, and they were lost in consequence of shipwreck. After that, at his own expense, he procured duplicates of the same and sent them here; and those were destroyed in the Library by fire in 1851. At the last session of Congress I procured a correspondence on the part of the Secretary of State and the French Government, and the French Government offered to supply them to us at the cost, I believe, of the bare metal, amounting to about $75, which was very generous on their part and would be a very low charge. An amendment was sent by the Committee on Finance to the Committee on Appropriations, having the unanimous consent of the Finance Committee, and the amendment proposing to procure these duplicates at the expense of $75 had no opposition that I am aware of from the Committee on Appropriations, but by some inadvertency it was not included in the sundry civil appropriation bill, and therefore was not acted upon.

I merely make this statement, proposing at some time hereafter to call up the bill, to which I think there will be no objection on the part of any Senator, in order to procure so important and valuable a set of medals, executed as they were and will be in the very highest style of art.

Mr. HARRIS. Why not consider it now?

Mr. MORRILL. If there is no objection, I will ask that the bill be put on its passage at the present moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent that the bill, which has been read at length on its second reading, be now considered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. It will be read for amendment.

The bill was read.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GROOME introduced a bill (S. 2403) limiting a portion of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes;" which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MITCHELL introduced a bill (S. 2404) granting a pension to Ulysses S. Grant; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WILSON introduced a bill (S. 2405) granting a pension to E. D. Partridge; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GARLAND introduced a bill (S. 2406) to provide for an additional judge of the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GIBSON introduced a bill (S. 2407) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of New Orleans, La.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2408) to authorize and direct the Secretary of the Treasury to cede the abandoned marine hospital buildings and grounds at New Orleans to the board of administrators of the Trelane University of Louisiana; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. LOGAN introduced a bill (S. 2409) for the relief of H. W. Hubbard; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

AMERICAN SHIPPING TRADE.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Whereas the shipping trade in American vessels is and has for years been depressed, and the export trade in American produce is languishing for want of a market that might be reached if the shipping trade was in the hands of citizens of the United States: therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be, and is hereby, directed to inquire whether it would be expedient to expend the surplus revenue of the United States, or any portion thereof, for the purpose of reviving the shipping and export trade, by allowing a rebate from tariff duties on foreign goods imported in ships built and owned in the United States, and by also allowing a premium on American-grown products and articles of American manufacture exported in American vessels, and report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I ask that the resolution may lie on the table, and I shall call it up at some future time.

Mr. VEST. Before the resolution goes over, I call the attention of the Senator from Pennsylvania to the fact that that subject is now before the Committee on Commerce. I see that his resolution makes it the duty of the Committee on Finance to make the inquiry, which of course takes the question away from the standing committee of the Senate which is now considering that very subject.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. The resolution can lie upon the table for the present, and when I submit a few remarks upon it, which I expect to do at a future time, I can change the direction to the Committee on Commerce. It makes no difference to me to which committee the inquiry is directed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie on the table.

SILVER COIN AND SILVER CERTIFICATES.

Mr. HILL submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That in the existing depressed condition of the industrial interests of the country, and in presence of the great fall which has taken place and is still in progress in the wages of labor and in the prices of the products of farms, workshops, mills, and mines, the recommendations of the President and of the Secretary of the Treasury that the coinage of silver dollars and the issue of silver certificates shall be immediately and unconditionally prohibited are calculated to create alarm and thereby aggravate the difficulties of the situation, and that, to the end that the public mind may be quieted by the assurance that if the total volume of the currency is not to be enlarged in correspondence with the increasing population and exchanges of the country, it shall at least not be reduced by suspending the coinage of silver dollars,

The Senate declares its opinion to be that no valid reason exists at the present time for imposing any new and additional restrictions upon either the coinage of silver dollars or the issue of silver certificates.

Mr. HILL. I shall at some day in the early future ask the indulgence of the Senate to submit some remarks on the subject of the resolution. Therefore I ask that it may lie on the table and be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the resolution will be printed and lie on the table.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Maine withhold that motion for a moment until the Chair makes an announcement?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pursuant to the authority conferred upon the Chair yesterday by the Senate, the Chair appoints to fill the vacancy upon the Committee on Claims the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. SHEFFIELD];

To fill the vacancy on the Committee to Examine the Several Branches of the Civil Service, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN];

To fill the vacancy on the Committee on Mines and Mining, the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. SHEFFIELD];

To fill the vacancy on the Committee on Naval Affairs, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES];

To fill the vacancy in the chairmanship of the Committee on Printing—the Chair calls attention to the parliamentary rule, that without the authority of the Senate the direction of appointments to fill vacancies on committees does not make the chairmen—the Chair understands it to be the desire of the Senate that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] should be appointed chairman. The Chair appoints the Senator from Nebraska to be the chairman of the Committee on Printing.

To fill the vacancy on the Committee on Revolutionary Claims the Chair appoints the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. SHEFFIELD].

To fill the vacancy on the Committee on Woman Suffrage the Chair appoints the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. SHEFFIELD].

To fill the vacancy upon the Committee on Indian Affairs, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER].

To fill the vacancy upon the Committee on Fish and Fisheries, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. HALE rose.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask the Senator from Maine to withhold for a few moments his motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HALE. I withdraw the motion. I understand there is some business which needs to be done this morning. I will renew the motion by and by with the leave of the Chair.

Mr. CULLOM. On the 5th of July the bill (S. 2112) to establish a commission to regulate interstate commerce, and for other purposes, was under consideration by the Senate. I supposed that the bill was postponed to and made the special order for to-day, but it seems that on the Calendar it has not been set down as a special order. Upon looking at the RECORD containing the proceedings of that day I find that the understanding seems to have been that it was made a special order for to-day. In view of the misunderstanding or the failure of the Calendar to show any special order, I should like to call up the bill and have it considered or set down for consideration at some future time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2112) to establish a commission to regulate interstate commerce, and for other purposes. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Illinois.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. It has been read at length. What motion does the Senator from Illinois desire to make?

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to have the bill considered at this time if the Senate is ready to proceed with its consideration. I have no speech to make upon it at present, nor at any other time for that matter.

Mr. COCKRELL. Has the bill been read in full?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was read on a former occasion, the Chair is informed. The bill is open to amendment as in Committee of the Whole. If no amendment be proposed, it will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If no amendment be proposed, the question is, Shall the bill be engrossed for a third reading?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read in full the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order for third reading has not yet been made. The Chair will direct that it be read in full for information.

The Secretary began to read the bill.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I see on reading the Calendar that this bill, which is a very important measure, was postponed until the first Thursday after the first Monday in December, which is to-day. I take it that not many Senators have given this matter much consideration at this session, and I suggest to the Senator having it in charge that the bill go over until next week, attention now having been called to it, and we may then act upon it with more intelligence, certainly more than I can give it this morning.

Mr. CULLOM. I am unable to hear the remark of the Senator.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I was only asking that the Senator from Illinois would allow the bill to go over until next week, as I think little attention has been given to the subject at this session; and as it was postponed last session to a special day, to-day being the time fixed for its consideration, for one I have not given it the consideration which I desired to give it. As it is a very important measure and there is no other particular business pressing for a few days, I ask the Senator to let it go over until next week, say next Thursday, if that suits the Senator. The same subject-matter is now under discussion in another place, although in a different form, as I understand. I suggest that the bill go over until next week, because we shall then have time to consider all that is being said about the matter here and elsewhere. I ask, with the consent only of the Senator from Illinois, that the consideration of the bill be postponed until one week from to-day.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senate has just voted to take up the bill for consideration. It was postponed until to-day at the latter part of the last session of Congress. It is a very important subject, to say the least, and its importance ought to entitle it to as early consideration as possible. The fact that the subject of the bill is being considered in another place, as the Senator remarks, ought not to be any reason why it should not be considered here at this time. Of course I am not disposed to be captious in pressing the bill upon the consideration of the Senate, but I think that the Senate can commence the consideration of it to-day, and if we do not get through with its consideration to-day we can finish it next week.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I do not desire to interfere at all with the wishes of the Senator from Illinois regarding the bill, as he has it in charge, but it is now before the Senate for amendment. I am quite sure in my own mind that some amendments can be offered which would be a betterment of the bill, but I am not prepared this morning to offer them. For that reason, and only for that reason, I desire its postponement.

Mr. CULLOM. Will the Senator from New Jersey consent that the bill should be made the special order for next Tuesday?

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest to the Senator from Illinois that I gave notice that I should move to take up the Dakota bill on next Tuesday, and I hope he will not let this measure interfere with that one.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the Senate will proceed with the consideration of the bill to-day, and if we do not conclude its consideration it can be taken up again as unfinished business next week. In the mean time the Senator from New Jersey will have an opportunity to prepare his amendments, if he desires to do so. I have myself no speech to make upon the bill to-day or at any other time.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Upon consultation with Senators around me I find that they also are not ready to proceed with the consideration of the bill to-day, and I ask a postponement for one week from to-day, next Thursday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The Senator from New Jersey moves that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until one week from to-day.

Mr. CULLOM. Unless the Senator will consent to the bill being made a special order for that day, I must resist the motion.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Most assuredly I consent to that.

Mr. BAYARD. I suggest to the Senator from Illinois that the Calendar contains no note of this special order at all, and it would be very well——

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator from Delaware will allow me, I stated that the Calendar had failed to note, as I think, what it should have done. That I may be justified in calling up the bill to-day I will read what the RECORD shows occurred during the last session. The Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER] moved to postpone the consideration of the bill——

Mr. BAYARD. From what is the Senator reading?

Mr. CULLOM. I am reading from the RECORD of the 6th of July last the proceedings of the 5th. The RECORD shows that it was the intention of the Senator from New York as well as myself that the bill should be made the special order for to-day, but the Calendar does not seem to have made it such.

Mr. BAYARD. I observe that on the Calendar, page 14, this bill, reported by the Senator from Illinois, is found, being Order of Business No. 533, but it was not made a special order. The consideration of the bill was "postponed until the first Thursday after the first Monday in December," but that does not make it a special order.

Mr. CULLOM. I understand that, but the RECORD shows a different state of facts. The Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER] moved that the further consideration of the bill—be postponed until 2 o'clock on the first Thursday after the first Monday of December next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT). The Senator from New York moves that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until 2 o'clock on Thursday after the first Monday of December next.

Mr. CULLOM. I have been and still am very anxious that this bill should pass during this session of Congress, but it seems to be the judgment of many Senators that it is impossible for it to become a law at any rate during the present session of Congress; and while I do not consent to a postponement of it, yet I am willing to yield to the judgment of the Senate on the question, provided it is made the special order for Thursday after the first Monday of December next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

That is what the RECORD of last July shows, and I supposed that the Calendar would show that the bill was made the special order for to-day.

Mr. MCPHERSON. To satisfy the Senator, I will move a postponement of this matter until next Thursday, the bill to be made a special order for that day.

Mr. BECK. At 2 o'clock.

Mr. MCPHERSON. At 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey moves that the bill be postponed until next Thursday, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, and be made a special order for that time. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will ask the Chair to state what condition the consideration of the bill is in, whether when it comes up on Thursday it can be amended or not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is open to amendment, it not having been read the third time. It has passed from consideration as in Committee of the Whole, but is still open to amendment. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from New Jersey, that the bill be postponed until Thursday next at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, and be made a special order for that time. Is the Senate ready for the question? [Having put the question.] In the opinion of the Chair two-thirds of the Senators present have voted in the affirmative, and the motion is agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 7428) to authorize the Hillsborough National Bank to change its name to that of the First National Bank of Hillsborough, Ohio;

A bill (H. R. 3258) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Saint Croix River at the most accessible point between Stillwater and Taylor's Falls, Minn.; and

A bill (H. R. 7510) making temporary provision for the naval service.

The message also announced that the House had non-concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7162) to forfeit the unearned lands granted to the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company "to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific coast, and to restore the same to settlement, and for other purposes," asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. T. R. COBB of Indiana, Mr. BARCLAY HENLEY of California, and Mr. L. E. PAYSON of Illinois managers at the conference on the part of the House.

RICHARD HAWLEY & SONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the Calendar under the eighth rule, commencing at Order of Business 320, being Senate bill 1170.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1170) for the relief of Richard Hawley & Sons.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope, under the circumstances surrounding this case, that the bill will be recommitted to the committee and that they will take into consideration the effect that it will have. It will invite hundreds and thousands of claimants to come to Congress for relief. It opens wide the door to the class of claims I spoke of the other day, and it will involve many millions of dollars. There is no government of which I have any knowledge that ever refunds revenue paid in the way this was paid. There is not, I presume, a State in the Union, nor a county, that would refund a tax paid under the same circumstances under which this was paid. Here the Treasury Department laid a certain tariff tax under the law, according to their interpretation of it, honestly and justly. They believed that a certain article should pay a certain rate of tax. It was paid. There was no protest, there was no remonstrance, there was no opposition to it. The money went into the Treasury and was paid out for the expenditures of the Government, supposed to be legitimate Treasury funds. After the lapse of years some one contested this rate of tax, alleging that it was more than ought to have been imposed, and brought suit to determine whether it was correct or not. The courts finally decided that the tax was greater than the law authorized, and the man who brought the suit recovered back his amount because he took the steps necessary to entitle him to recover. These parties took no steps at all, but they say "we ought to have our money back."

There are thousands upon thousands and perhaps hundreds of thousands of cases of that kind from the foundation of this Government. It has never been the policy of the Government to refund such taxes. Go into a State and into a county where a tax is paid without any protest or any remonstrance and it is afterward discovered that it was too much, or possibly that it was placed upon the wrong property; the man goes to the county court and the court refuses to refund it. The State never acknowledges any liability to refund in such cases. I think it one of the most dangerous precedents we have had before the Senate in a long time. I should be very glad if the bill could be recommitted to the Committee on Claims, so that they may give further consideration to the effect it may have.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri is usually so fair, candid, and exact in his statements, that I marvel very much at the statement just made by him. The Senator cannot have read the report of the committee, or if he has read the report of the committee he must have forgotten it when he made the broad statement which he has just made to the Senate. The Senator says this was a duty or tax paid without remonstrance and without protest. He says that it remained several years as a paid tax without any effort to recover it, and after a lapse of years the claim is brought. The Senator does not mean any such thing as that, or else the report of the committee is all false.

Mr. COCKRELL. What I meant to say was simply that the parties did not pursue the remedy prescribed by the statute, and did not take the steps which entitled them to a recovery. It does not make any difference whether the delay was one month or six months or twelve months; they are in the same category. All who do not take certain steps are not entitled under the law to recover. That was what I meant by the statement I made.

Mr. CONGER. If it did not make any difference I would prefer that the Senator in making his statement had said that within one month after the payment of this tax vigorous efforts were made to recover back the money. That would suit my case better than a postponement for years.

This is so simple a case and it is so usual a matter, that I venture to say that with a little leisure I could find twenty or thirty cases of the kind passed upon by the Senate on all fours with this in the reason for them since the Senator has been a member of this body. I have no doubt of it. This is a case where the valuation on which the duty was imposed embraced 1 cent a pound export tax of Canada on the malt to be added to the market value ascertained under the law as the value of the property upon which duties should be paid. This property never had paid the export tax. The property was bought in bond in Canada. There had been no export tax of 1 cent a pound paid on it, and that statement was made to the collector of customs, and he still decided that although there had been no payment of 1 cent a pound, although that had been no part of the expense making up the valuation upon which to assess duties, still he would assess it. The proportionate duty upon that 1 cent a pound was paid, and was paid under protest. After this amount was paid Hawley & Sons came to the collector to make an appeal to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the officer of the Government said to them: "This was decided by the Department within a few days past, and I have a copy of their decision, and it will be of no use for you to appeal." The report shows this, which the Senator has not read but which I hope he will. The officer read to them the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury giving the decision upon which he acted, and thus induced these importers to believe that an appeal under the law would be useless.

This was in the spring of 1870. A case arose of a similar kind in Chicago in the summer or fall of that year or was then pending, and the United States court, upon the issue made whether that 1 cent a pound export duty upon malt should enter into the taxable valuation, decided that the ruling of the Treasury Department was erroneous and that it should not be reckoned. As soon as that decision was made the Treasury Department altered their ruling in regard to the duty, and these parties and all other parties importing malt were notified that the former ruling was wrong and that thereafter they could import their malt without paying the duty assessed upon the additional valuation of 1 cent a pound. Immediately Hawley & Sons presented their request for a refund of this money, and were informed by the Treasury Department that the money having gone into the Treasury, it was beyond their control under the law to refund.

And here, Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to this fact, and I wish he would notice it—for my argument is more for him, because I doubt whether any other Senator has such views on this subject. Immediately upon the decision of the court the Treasury Department made an open ruling, which, if made five months before, would have admitted this malt at the rate of duty claimed by Hawley & Sons, and from that time to this that ruling has been followed.

The Senator says that it would open the way for innumerable claims and frauds and all those things to have an example of this kind. I say there are hundreds of them where the action of Congress has been had giving relief in such cases, and they can be found if it is necessary. What is the spirit of the law? We have in our statute-book a law that if after paying under protest, as this was paid, the party shall go through the formality of an appeal to the Secretary of the Treasury and that appeal is sustained by the law, the money which is in the Treasury may be drawn out without any further action of Congress or the Department and paid back. To-day and through all days that is the law. It is a simple question whether an appeal has been taken, under protest, to the Department. Here the appeal would have been taken, as the record shows, if the collector of customs, the officer of the Government, had not shown to the parties desiring to take the appeal that it was useless and induced them not to take the appeal. That is all there is of it. If the appeal had been made the money under the law would have been refunded just as soon as the Treasury Department changed its decision—just as soon as the court rendered its judgment.

The judgment of Congress is that such money paid illegally and in excess of what the law requires in the way of taxation should in some way be refunded. It provides that it may be by an appeal and a review. If a Government officer, by reading a decision of the Department lately made, prevents a party claiming to have been wronged from taking an appeal, then he comes to Congress. That I understand to be this case exactly, and that is the report of the committee.

If that be the condition, and if the law is in that situation, that by a simple appeal the money can be refunded under the law as it stands now, and this party was prevented from making an appeal, that merely formal step in the proceedings, by the collector of customs, by the officer of the Government, telling him that he had in his possession a recent decision, and it would be no use to appeal, this Government will not take advantage of the wrong of the officer, whether the amount be this small sum of $400 or $4,000 or $40,000.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan has accurately stated the facts in this case. To recapitulate, the facts are simply these: In 1870 Richard Hawley & Sons, who at that time were doing business in the city of Detroit, Mich., purchased in bond in Canada 230,940 pounds of malt. At that time, under the Canadian law, an excise tax of 1 cent a pound was imposed on all malt consumed in that country. Malt out of bond or in the market for consumption or use was consequently worth 1 cent a pound more than malt in bond. The petitioners, as I have stated, bought the malt in bond, and therefore the excise tax of 1 cent per pound was never paid or demanded in Canada. The entry was duly made in the Detroit custom-house at the price actually paid for the malt in Canada. It was, however, claimed by the collector of the port of Detroit, in accordance with a decision then recently made by the Secretary of the Treasury, that the duty must be paid upon the malt according to its value in Canada out of bond at the time of purchase, that the value must be ascertained by adding 1 cent per pound excise duty to the actual value of the malt in bond, and the aggregate was the sum on which the collector claimed that duties must be paid by the purchaser.

These claimants paid the duty according to the erroneous construction given to the law by the Secretary of the Treasury and the collector of the port at Detroit. The additional duty amounted to the sum which it is proposed by this bill to refund to the claimants, that is, $473.42. The claimants at the time of the payment of this additional tax thus erroneously imposed protested verbally against its payment, but, as has been stated by the Senator from Michigan, the collector called their attention to the fact that this identical question had then been recently decided by the Secretary of the Treasury. He not only called the attention of these claimants to that fact, but he produced the decision and read it to them, and informed them that they could, if they chose, take an appeal in accordance with the statute, but that it would be useless, inasmuch as the identical question had then recently been decided by the Secretary of the Treasury. In consequence of that representation thus made to the claimants by the collector no formal appeal was taken.

As has been stated by the Senator from Michigan, a similar case was either then or soon thereafter pending in Chicago. It was brought before the circuit court of the United States, and decided by that eminent jurist Judge Drummond, he holding that the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury was erroneous and that this additional tax thus levied ought not to have been levied. That was in 1870.

The claimants did not sleep upon their claim, but presented a petition in the House of Representatives to the Forty-third Congress asking that this sum be refunded to them. It was referred to the Committee on Claims of the House of Representatives. It was subsequently reported back by that committee, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. A favorable report was made by the Committee of Ways and Means to the House on the 8th day of May, 1874, and a bill providing for the repayment of the sum which it is proposed by the bill now under consideration to refund to these claimants was passed by the House of Representatives on the 8th day of May, 1874. No action was taken during that Congress upon the bill in the Senate.

The bill was again introduced in the House of Representatives in the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress. It was referred to the Committee on Claims in the House, and favorably reported from that committee to the House on the 29th day of June, 1876. No further action appears to have been taken upon it during that Congress. The bill was again introduced in the House during the first session of the Forty-fifth Congress, and referred to the Committee on Claims in the House. It was favorably reported from that committee, and passed the House in June, 1878. No action was taken upon it in the Senate during that Congress. It was again introduced in the House during the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress, referred to the Committee on Claims, and again favorably reported from that committee during the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress.

It was introduced in the Senate during the first session of the Forty-sixth Congress, and referred to the Committee on Claims. During the second session of the Forty-sixth Congress it was reported back to the Senate by the Committee on Claims, and upon the motion of a member of that committee was referred to the Committee on Finance. It does not appear that any action was taken upon the bill by the Committee on Finance; at least it was not reported by that committee to the Senate. It probably was allowed to sleep in that committee.

Now I submit that in view of the legislative history of the bill it does not appear that one House of Congress at least was very much afraid of the immense amount——

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I was simply going to say that it does not appear that one House of Congress was very much afraid that Congress would be overwhelmed by a flood of similar bills which were only waiting for favorable action upon this one.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not know whether the Senator stated in his Congressional history of this case the fact that this bill was reported adversely in the Senate in the Forty-third Congress, second session. The first time it ever appeared in the Senate it was reported adversely by the Finance Committee and killed. That was in the Forty-third Congress, second session. I do not know that the Senator stated that.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I have not a memorandum of it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have the history of the claim, and that is the fact. The first time it came here it was killed.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. That is, it was indefinitely postponed?

Mr. COCKRELL. Adversely reported by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. During that same session it was favorably reported from the Committee of Ways and Means of the House and passed the House of Representatives.

Mr. COCKRELL. It was a House bill that came to the Senate and was reported adversely after it had passed the House. In the second session of the Forty-third Congress it came from the House and was reported adversely by the Finance Committee.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. That may be so. I do not know whether it is or not.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is the record.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. If the Senator has the record before him, he is probably correct about it.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is House bill 2279 of that Congress.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. But, entirely outside of the legislative history of the bill, I say that equitably these parties are entitled to have this money refunded. I have heard the Senator from Missouri—I was going to say five hundred times—warn the Senate that if such a measure were favorably considered the Congress would be overwhelmed by similar claims which the claimants were only holding in abeyance until favorable action was taken upon some pending claim by the Senate. Now, we all know that precedents are of no authority whatever in this body. I venture to say that the Senator from Missouri never voted in favor of any measure because a similar measure had been favorably considered in the Senate either in that Congress or in any preceding Congress; and I venture to say that he never voted against a measure because a similar measure had been unfavorably acted upon by the Senate. This is the one body in which precedents are of no authority whatever. They are not even of any authority upon questions of order. So this bugbear—that is the expression I will use—which is held up before us by the Senator from Missouri absolutely amounts to nothing. Every case stands upon its own facts, and no bill, I venture to say, since I have been a member of this body has ever been favorably considered by the Senate because a similar bill had previously been favorably considered by the body.

It is admitted that this tax was illegally assessed upon the malt and the claimants were illegally required to pay it, and they did pay it in pursuance of an erroneous decision of the Secretary of the Treasury. Now, I would not care if there were twenty millions of these claims lying in the Treasury. I do not think there are. I think that the amount of these claims in the Treasury is very inconsiderable. If the Senator from Missouri has any statement of these claims I should be pleased to have him present it to the Senate. It is a very easy matter to say that there are thousands, hundreds of thousands, or millions in amount of these claims now lying in the Treasury. If he has any statement of the amount of these claims the Senate would be more enlightened by having that statement presented to it than by having his unsupported allegation in regard to the amount.

Mr. COCKRELL. If the Senator will take the trouble to read the finance reports showing the number of such claims from year to year he will get a good deal of information therefrom.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Quite likely. But I say on general principles of equity these parties are entitled to have this amount refunded to them; and, beyond that, there are special reasons in this particular case. Those special reasons have been referred to by the Senator from Michigan. The claimants proposed to take an appeal in accordance with the statute; but they were dissuaded from doing so by the representation of the collector of the port of Detroit. They have been persistent in endeavoring to have justice done to them and to secure the repayment of the tax illegally exacted from them.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, when the Senator from Wisconsin states that this body is one that does not pay any attention to precedent——

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The Senator will allow me a moment. The case that I referred to was decided in the circuit court of the United States for the seventh circuit at Chicago by Judge Drummond. The Government acquiesced in that decision. It took no appeal. It admitted that the construction given to the statute by the court was correct, and it has since, as I am informed, conformed to that decision.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, I rather regretted to hear the Senator from Wisconsin state that this was a body that paid no attention to precedent, for it would seem to include him at least, as chairman of the Committee on Claims, as one of those who paid no attention to the precedents of this body.

This particular claim of $400 is about a sample of many of those that come before us. They are first sent to one committee, and if they get an adverse report then the partisans of the claim seek out some other committee where they may obtain a more favorable consideration. This claim was sent years ago to the Committee on Finance and reported upon adversely and the bill was rejected. I confess that once since then when the bill was before the Finance Committee, by the importunity of some gentleman—I think a Senator from Michigan, it being known that the committee would report upon it adversely—the good nature of the committee was so far overcome as to withhold any report and let the bill die in committee.

This claim is one of those classes of claims that rest upon the regular proceedings of the claimant at the time. It is necessary for any claimant for a refund of duties to take an appeal and prosecute it. If we pass this claim, then we overrule the existing law, and that law bars numerous claims, as asserted by the Senator from Missouri, from consideration.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Will the Senator from Vermont allow me there?

Mr. MORRILL. Certainly.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. If these claimants had a legal remedy it would not be necessary for them to come to Congress, and so it is with all other claimants. Claimants who come to Congress come because they have no legal remedy in the courts or before any judicial tribunal, but they claim that they have an equitable right and one which ought to be recognized by the law-making power of the country.

Mr. MORRILL. But this claim comes here and can not pass unless we break down one of the leading statutes in relation to the government of the Treasury Department.

I wish to say also that if this claim had been submitted to any Secretary of the Treasury that we have had for twenty years he would have acted adversely upon it.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Of course the Secretary of the Treasury would. He had no authority to pay it.

Mr. MORRILL. The Secretary of the Treasury is bound to obey the law.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL. And the law that we have made about this matter is one of general propriety. We can not get along at all without such a law to bar these claims. Now, this claim comes up here fourteen years old. The claim amounts to only $400. Is it to be supposed that a claim of that kind would be so persistently pursued here in the face of the many adverse reports that have been made against it if there was not something more behind it, if there were not other and larger claims that would be admitted upon the payment of this?

Mr. President, I should think it very unwise for us to pass favorably upon this claim after the treatment it has had for the last fourteen years in the Senate.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, in less than six months after these proceedings before the collector of customs in Detroit, and in less than six months after the written decision and opinion of the Treasury Department which prevented the appeal being taken when read to Hawley & Sons, the Department acknowledged the correctness of the decision of the court, as they were bound to do, and from that day to this the importations of malt, to the extent of hundreds of thousands, if not millions of dollars, from Canada have been admitted without charging for the one cent a pound export duty.

Within six months the Department and the courts said that the Treasury decision was wrong and that money was exacted from these importers contrary to law; and not only exacted contrary to law, but by the action of the collector himself, not intentionally, but in fact misleading these claimants as to their rights and as to the probable decision of the Treasury Department upon their appeal, so as to prevent their appeal.

To Hawley & Sons, great importers of barley and of malt, the $400 may not be material; but to Hawley & Sons, and to every other citizen of the United States, the collection of a tax contrary to law, enforced contrary to the subsequent decision of the courts, is important; and any good citizen is willing to present his claim to Congress where the law itself has been violated by an erroneous construction, and he may come to the Senate of the United States notwithstanding the dignity of my friend from Vermont and his adhesion to precedents, and ask this Government to do right by him. That is what Congress is for; and this Senate is the body which should take up and do right in this and in every other case where the law has been strained to an improper purpose and taxes collected of the citizen improperly, as appears by the decision of the courts and by the subsequent decision of the Treasury Department itself. That is all that is asked here.

Why, sir, our Committee of Ways and Means will not take these claims, and they report unfavorably because they come before them. They say, "It is a new claim; the matter has not been where the Secretary of the Treasury could pay the money according to law, and if it is a claim it must go to the Committee on Claims." That is what my venerable friend tells me when I go to him, that that committee ought not to allow such a bill to pass from them. They deal with money which may be in the Treasury as a thing pending where the law authorizes them to decide that the money should be paid.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CONGER. And if the claim is a past claim, it must go through the Committee on Claims and not the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORRILL. I merely desire to say to the Senator that claims for the refund of duties have been heretofore usually referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CONGER. I know, and the Committee on Finance, or the guardian of that committee and the guardian of the Treasury, in the person of my friend from Vermont, has invariably, especially of late years, said, "That is an old claim; let it go to the Committee on Claims." To me and every other man who comes before the Finance Committee to urge such a claim as this they say, "It is an old claim; go to the Committee on Claims; there is no money to meet it now; there must be an appropriation." That is what I am told, when I go to the chamber of the Committee on Finance, by its venerable chairman. He turns me away, with courtesy enough, with kindly manner enough, but he holds before me the rule of the committee of which he is chairman, forbidding him to listen even to a just and equitable claim before that committee, because we have another committee that manages that kind of thing.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not remember that my handsome and juvenile friend ever appeared before the Committee on Finance with a claim.

Mr. CONGER. I know the forgetfulness in that is the same as the forgetfulness about the allowance of this kind of claims before. I do not impute it as a fault. I think the memory my friend has now is remarkable. He is always lively and wide-awake to watch the Treasury. His whole life, his whole political and Senatorial life, is tinctured with that grand success by which he became the nominal father, not only the putative father but the nominal recognized father, of that method which he proposed and which was adopted by Congress of bringing money into the Treasury, the "Morrill tariff bill," and with reasonable pride he may say, "My place in this world and in Congress and in the Senate is to crowd money into the Treasury, and by consequence my place is to stand and guard the door so that none shall come out, no matter how I have got it in." That is a position which any member of the Senate might envy.

There is something serious in what I am charging the chairman of the Committee on Finance with as far as I dare make any allusion to him or find any fault whatever with his course here, for it is so uniformly for the right that I wonder at its being wrong now. What does he care about taking out these $400 from the Treasury as long as that bill, which pours in millions and millions more than we can use, remains on the statute-book?

Sir, I conclude by saying that by the reports of committees, by the history of this case, by the knowledge of it which I had personally while a member of the other House—introducing bills there, the first, I think, after this decision and after this money was secured, to have it repaid—it is plain that the judgment of the House on a full statement of the facts thirteen years ago was that it ought to be paid. Then we have the affirmative and favorable reports of a House committee from that time to this on two or three or more occasions; and against it there is only the report of one committee, which itself says it has no power to meet such claims, and therefore throws them aside whenever they come before it. I present this case on its own merits, and I say, much as I oppose drawing from the Treasury by speculation or by any improper means any moneys that have come there through the law, that this case, from my knowledge of it for so many years and my examination of it, is a case where the money ought to be refunded; where the Treasury Department has said so; where the courts of the United States have said it ought to be refunded; where the House of Representatives has said so by the passage of a bill; where different committees have reported favorably upon it, and where, in my judgment, the careful examination of any man upon the statement of the facts would see that the equities are all with the claimants in this case.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 1 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, December 4, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DUNN. I ask unanimous consent that the regular order be suspended in order that the States and Territories may be called for the introduction of bills and resolutions for reference.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, before proceeding to execute the order just made, will, if there be no objection, lay before the House several executive communications.

There was no objection.

Mr. BARBOUR (by request) also introduced a bill (H. R. 7559) to correct errors in the codification of statutes and the supplement thereto; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM PORMANN.

Mr. DEUSTER introduced a bill (H. R. 7560) for the relief of William Pormann, late of Company I, Forty-eighth Wisconsin Infantry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

GEORGE F. WEST.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin, introduced a bill (H. R. 7561) to allow a pension to George F. West; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM W. WIGGINS.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin, also introduced a bill (H. R. 7562) to increase the pension of William W. Wiggins, Company E, Fifth Wisconsin Infantry, from $30 to $50 per month; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

P. C. DAVIS.

Mr. OURY (by request) introduced a bill (H. R. 7563) for the relief of P. C. Davis; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

BVT. MAJ. GEN. WILLIAM W. AVERELL.

Mr. MAGINNIS introduced a bill (H. R. 7564) for the relief of Bvt. Maj. Gen. William W. Averell, United States Army; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH H. POTTS.

Mr. MANZANARES (by request) introduced a bill (H. R. 7565) granting an increase of pension to Joseph H. Potts; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

ASSOCIATE JUSTICES IN THE TERRITORIES.

Mr. BRENTS introduced a bill (H. R. 7566) to amend an act entitled "An act providing for two additional associate justices of the supreme court of the Territory of Dakota, one additional associate justice of the supreme court of the Territory of Washington, and for other purposes," approved July 4, 1884; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

MAJ. MICHAEL P. SMALL.

Mr. ROSECRANS introduced a bill (H. R. 7567) for the relief of Maj. Michael P. Small; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

ADMISSION OF CERTAIN ARTICLES FREE OF DUTY.

Mr. DUNHAM introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 290) providing for the admission of articles from foreign countries placed on exhibition at the world's exposition of the arts, &c., by the colored race, to be held in Chicago in September, 1885; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

WATERMAN CLIFT AND ROBERT MAY.

Mr. WAIT introduced a bill (H. R. 7568) for the relief of Waterman Clift and Robert May; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

IMMEDIATE TRANSPORTATION OF DUTIABLE GOODS.

Mr. GEORGE introduced a bill (H. R. 7569) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to the immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," approved June 10, 1880; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING, BROOKLYN, N. Y.

Mr. JAMES introduced a bill (H. R. 7570) to change the limit of the appropriation for the public building at Brooklyn, N. Y.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

CORNELIA V. BLACKMAN.

Mr. PETERS introduced a bill (H. R. 7571) granting a pension to Cornelia V. Blackman; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

AMOS M'DOWELL.

Mr. PETERS also introduced a bill (H. R. 7572) granting a pension to Amos McDowell; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

DAVID M'KINNEY.

Mr. PETERS also introduced a bill (H. R. 7573) granting a pension to David McKinney; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

PROMOTIONS IN THE ARMY.

Mr. SPRINGER (by request) introduced a bill (H. R. 7574) to facilitate promotions throughout the Army by retiring from active service upon their own application officers of the Army who served in the war of the rebellion; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

RETIRING OF ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. SPRINGER (by request) also introduced a bill (H. R. 7575) to enable officers of the Army who were promoted for gallant and distinguished services in the war of the rebellion to be retired with the rank and full pay of the grade to which they were so promoted; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

COL. B. H. GRIERSON.

Mr. SPRINGER also introduced a bill (H. R. 7576) to correct and complete the record of Col. B. H. Grierson, United States Army; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

SARATOGA MONUMENT.

Mr. WEMPLE. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 1309, to provide statuary and historical tablets for the Saratoga monument.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of $40,000 be, and the same hereby is, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended by the Saratoga Monument Association in statuary and historical tablets within and upon the monument now erected at Schuylerville, N. Y., commemorative of Burgoyne's surrender.

SEC. 2. That said money shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury to the said association upon the certificate and receipt of the president of the association.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. REAGAN. If the bill can be voted on without debate there will be no objection so far as I am concerned.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WEMPLE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. WEMPLE, and to Mr. COX of New York, to have printed in the RECORD remarks on the bill just passed. [See Appendix.]

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF LARNED, KANS.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent to take from the House Calendar for present consideration the bill (H. R. 5747) to authorize the increase of the capital stock of the First National Bank of Larned, Kans., not to exceed $250,000.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the First National Bank of Larned, located in the city of Larned, in the State of Kansas, is hereby authorized to increase its capital stock, in accordance with existing laws, to any sum not exceeding $250,000, notwithstanding the limit heretofore fixed in its original articles of association and determined by the Comptroller of the Currency; and the Comptroller of the Currency is hereby authorized to fix the limit of increase of the capital stock of the First National Bank of Larned, Kans., at the amount of $250,000.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADMINISTRATION OF OATHS BY NOTARIES PUBLIC.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. I ask unanimous consent to take from the House Calendar for present consideration the bill (H. R. 6865) to amend section 2805 of the Revised Statutes of the United States so as to allow oaths to be administered by notaries public in the district of New York. This is a bill merely to allow notaries public to administer oaths.

The bill, which was reported with amendments by the Committee on the Judiciary, was read as proposed to be amended. It is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 2805 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same hereby is, amended so that the said section shall read as follows:

"SEC. 2805. All oaths to be taken upon making of any of the reports or entries or respecting any of the acts mentioned in this chapter, whether by a master of any vessel or the owner or consignee of any merchandise, his factor or agent or by any other person, shall be administered by the collector or officer to or with whom the report or entry is made or by any notary public, and shall be reduced to writing and subscribed by the person taking and by the person administering the oath."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. REAGAN. If a vote can be taken on the bill no objection will be made. If there is to be debate, I will have to call for the regular order.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Has the bill been reported by a committee?

Mr. COLLINS. It has been reported unanimously by the Committee on the Judiciary.

The amendments proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary were agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to amend section 2805 of the Revised Statutes of the United States so as to allow oaths to be administered by notaries public."

Mr. ADAMS, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DENTON & SAGE.

Mr. DUNHAM. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Private Calendar and put upon its passage the bill (H. R. 1735) to refund to Denton & Sage, of Chicago, Ill., the sum of $1,549.67 duties paid on sixty hogsheads of sugar destroyed in the great Chicago fire.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BAGLEY. I object.

Mr. DUNHAM. If the gentleman from New York will allow me I would like to explain the bill.

Mr. BAGLEY. I call for the regular order.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted indefinitely to Mr. CONNOLLY, on account of serious affliction in his family.

PRINTING OF PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. ROGERS, of New York. I desire to make a privileged report from the Committee on Printing.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the following resolution—"Resolved, That there be printed —— thousand copies of the President's last annual message for the use of the House"— have considered the same, and recommend the printing of 25,000 copies for the use of the House. With this amendment, the committee recommend the adoption of the resolution. The estimated cost of printing will be about $475.

The amendment filling the blank so as to provide for the printing of 25,000 copies was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was adopted.

Mr. ROGERS, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business, unless the special order is called up——

Mr. REAGAN. I do call up the special order, as I understand that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON], who is entitled to the floor, is ready to proceed.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The SPEAKER. The House now resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5461) to establish a board of commissioners of interstate commerce and to regulate such commerce. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, in common with members generally, the promptness with which this bill has been taken up for consideration after the recess finds me unprepared to present such facts and in such form as I should like and as the importance of the subject merits. I would much prefer time for further investigation, and also for a more careful presentation of the matter than is possible in extemporaneous speaking.

Interstate commerce embraces all traffic and travel between States, and touches every article and animal raised on the farm which is not consumed in the State where produced, and every manufactured article which is not finally used near the factory, in this whole nation. The result is that the question as to the reasonableness of freight charges is one which affects every man in America who raises and sells or buys and uses almost anything.

MAGNITUDE OF THE RAILWAY TRAFFIC OF THE UNITED STATES.

The magnitude of the traffic may be stated, or rather hinted at, in figures, but can not be realized. There were at the close of the calendar year 1883 121,592 miles of railroad in the United States, of which 120,552 miles had been completed at the close of the fiscal year of the companies. The average mileage operated was 110,414 miles. The amount of money alleged to be invested in these roads is stated as being in share capital $3,708,060,583; in funded debt, $3,455,040,383; in floating debt, $332,370,345; making a total of $7,495,471,311. The service performed by these corporations during that period consisted in transporting 312,686,641 passengers, or more than six times the total population of the United States in 1880; for the performance of which work the companies received $215,287,824.

And it is interesting by way of comparison to notice the difference in the rate of charge in the different groups of roads. For the purpose of comparison reduce the passenger traffic in each group to the equivalent number of persons hauled one mile, as is customary in railway statistics, and you will find that in New England there were 1,187,719,657 passengers moved one mile at a charge of 2.15 cents each; in the Middle States 2,489,766,204 persons moved at a charge of 2.17 cents each. Now, the number moved in the Western group of States was still larger, being 3,834,082,895, but the charge was still higher per passenger, being 2.56 cents. In the Southern group there were 613,891,085 persons, at 2.82 cents; and in the Pacific group 415,849,833, at 2.84 cents. So that the total passenger traffic of the United States in that year was equivalent to 8,541,309,674 persons moved one mile at a charge of 2.42 cents each.

Coming to the more important element of traffic, that of freight, we find the whole number of tons moved that year by railroad to have been 400,453,439, probably worth $15,000,000,000, for the performance of which service the companies received $549,756,694. Reducing the distance which this freight was carried to its equivalent of tons moved one mile, and we have 44,064,923,445, at an average charge of 1.24 cents per ton per mile I give here the statistics of the separate groups: The number of tons moved one mile in the New England States was 1,807,112,979, at a charge of 1.7 cents per ton per mile; in the Middle States, 16,100,054,154 tons, at a charge of 1.04 cents; in the Southern, 2,546,941,900, at 1.78 cents; in the Western, 22,548,598,390, at 1.23 cents; in the Pacific group, 1,062,216,022, at a charge of 2.2 cents. It will be noticed that though the volume of traffic in the Western group is greater than that of the Middle group the rate is higher.

Any one, Mr. Speaker, who will examine these and kindred facts, as presented in Poor's Manual of 1884, will find the greatest inequality in charges in the several groups, and that of itself is a question fairly challenging the attention of this House. The gross receipts of these roads were $823,772,924; an increase of $53,563,025 over the previous year. Their net earnings were $336,911,884. Of this latter amount they paid interest $173,139,064 and dividends $102,052,548. I also quote a statement of the gross and net earnings per mile for the last five years, which may be of value:

Earnings per mile of road.

Year.	Gross.	Net.
1879	$6,652	$2,761
1880	7,475	3,318
1881	7,548	3,078
1882	7,377	3,005
1883	7,461	3,051

THE RAILROADS PAYING 10 PER CENT. PROFIT ON THEIR PRESENT VALUE.

Now the profit on the capital actually invested, that is, on the real worth of the roads, was not less than 9 and probably over 10 per cent. I am aware that the esteemed gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] yesterday left the impression, at least on my mind, that this profit was only about 3 per cent. I suppose he meant on the amount of the face value of the bonds and stocks. His language was:

Look at some of the figures. The $6,000,000,000 or more invested in the 125,000 miles of railroads in the United States pay only about 3 per cent. to their stockholders.

The inference naturally follows that the charges of the roads must necessarily be so low as to be wholly reasonable. In contravention of this proposition I shall cite the highest of all authorities on railroad statistics, Poor's Manual, to show that the amount of money actually to-day invested in these roads and the amount of earnings reported will indicate a profit to them of at least 9 per cent. and perhaps over 10 per cent. Furthermore, the question as to what a road is really worth enters into the question as to what is a reasonable charge for the freight carried over it; and I maintain that a road is worth just what it can be duplicated for. Take any road in the United States—one reported, we will say, as having cost for its construction $100,000 a mile, but which could now be built for $25,000 a mile—and that road is worth to-day no more than $25,000, because it can be duplicated with this expenditure. It is entitled to charge a fair interest upon its actual worth, but in fact at this time, and for years past, the whole country is being taxed for the purpose of enabling men controlling these roads to draw 3 per cent. interest on double, treble, or quadruple the real value of the roads, by means of fictitious stocks. Let me quote two paragraphs bearing on this question:

The preceding statement shows that since 1880, a period of three years, there have been opened in the United States 28,405 miles of railroad, and that 6,091 miles were opened the past year up to the close of the fiscal years of the several companies. The increase of share capital and indebtedness of all the companies for the three years ending December 31, 1883, was $2,093,433,054, the cost of the new mileage as represented by share capital and debt being about $70,000 per mile. The increase in the three years of the funded debts of all the companies was $924,165,440; of their floating debts, $169,880,406; of the two, $1,094,045,846. It is not probable that the cost of the mileage constructed in the three years equaled the increase of funded and floating debts by at least the sum of $200,000,000. The cost of the mileage constructed certainly did not exceed $30,000 to the mile. The whole increase of share capital, $999,387,208, and a portion of the funded debt, was in excess of cost of construction.

Again:

If it be assumed that the cost in money of all the roads in operation in the United States in 1883 did not exceed, as it certainly did not, the amount of their funded and floating debts, $3,787,410,728, the actual investment was a most profitable one. The net earnings for the year were $336,911,884, a sum equaling about 9 per cent. on their cost. If the fictitious capital could be eliminated from their accounts, their success as investments would have no parallel. If to net income be added the advantages that flow from them, the result would be a matter of especial wonder. Our railroads the past year transported over 400,000,000 tons of freight. At $25 the ton the value of this freight would equal $10,000,000,000.

THE FARMER PAYS THE FREIGHT ON WHEAT SHIPPED TO EUROPE.

Here, then, we have these corporations collecting from somebody over $823,000,000 during the last year, and in each year increasing the sum of their collections, and the pertinent question for us now is: Who pays that money?

I take as an illustration on this branch of the subject the one chosen by my colleague on yesterday, namely, the transportation of wheat; and I concur in his remarks, able, clear and convincing as they were, upon that point. Any difference between us is solely of judgment as to means, and not of spirit or final object. The price, as every one knows, of wheat, the great product of the farmers of the West, as is cotton that of the farmers of the South, is determined in Liverpool; simply for the reason that there England, acting as a buyer for those who must consume the surplus of all wheat-growers, has the benefit of competition between them. Assume, then, that after this competition the price of wheat in England is fixed at 100 cents a bushel. The price in New York will be about 88 cents a bushel, because it costs 12 cents a bushel to take it from New York to Liverpool. At Kansas City the price will be about 55 cents a bushel, since the roads charge 33 cents for carrying it from Kansas City to New York, and in my district the price will be 40 cents, for the reason that the roads charge 15 cents for carrying it to Kansas City from a point one hundred and fifty miles within the State of Kansas. Of course these figures also include the relatively small charges for commission, &c., say 2 cents.

Now, in response to the question as to who really pays that freight, it is perfectly clear that the farmer pays it. Because if his bushel of wheat were at Liverpool he would receive $1 for it, but being at Abilene he receives just what is the Liverpool price, less the cost of transportation to Liverpool. In other words, the farmer in my district who sells his wheat at 40 cents in accepting that price pays a freight rate of 60 cents a bushel for carrying it from Kansas to Liverpool.

THE PRESENT FREIGHT CHARGES EXTORTIONATE.

That raises, then, the question whether this charge is a reasonable charge. There is no one, Mr. Speaker, upon this floor who is not entirely willing to give to the common carrier a fair interest upon his investment and a fair compensation for the service performed by him, and I am the very last man to take any other position than that either here or anywhere. But in taking that position I take also the position that, at least in my own judgment, I would be recreant to my duty in consenting that these corporations, no matter what their power or what their wealth, should extort from the farmer even one mill more than that which is fair, reasonable, and just. Are they doing this? Let us see. We will take the charge of 15 cents for carrying a bushel of wheat one hundred and fifty miles in Kansas. You will find that the rate from Kansas City to New York is about two and a half cents per bushel per hundred miles, which, at the same proportion, would make the rate from Abilene to Kansas City about four cents per bushel.

But the actual charge, as I have said, is 15 cents. In other words, they charge 11 cents a bushel more for a one hundred and fifty mile haul than the rate at which they make a profit in carrying it from Kansas City to New York, and they excuse this increased charge upon the alleged grounds that a short haul costs more than a long one. Well, say it does, to a certain extent. But, bless my life, is it not longer from New York to the center of Kansas than it is from New York to the border of Kansas? And therefore are not these farmers entitled to the long-haul rate as distinguished from the short-haul rate? In my own judgment there is not a shadow of doubt that the 33-cent rate on wheat from Kansas City to New York is not less than 10 to 12 cents over and beyond a reasonable profit per bushel, and from Abilene to New York not less that from 20 to 24 cents beyond a fair profit.

Now, suppose that by a reduction of rates effected by legislation a difference in favor of the shipper of 20 cents had been made, what then? Why, the wheat that sold at Abilene at 40 would have sold at 60 cents per bushel manifestly. On the wheat crop of Kansas alone, say 48,000,000 bushels, a difference, say, of only 20 cents a bushel would amount to $9,600,000, and make just the difference between this profit to the farmer, enabling him to accumulate something for a rainy day, and that poverty which, receiving no profit, can accumulate nothing.

To show the rates charged by Eastern roads I quote a statement of the freight charged per ton per mile: On the New York Central, 9 mills; the Pennsylvania, 8 mills; Erie and Western, 7.8 mills; the Boston and Albany road, 1.19 cents. That is a Massachusetts road, and Massachusetts is a State where they rely upon "moral suasion," upon "publicity," upon the effect produced by a railroad commission which is not clothed with any particular power by law, and which chiefly desires only to turn up the wick of the lamp of truth in order that the light of "publicity" may be thrown upon the conduct of its railroads. And yet that road is charging a good deal more than other important roads. Contrast this Boston and Albany rate of 1.19 cents with Philadelphia and Erie, .62; Lake Shore and Michigan Southern, .73; Michigan Central, .83; and with Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne and Chicago, 8 mills per ton per mile.

THE SOUTHERN FARMER PAYS THE FREIGHT ON COTTON SHIPPED TO EUROPE.

But let us turn to the crop which is the great product of the South—cotton. Like wheat, its price is made in Europe. Eighty-four per cent. of the cotton used by all Europe last year was raised in the United States. During that year the whole of Europe used 6,930,000 bales, and received from the United States of that amount 4,497,000 bales. The crop in this country in 1882–'83 was 6,949,756 bales. It was raised from an acreage of 16,276,000, and was worth, I suppose, over $400,000,000. That is a crop which is almost universally marketed outside of the area of production. Ninety-six per cent. of the whole cotton crop of the South was sent to Northern mills and to foreign countries; 32 per cent., or 2,225,712 bales, being used in the United States, and the rest, or 68 per cent., being exported.

Now, it is quite clear that since the price of that article is determined in Europe, the cost of transporting it from the field to its final market is paid, not by the man who buys and ships the cotton, but by the man who raises the cotton, just as in the case of wheat; and therefore that, since the raiser of the cotton pays the freight, any difference in the amount of freight affects, of course, the amount of profit which he makes upon his crop. The following table shows the production of cotton by States:

	Bales.
Alabama	810,000
Arkansas	697,000
Florida	62,000
Georgia	942,000
Louisiana	560,000
Mississippi	1,064,000
North Carolina	463,000
South Carolina	630,000
Tennessee	337,000
Texas	1,326,000
All other States	66,000
	6,957,000

SHIPPERS NO LONGER PROTECTED AGAINST HIGH FREIGHTS BY COMPETITION BETWEEN RAILROADS.

We are often told that the great safeguard of the grower of products shipped by rail is the competition between carriers. It is alleged that competition is the safeguard of all trade; that almost from time immemorial this fact has been one of the laws of trade and recognized as a fundamental principle of political economy. And that statement was formerly correct. But any gentleman who will look at the effect which the building of railroads, which the employment of steam as a motor on water in the transportation of freight, which electricity, which the printing-press have had upon capital, upon labor, upon the great trade movements of the world, will find that these are factors which have very largely eliminated competition as a real force in commerce. And the question is to-day whether the farmer who raises wheat or who raises cotton, or any one else who is compelled to pay freights for rail transportation, actually possesses the safeguard of competition; whether the competition between the Pennsylvania Central and the Baltimore and Ohio and the New York and Erie and the New York Central, as rival carriers, secures to him the lowest rate at which the service can profitably be done.

What are the facts in regard to that? The canny Scotchman who invented, or at least used, the first locomotive and built the first railroad, enunciated a sound though in his day a ridiculed proposition when he stated that "where combination is possible competition is impossible." To-day that proposition has supplanted competition as a safeguard. If you will stop a moment to think of the extent to which combination has been carried and of the vast area over which competition has been abrogated you will be startled. Take one-half of this continent, that west of the Mississippi River; with the Northern Pacific, with the Union Pacific, with the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé, with the Texas Pacific, one would think that certainly so vast an area would in competition find a safeguard against all extortion by these companies. But what are the facts? Every single one of those roads is pooled with the others for the express purpose of preventing competition. And to such a degree is the perfection of these pools carried that they do substantially prevent competition. And you find that the people who control these lines, that Jay Gould, Dillon, Huntington, the Boston parties, and a few more men whom you could count on the fingers of your two hands, are in such combinations that they actually do collect from the whole area of half a continent precisely what rates they please, and that the farmers in that area who raise and ship their products, or who buy manufactured articles, are forced to pay the rate which, under their pool and by its abrogation of competition, these men are enabled to extort.

THE OCEAN COMMERCE THROTTLED BY RAILROAD POOLS.

But we are told that the water ways of the country are our safeguard. I used to think they were. It seemed to me that at least upon the waves of the Atlantic and the heaving billows of the Pacific Ocean, where no rail could be spiked and no locomotive run, there assuredly and eternally would be an open highway in competition with the transcontinental lines. But what are the facts? Why, sir, that the California roads are to-day in pool with the ocean steamers, and have wiped out competition by compelling the steamship lines to form the pool or be run out of the trade. So that not only does Huntington own all California in that sense, not only do these few men control the whole half of the continent in that sense, but they control the Pacific Ocean in so far as by steamship lines it comes in competition or may come in competition with their roads. And why? Because they have the capital to do it. Where do they get it from? They get it from the men who raise the crops and ship them over their roads, and use that precise money in building steamship lines to prevent these very men from having the benefit of competition that a beneficent Creator designed when placing the oceans.

Take the case with respect to the Atlantic Slope, which largely furnishes our cotton-fields. Before the war the great avenues of cotton shipment were down the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers and abreast the Atlantic coast. How is it to-day? Have you the competition which one would naturally suppose should result from these geographical conditions? Let me read a paragraph or two upon this point. I read from a paper by Joseph Nimmo, Chief of the Bureau of Statistics of the Treasury Department:

The railroads of the country have become with respect to all "through traffic" virtually one system of transportation, and their efficiency as highways of commerce has been enormously increased. Between the years 1852 and 1875 several great east and west trunk lines were constructed from the Atlantic seaboard to the Mississippi River, connecting subsequently to the year 1864, at Cincinnati, Louisville, Cairo, and Saint Louis with great railroad systems extending into all parts of the "cotton belt." It was not, however, until after the late war that the managers of the great east and west trunk lines, and of the trunk lines extending southward from the Ohio River and from Saint Louis, were led to believe that they could successfully compete with water routes for the transportation of cotton to Northern mills and to Northern seaports, even from the southern part of Tennessee and from Arkansas; but the northward "overland" all-rail movement amounted during the year ended August 31, 1883, to 1,178,560 bales, or 17 per cent. of the entire cotton crop. Not only is cotton thus transported from Tennessee and Arkansas, but also from points far down toward the Gulf, in Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas, and from the northern portion of Georgia. The eastward movement by rail in connection with that northward overland has had the effect of reducing the receipts at Gulf ports from 3,427,585 bales in 1860 to 2,945,149 bales in 1883.

There are the facts, and the following paragraph reveals how these marvelous charges were effected:

One of the most noticeable features of the cotton movement of the present day is the fact that the transportation of a very large proportion of the cotton grown in the Southern States is now controlled and directed by great railroad systems and pooling arrangements. All the railroads engaged in the transportation of cotton to the Atlantic seaboard in the States of Virginia, North Carolina, and Georgia, as well as the several lines of steamers plying coastwise between the ports reached by such railroads and the ports of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, have, in so far as relates to competitive traffic, united in a pooling agreement. This copartnership arrangement, known as the Southern Railway and Steamship Association, was organized in the year 1875 by Mr. Albert Fink.

RAPACITY OF THE TRUNK-LINE POOLS.

Coming to the region north of the cotton belt and east of the Mississippi River, and we find that competition has here also been eliminated by two great pools, which control the whole area and traffic; that their joint executive committee, of which this same Mr. Fink is chairman, regulates all rates, putting them up or putting them down as they see fit. I read from the July report of the Department of Agriculture, made by J. R. Dodge, statistician:

At a meeting of the joint executive committee, held in the office of the chairman, Albert Fink, 346 Broadway, New York city, June 13, it was agreed that the following articles in car-loads, which have heretofore been in the eighth class, be placed in a special class, namely: Grain, flour, feed, bran, meal, middlings, oil cake and meal, and cotton-seed cake and meal, and that, taking effect June 24, the rates thereon shall be on the basis of 20 cents per 100 pounds, Chicago to New York; and taking effect Monday, July 21, proximo, the rate be advanced to the basis of 25 cents per 100 pounds. Also that, taking effect same date, rate on seventh class and live hogs will be on the basis of 25 cents per 100 pounds, and on ninth class 30 cents per 100 pounds, Chicago to New York; and taking effect July 21, proximo, the rates on these classes will be further advanced to the basis of 30 cents on seventh class and 35 cents on ninth class.

The following statement shows the rates that took effect June 24, and the advanced rates to take effect July 21, Chicago to New York: June 24, 1884, special class, grain, &c., 20 cents; seventh class and live hogs, 25 cents; eighth class 25 cents; and ninth class 30 cents. July 21, 1884, special class, grain, &c., 25 cents; seventh class and live hogs, 30 cents; eighth class, 25 cents; and ninth class, 35 cents.

This advance in the basis of rates, Chicago to New York, increases the rates on the articles named which are destined for Eastern markets from all points east of the Mississippi River.

What was the effect of that? Simply to increase the charge of transporting wheat 5 cents on the hundred pounds or 3 cents on the bushel. In other words, it took just 3 cents per bushel out of the pocket of the farmer who had raised the wheat and had it for sale. I have no doubt that similar arbitrary increases have been made of rates on cotton and all other products. There is no pretense that the rates were so low prior to June as not to give the roads a fair compensation. They were high enough before the increase to be "reasonable" as to the companies. They raised the rate just because they had the power and could make more money; that was the only reason.

THE BENEVOLENT ORDER OF "AMERICAN THUGS."

I wish to look a little at the moral side of that act. This high-joint executive committee, or, rather, these high-joint executioners, by raising the rate 5 cents a hundred pounds, simply because of the plethoric crop of wheat which was coming in, reduced its value 3 cents per bushel to the owner of the crop—took 3 cents out of the pocket of each of those men for each bushel of wheat. It was done by pooling—by an organization of gentlemen who wield power as the officers of the pool, and who individually are said to be very respectable men. They are employed to do this business, and sell their services as such agents for large salaries. But what difference is there in the effect of their action upon the farmer of my State or the cotton-raiser of your State, between taking 3 cents a bushel from the value of the wheat, or going to that farmer and taking 3 cents out of his pocket? That action reduced the value of wheat in my State $1,440,000.

For one, I can not see a shade of difference morally between these high-joint executioners, acting as willing agents for Jay Gould, Vanderbilt, the Boston interest, and the other owners of roads, converting that one million and a half of dollars from the pockets of the farmers of Kansas into their pockets, and these same executioners going directly to the pockets of the farmers in Kansas at midnight and robbing them of $1,440,000. If any other gentleman can see the difference I can not.

Oh, it is more "prudent," perhaps, to regard the power, the wealth, the influence in politics, the influence of such papers as they own, the "respectability" of these men owning these roads and employing "respectable" men to do this thing. But morally I can see no difference between that action and absolute, naked, bald-headed robbery; and I wish to suggest that the day may come, before a Supreme Court which neither Jay Gould nor Mr. Vanderbilt can possibly influence—the day will come after their death—when they and their pool executioners in their individual capacity, not as incorporated partners nor as official thugs, will have the moral side of that act justly passed upon. The thousands of toiling men who raised and owned that wheat will be witnesses.

SHALL AN AMERICAN CONGRESS PROTECT THE AMERICAN PEOPLE?

There is, however, to be considered by this House that other question, whether these men shall be permitted to do this thing while the people who pay these $823,000,000 have not the protection which under competition they ought to have, and while railroads are public highways? That is a question for us to settle, just as New York may limit the charges of Niagara hackmen. You would not have any doubt as to the legality of regulating their rates; and I do not know any three or four or five hackmen in Niagara or elsewhere who are more rapacious, more conscienceless, than Mr. Gould, Mr. Vanderbilt, Mr. Huntington, and you may throw in a half-dozen more of that ilk with my full consent.

That is precisely the point which the bills we are considering purport to secure, to protect the people. Yet we are told in the outset that we must be "conservative," that we must not go too fast, that we must be very cautious, that we must rely upon moral suasion; that we must let the light of publicity, as it does in Massachusetts, illuminate the minds of these men and the public. Just how much does Jay Gould care for the light of publicity? He has had a great deal of that. And when you find in actual fact that the raising of 5 cents a bushel in the rate of transportation of the wheat of the United States is equivalent to the transfer of millions and millions of dollars from the people of this country to the pockets of these men, just how long are you to be "conservative?" How slow are you to go? If we have not been going slow enough, and if either of these bills, for that matter, does not propose action that is sufficiently conservative, then I am occupying a different standpoint from that of the gentleman who thinks otherwise.

DIFFERENCES BETWEEN THE REAGAN BILL AND THE COMMITTEE BILL.

Take up these bills. What is the difference between them? The Reagan bill says the charges shall be reasonable, which is the law now, and it imposes a penalty when the charges are not reasonable. The committee's bill says the charges shall be reasonable, and expressly exempts that section from any penalty. This matter of reasonable charges I have only illustrated in that 5-cent raise on the transportation of the wheat of the country, and its importance to the people is almost infinite.

But we are told we must not impose a penalty because these men might have formed an erroneous judgment. How many erroneous judgments do Albert Fink and the high-joints form? If they do form erroneous judgments, and if those erroneous judgments are always for the benefit of their employers and never for the benefit of the people—and that has been a fact ever since they began pooling—is it not now time to let the people have a little bit of benefit, by a penalty imposed as against their erroneous judgments? Because, sir, everybody is satisfied as to their general cussedness—at least I am. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I criticise no man's opinion who differs from me on this floor. I impugn no man's motives. I recognize the difficulty of this subject, and recognize the fullest liberty of conscience and judgment and purity of action in every man; but to my mind the exemption from penalty for violation of that section as to reasonable charges is just simply a railroad dodge, and I would not be surprised if some railroad attorney had written it. Perhaps that is a clause of the old Charles Francis Adams bill; he is now, by the way, president of the Union Pacific Railroad—a tropical plant from frigid Boston! [Laughter.]

REBATES.

The next difference is that the Reagan bill prohibits rebate, and the committee's bill says it does, and then says it does not. And it does not. The exact difference between the two bills on that point is this:

SEC. 3. That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in the transportation of property as aforesaid directly or indirectly to allow any rebate, drawback, or other advantage in any form, upon shipments made or services rendered as aforesaid by him or them.

That is the Reagan bill and that is an express prohibition. But the committee's bill qualifies it in this way: "and which under similar circumstances are not allowed to all other persons." That is, that they shall not allow rebates, but if they do they shall not allow any rebate which under similar circumstances is not allowed to all other persons. They shall not do a given thing; but if in spite of the law they do it, then they shall do it universally!

I would like to hear a railroad attorney, if that clause were enacted and the question were before a court upon the phrase "similar circumstances"—I should like to see how many kind of circumstances his ingenuity would suggest. He might say this, for instance: We could allow rebate to a manufacturing company or to the owner of a lumber mill somewhere for the reason that he did a large business, that he was one of the most prominent men in his community, that he exercised large political influence, which might be useful in the event of any attempt at State legislation or national legislation, and that to him as the only man in that county we may lawfully allow rebate; that at the next county seat they would allow the same thing to only one man because the circumstances were "similar," and so on in every county in the State.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in just this rebate dodge you find the parentage of the Standard Oil Company. It is there you find the means by which the railroad power of the United States elevates itself and hopes to exercise ultimately, if not yet, absolute power in every State in this Union. If they can make rebate to one man they can make it to another. The Reagan bill says they shall not rebate. The committee bill says yes, you shall not rebate—unless you do it!

I am opposed absolutely and unqualifiedly to any form of rebate. I can see no justice in it; and even if there be cases that are equitable, I can see on the other hand infinitely greater dangers to the liberty and purity of this Republic by permitting any such unjust policy to be legalized by granting rebate to anybody; and for that reason I prefer the Reagan bill on that point.

POOLING.

The next provision is in regard to pooling. The committee's bill says that you shall not pool, but that the commission shall report upon the question whether you ought not to pool! That is what it amounts to. Any man who will look to-day at the effect of these pools—not at an exhibit as made up by railroad experts and attorneys, Mr. Albert Fink, for example, but from the standpoint of the people and their welfare—will see that these pools are a wrong to the public. I think so, at any rate, and for one I shall support any legislation that we may formulate which will absolutely prohibit this pooling thuggery, and make every violation of such prohibition a criminal offense, for I regard it as a mode by which there is perpetrated a sheer robbery of the people.

THE "COMMISSION" COMEDY.

Then comes this commission arrangement. The committee, in formulating their bill, say that we shall have a commission. Very well. If you will enact the provisions of the Reagan bill and then establish a commission, that would not be created in the interests of the railroads and pass a law which does not expressly provide the appointment of a railroad man—for that is just what they might all be in the end, every one of them—but take your railroad commission and order them to enforce the provisions of the Reagan bill, I am ready to have a railroad commission. But, gentlemen, it seems to me that, in the examination I have given to this bill—and of course I may be incorrect, and therefore I criticise the judgment and conclusions of no man which differ from my own—it looks to me as if the committee had taken up the Reagan bill, and felt as if they must report against pooling, rebates, and the rest of these outrages, because a storm was beginning to break, and then as if some railroad attorney, with his ingenuity, had sought how best to break the force and effect of the storm, how best to extract the teeth of the Reagan bill, and gotten up the commission. I say I may be wrong, but it strikes me that way, as the usual dodge of the corporations; and in so saying I do not in the least reflect upon any member of the committee.

But, Mr. Speaker, what power has that commission? Why, it is expressly limited; the committee's bill says:

Said commission shall exercise only the powers by this act conferred.

What are they?

That for the purposes of this act the commission shall, subject as in this act mentioned—

have full power to ascertain and report upon all questions of fact arising under this act, &c.

I shall not go into the details, but if I understand the bill correctly, and I may not have done so, the only way that the commission can obtain knowledge upon which it can act at all is through a complaint made by some one. If it ascertains a violation of the law by any one company, if I understand it, the commission cannot of itself institute proceedings upon that information alone. It must wait until some man somewhere, and for some cause under the law, makes a complaint of its violation, and his complaint is attested before a United States district attorney.

If such a complaint amounts to anything, then the commission may hear it and institute proceedings under the act or take steps to examine into the matter. But in the first instance it is necessary that a complaint shall be made, as I understand it. In other words, Mr. Speaker, it is very much like a commission of a similar character established in my own State, a portion of the framework of which original bill was drawn by railroad attorneys connected with the Santa Fé and other railroads in their interest and for the express purpose of preventing anything being done. But their scheme was defeated.

NO GREATER CHARGE FOR A SHORTER THAN FOR A LONGER DISTANCE ON ANY ONE RAILROAD.

Now we come to the question as to the prohibition against charging any greater compensation for a shorter than for a longer distance on any one railroad. When I read that I thought it meant that they must prorate. For instance, if there is a rate from Kansas City to Denver and the charges are so much, then from Kansas City to Topeka the charge must be in ratio. This Reagan bill does not say that. I, for one, would not accept the provisions of a bill that did so, as far as my vote goes. What it does say is just this, and the committee's bill has no such provision:

SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in the transportation of property as provided in the first section of this act to charge or receive any greater compensation for a similar amount and kind of property, for carrying, receiving, storing, forwarding, or handling the same, for a shorter than for a longer distance on any one railroad; and the road of a corporation shall include all the roads in use by such corporation, whether owned or operated by it under a contract, agreement, or lease by such corporation.

That is all. They shall not charge, for instance, more for freight from Kansas City to Topeka than from Kansas City to Denver. They shall not charge more for freight from Pittsburgh to Columbus than they do from Pittsburgh to Saint Louis, but they may charge as much for the shorter distance as for the longer; and I am frank to say that that principle, or rather the one it suggests, is an important one both for the West and for the South. I am ready to recognize the difference in cost, as a factor in the reasonableness of charges, between a long and a short haul, but this provision does not touch the question further than that they shall not charge more for one hundred miles than on that same road for five hundred miles; and there is no gentleman, it seems to me, from the West or the South who can doubt that this is for the interest of his section, and as far as that interest is concerned, that such a provision would be advisable.

DIRECT REGULATION OF RAILROAD CHARGES.

Now, Mr. Speaker, on a comparison of these two bills, though neither of them purports to regulate rates, as between the Reagan bill and the committee's bill I am unquestionably in favor of the former. As between either of them and a bill which created, say, a commission, or which by a direct act regulated the rates of the railways of the United States, I should prefer the latter. My objection to these two bills is that it can only be said of them that either of them is better than nothing. The committee's bill is mighty little better. The Reagan bill is a good deal better. Yet I doubt whether you can effectively prohibit "pooling" and "rebate." I doubt whether prohibition will be found to prohibit in that matter. But if it should, then you have only relied upon the force of a competition which does not exist, and which you can not restore to its original status and upon publicity; while, because of your conservatism or tender-footedness, you do not affirmatively regulate the rates of these lines.

Looking from the standpoint of the people and their interest as I see it, I for one am not only ready but anxious to engage in any legislation which shall go much further than either of these bills goes, and which shall be affirmative action regulating the rates of these roads.

Objection was made yesterday to the Reagan provision as to the posting of schedules, and it was alleged that it would take five days, perhaps ten, for a trunk line under that provision to change its schedules. If that should be so, what of it? Is it not better that the people should have such notice than that a high potentate Albert Fink shall, by a simple twist of the wrist, extract $10,000,000 out of the pockets of the farmers of my State and many more millions of dollars out of the people of the nation? Are these roads imperial in the sense that in addition to having gone beyond the realm of justice to the people they are also beyond the confines of ordinary propriety and decency? It will take, forsooth, five days or ten days to distribute the schedules! A nice idea! Sticking in the bark, gentlemen! Too thin!

THE CONTROL OF RAILWAYS BY THE NATION ESSENTIAL TO THE SAFETY OF THE REPUBLIC.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion I wish to state what, in my judgment, will be the effect upon the prosperity of the people of this nation and upon the purity and perpetuity of the Republic if, on the one hand, these railroads be not regulated in their charges, and, on the other hand, if they be so regulated. I have shown, I think, that it is within their power to charge the traffic all that it will bear; in other words, to take from the farmers, the producers of this country, their legitimate profit. That is the reason they made the raise of 5 cents on wheat. Suppose now that for twenty-five years you continue a process by which the profit of the agricultural labor of this land, instead of being given to the farmer, is given to Mr. Gould and Mr. Vanderbilt and the other owners of roads, what will be the result? These men will become voluminously rich. No doubt of that; because they will be receiving the profits of the farming labor of the country.

But what about your farmers? They will be poor. Each year will find them in the same state of poverty. They will not get ahead. They will not be able to provide for their families, to educate their children, or to accumulate something to leave them. Then what, gentlemen? Then will come riot! Why? Because you will have vast masses of poor, discontented men, who would be the majority of the voters of our country. That will be the result if the success of the attempt made heretofore by the railroad corporations of this country shall be continued; if they shall still prevent legislation by States; if they shall prevent legislation in this House; if they shall use the exact money extorted from the people, for the express purpose of preventing such legislation as shall prohibit them from extorting that money; if they shall in this way control this House, or—a much easier body because a smaller one—if they shall control the United States Senate; if finally, as their last triumph, they shall enter the Supreme Court; and thus through a period of years legislation giving relief to the people shall, by their corrupt, most infinitely damnable, practices, be defeated. Then what? Then capital must come face to face, not with the thinking men of the country but with the mob. So that capital itself has more at stake in securing efficient railway legislation than even the farmers have.

New England manufacturers who sell their products to the West and South have a greater interest at stake in this legislation than all New England capital invested in roads. New York's imperial position can only be maintained twenty-five years hence by cheap railroad rates—in no other way—because it will be but a few years until there will be fifty millions of people west of the Mississippi River, and when they are there they will have their own railway system and their own water transportation. The distance from Topeka, Kans., to the Gulf of Mexico is just the same as from Topeka, Kans., to Columbus, Ohio, and the haul from Columbus to New York is just that much extra. In my judgment, either we must regulate these roads, either a fair share of the profit must go to the men who raised the crop, or within twenty-five years, either peaceably if a law can be passed, if not, which I deplore, by means that no man could approve, there will some day be a great settlement and a final and just decision of that question which was raised 1,800 years ago, aye, 6,000 years ago, whether the man who does the work may have his share of the profits, or whether some more powerful man may throttle him and take that share from him!

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I think I can justly claim that the agitation of this question of railroad discriminations began in the district which I represent. Individual rights were so completely ignored, corporate power was so arrogantly and unfairly exercised, that the patience of our people was utterly exhausted, and they cried out for relief.

In the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress I introduced a bill to regulate interstate commerce and to prohibit unjust discriminations by common carriers. And soon thereafter I secured the passage of a resolution instructing the Committee on Commerce to investigate the charges of favoritism and combinations by railroad companies. That investigation proceeded far enough to prove specific acts of gross discrimination. But by some process, never yet explained, the investigation was smothered at a critical juncture, and the testimony already taken disappeared from the committee-room. I feel sure that what I state will be corroborated by my distinguished friend the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, who was then a member of that committee. The gentleman from Texas (Judge REAGAN), to whom I refer, took a lively interest then in the effort to protect the people against the wrongs inflicted by corporations. And I am glad to know that ever since then he has labored faithfully, zealously, and ably to secure the legislation necessary to that end.

I am willing to admit that there is less ground for complaint now than existed nine years ago. But I apprehend the reason is that during that time eight States have embodied in their Constitution clauses prohibiting discriminations, and the further reason that bills have been pending in each Congress since to place the strong hand of the Government upon the offending corporations. If a wholesome fear of penal statutes has wrought so much good, it is fair to presume that the enactment of a law upon the subject will accomplish still greater results. And it is also fair to presume that the defeat of this bill will remove all restraints and cause a repetition of the wrongs so earnestly complained of. For the nature of corporations has not changed. They are as rapacious, remorseless, and selfish as they were nine years ago. They are as ready as ever to benefit their friends and favorites at the expense of the general public.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that this view is confirmed by the action of the great railroad companies in reference to the pending measure. Their opposition is earnest, persistent, and bitter. Whenever this question has been before Congress these corporations have appeared, represented by the ablest and most distinguished counsel whom money could employ. I have here one hundred and eighty-nine closely-printed pages of argument delivered before the Committee on Commerce in opposition to the Reagan bill. It is true that certain features of the bill are especially attacked; but it is equally true that the spirit of all these arguments is against any bill asserting the authority of Congress over the subject-matter and prescribing penalties for violations of the law of common carriers.

If no wrongs are practiced or contemplated, why this intense opposition? Just and law-abiding men have no fear of penal statutes. Corporations which intend to deal fairly and equitably with all men will not object to measures of relief to those who may be unfairly and unjustly dealt with.

While I think this is a legitimate inference from the hostility of the railroad companies, we are not left to inference as to the substantial fact of the existence of great wrongs which this bill is intended to redress.

It is boldly and specifically charged that an arrangement exists by which the transportation of live-stock is controlled by an association called the board of eveners, who receive a bonus of at least $15 per car upon all live-stock shipped over certain lines of traffic. This sum is, of course, taxed upon the customer, and is a grievous burden to the poor, to whom nutritious and cheap meat food is so essential.

Besides this, boards of trade, chambers of commerce, agricultural societies, and individual shippers in all parts of the country have sent up resolutions, memorials, and protests against the policy of discrimination practiced by most of the leading corporations. These are practical men, who have personal knowledge and experience of the injuries done them; and having failed to secure redress, they earnestly and emphatically demand that Congress shall throw its shield over them and lay a rod on the backs of those who have oppressed them. All this goes upon the assumption that Congress has the constitutional power to grant the relief prayed for. Can there be any doubt of that? The Constitution expressly declares that Congress shall have power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States."

And judicial decisions may be piled upon text-books monument-high, and on every side may be read in the clearest language a construction of these words so plain and simple in themselves.

Commerce means more than the mere barter of goods. It embraces everything by which purchase and sale can be effected, including transportation.

In his Commentaries upon the Constitution, Story, reviewing the clause already quoted, says:

> It may, therefore, be safely affirmed that the terms of the Constitution have at all times been understood to include a power over navigation as well as trade, over intercourse as well as "traffic."

And the highest judicial tribunal in the land has again and again affirmed this doctrine, and maintained the complete power of Congress to control "the subject, the vehicle, and the agent" of commerce.

For sixty years this question has in various forms been before the Supreme Court of the United States, and I believe in every instance the power of Congress to regulate or control commerce in its broadest and fullest sense has been clearly and unequivocally sustained.

Chief-Justice Marshall said "a power to regulate navigation is as expressly granted as if that term had been added to the word 'commerce.'"

Whether or not this great jurist foresaw that other methods would be used for conducting commerce than by navigation, his arguments and illustrations apply with equal force to commerce by means of railroads. He says:

> Commerce among the States can not stop at the external boundary line of each State, but may be introduced into the interior. * * * And if the trading intercourse be between two States remote from each other, must it not commence in one, terminate in the other, and probably pass through a third? (Gibbons vs. Ogden, 9 Wheaton.)

And, as if to emphasize the power of Congress and sweep away all restrictions with which the ingenious counsel of railroad companies might seek to hedge in this power, Justice Marshall adds:

> This power, like all others vested in Congress, is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations other than are prescribed in the Constitution.

And the only limitation is that contained in section 9 of article 1, to wit:

> No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another; nor shall vessels bound to or from one State be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another.

And yet we find to-day railroad corporations undertaking to do, ay, and boldly and persistently doing, that which Congress is expressly prohibited from doing.

The student of the Constitution is constantly compelled to pay reverence to the inspiration which guided the framers of that matchless document. They framed an instrument adapted to all circumstances and to last for all time. They looked far into the future, and foresaw and provided for new and then unknown conditions. They saw the growth of corporate power, the exercise of franchises injurious to the people, and yet beyond the control of State authority. And they provided that Congress should "control commerce among the States," and in that control that "no preference shall be given" to any locality. The current of trade was to flow in its natural channels, and no artificial chutes were to be permitted to turn it aside for selfishness or avarice.

To any unbiased mind it must seem clear that the pending bill is in the exercise of a power expressly granted and is to correct abuses expressly prohibited.

For the benefit of those who have any doubt as to the powers of Congress in this regard, and for the convenience of those who wish to investigate the train of judicial thought upon this question, I refer to Gibbons vs. Ogden, 9 Wheaton; Steamship Company vs. Port Wardens, 6 Wallace; Passenger Cases, 7 Howard; United States vs. Coombs, 12 Peters; Redfield on Railways; The Clinton Bridge Case, 16 Am. Law. Reg.; The Clinton Bridge Case, 10 Wallace; Brown vs. Maryland, 12 Wheaton; The City of New York vs. Miln, 11 Peters; Grover vs. Slaughter, 15 Peters; Corfield vs. Coryell, 4 Wash. C. C. Rep.; Wilton vs. The State of Mo., 1 Otto; License Cases, 5 Howard; Erie Ry. Co. vs. Pennsylvania, 15 Wallace; The Granger Cases (4), 4 Otto; Railroad Co. vs. Richmond, 19 Wallace; Cooley vs. Board of Wardens, 12 Howard; Thomas vs. Railroad Co., 11 Otto.

From these authorities it will be learned that the power to regulate commerce means the power "to prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed." "And this intercourse"—which is covered by the grant of power and embraced in the definition of commerce—"must include all the means by which it can be carried on, whether by the free navigation of the waters of the several States or by a passage overland through the States." "The power to regulate it embraces all the instruments by which such commerce may be conducted." Transportation of passengers or merchandise through a State or from one State to another is of this nature.

"The fact that several different and independent agencies are employed in transporting the commodity, some acting entirely within one State and some acting through two or more States, does not affect the character of the transaction."

"I have no doubt of the right of Congress to prescribe all needful and proper regulations for the conduct of this immense traffic over any railroad which has become part of one of those lines of interstate communication."

The power being settled beyond all controversy, why should Congress hesitate to exercise it? For years there has been a universal demand from the people that the abuses complained of should cease. But thus far corporations have defied the people. It remains to be seen whether or not they will respect the supreme law of the land.

During the present session, as during prior Congresses, delegations have come up from the people demanding Congressional aid against a power grown arrogant by long impunity. So far as I know, not a single association or individual has objected to the pending measure, except the officers and counsel of railroad companies. Even the shareholders of these corporations realize the importance to them of legislation which will prevent a recurrence of "railroad wars," so disastrous to all interested.

Jealousy and rivalry, and often the imprudent and unauthorized act of a subordinate official, cause the bitterest hostility between these companies, and they rend and tear each other like mad giants and unsettle all commercial business during the struggle. They become reckless of the loss they inflict upon themselves, provided they can injure their opponents. Hence they need to be protected against each other. Their stockholders need protection from the ruinous policy of their officers. And the wise provisions of this bill will accomplish that result. Pools and combinations—which are only made to be broken, and broken with disaster to all—are herein prohibited; and each company will be required to act upon business principles of healthful rivalry, which stimulates trade and rewards energy and diligence when exercised in accordance with judgment and experience.

The corporations opposing this bill in a general way admit their duty as common carriers, and in doing so they admit a constant violation of their duty; for common carriers are bound to receive and carry the goods of all alike, upon the same terms, and with equal facilities. (See Chitty's Commercial Law on this subject.) And yet the companies attempt to justify a policy in direct violation of this fundamental doctrine.

The law of common carriers is older than the Constitution. The duty of perfect fairness and impartiality to all shippers is clear and imperative. No discrimination, no favoritism can be tolerated.

Forced to admit that this is the law, the violators of it want to compel the victims to seek redress through the slow and inadequate remedies of the common law. They well know their vast advantage in such an unequal contest. The companies, with counsel employed by the year and with a well-organized force of witnesses, would be more than a match for any individual opponent. And they would worry and utterly crush out small shippers, whose damages might be serious to themselves but too little to justify protracted and expensive litigation. In the interest of all, but especially of the poor and those of moderate means, it is necessary that there should be other remedies than the common law affords.

The pending bill provides some of these needed remedies, all of which sections I cordially support. But I propose to offer an amendment giving an additional and, in my judgment, a more effective remedy. Under it a railroad company can be compelled by a writ of peremptory mandamus to receive, transport, and deliver all goods offered for shipment upon equal terms and with equal facilities. The fear of imprisonment for contempt of court will have far more effect than any possible penalty contingent upon a verdict by jury. And, besides this, shippers can make contracts for the delivery of goods with a reasonable certainty that compliance will not be defeated by the arbitrary act of some railroad official. A compulsory enforcement of right is far more efficacious and satisfactory than even punitive damages for the wrong done. This remedy is prompt and vigorous, and I think adds much to the completeness of the bill.

The clauses in this bill creating a commission and prescribing its power and functions are, as I understand it, merely auxiliary to the general purpose. The rights and remedies of individuals can not be impaired by the commission. But, on the contrary, supplemental guarantees are herein provided for the maintenance of rights and enforcement of their remedies. There is a well-grounded fear in the public mind that the insidious power of corporations might control public officers charged with the oversight and partial regulation of those corporations. So that the usefulness and efficacy of the commission will depend upon the character of the men who may be appointed, upon their intelligence, zeal, courage, and incorruptibility. If redress could be had only through these commissioners, the injured people might well conclude that we were giving them but a barren scepter. I greatly prefer the substitute offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], but believing that no harm can result, and hoping for much good from the creation of the commission, I see in these provisions no sufficient ground for opposing the bill in case the substitute should not be adopted.

It is urged as an objection to this bill that it is another effort to centralize power in the Federal Government. I admit, Mr Speaker, that this argument would be potential with me if I believed it had any substantial basis. I have seen with no little alarm the bold disregard of old-time rules of interpretation of the Constitution and the open attempt to absorb all power in the General Government, and to justify it in the name of patriotism. Surely the men who laid the foundations of the Republic and cemented them with their blood, the men who reared the magnificent superstructure, strengthened every beam and arch and column and architrave with their prayers—those inspired builders knew how to adapt the several parts in perfect symmetry and strength, so that the completed whole presented a marvelous model without an omission or an excess. I can follow blindly, and with implicit faith, the guidance of the patriot fathers. And wherever they have indicated a limit of Congressional power, that is to me the ultima Thule of our jurisdiction.

But, Mr. Speaker, I have endeavored to show, and I think I have shown conclusively, that one of these powers especially given to Congress in the Constitution is the very power sought to be exercised in this bill. And, aside from that, this bill contemplates no exercise of power by the Federal Government against the people. But it is an intervention in behalf of the people against corporations which oppress and defy them.

The wrongs are grievous and have at times been intolerable. The State authorities are powerless. Will Congress afford relief, or will an enraged people be left to seek that redress which is born of despair? I solemnly believe that this grave issue is presented, and it is the part of wise statesmanship to give it grave consideration.

While this bill guarantees but simple justice to the shipper, it is in no sense hostile to the railroad companies. I verily believe it will prove beneficial to them also. As soon as they adjust themselves to the requirements of the law they will realize the wisdom of its provisions, and the increased value and stability of their securities will justify the measure which their fear and their pride condemn.

Every sensible man recognizes the incalculable benefits which railroad companies have conferred upon the public. By prudent and just action these companies can quiet the angry discontent which prevails and awaken a kindly feeling toward them. There is no individual or corporation too powerful to despise or defy this sentiment. I trust that Congress will aid in promoting it by the passage of this bill.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 2402) authorizing the Secretary of State to procure duplicates of certain French and American models; and

A bill (S. 2297) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Saint Croix River at the most accessible point between Stillwater and Taylor's Falls, Minn.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5461) to establish a board of commissioners of interstate commerce and to regulate such commerce.

Mr. SHIVELY Mr. Speaker, in all points of agreement as between the committee bill and the substitute bill offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] I most cordially approve both. In all points of difference between the committee bill and the substitute bill I emphatically indorse the latter. And for the present, waiving all discussion of the general principles underlying these measures and the constitutional prerogative involved in legislation on this subject, I would briefly emphasize two or three of the points of merit contained in one of the bills as compared with the other.

It is under the force of public opinion that this question is being pressed to a vote. This public opinion has been aroused and rendered aggressive by certain abuses in the railway management of the country. In the calendar of these abuses are mentioned extortionate rates, discriminations, rebates, drawbacks, cut-rates, pooling, and kindred irregularities destructive to the productive and distributive interests of the people. And certainly any measure of corrective legislation should embrace, to say the least, proper remedies for the more conspicuous of these abuses. In the light of these facts I approach a discussion of the peculiar, rather than the general, features of the respective measures now pending. Turning to the first section of the committee bill, we find this provision:

That all charges by any person or persons engaged alone or associated with others in the transportation of property by railroad from one State or Territory to or through one or more other States or Territories of the United States, or to or from any foreign country, shall be reasonable for such service.

This section recognizes the existence and injustice of unreasonable charges, and would seem prophetic of a purpose to remedy the evil. And, as if in pursuance of this purpose, the opening clause of the penal section, or section 7, is made to read as follows:

That any corporation or person violating this act is guilty of a misdemeanor, and subject to a fine of not exceeding $1,000 for each violation.

But hope is dispelled, and suspicion as to the genuineness of the purpose is naturally aroused by the language of the concluding clause of this section:

The provisions of this section shall not apply to the first section of this act.

Now, I respectfully submit that this exemption of section 1 from the operation of the penal provisions of the bill renders that section only a morsel of gratuitous advice to the transportation companies of the country. It in fact goes further, and practically legalizes in a negative sense the very abuses which section 1 should prohibit. It is, however, urged on the contrary that the substitute bill makes no express provision for the regulation of rates, and that, on the point of reasonable or unreasonable charges, the merits and demerits of the respective measures are equally distributed. True the substitute bill contains no express provision contemplating an arbitrary regulation of rates. It may be inexpedient at this stage of progress on the subject to go to this extent, though I have not the slightest doubt of the right and power of Congress to do so. But, in addition to containing no direct remedy against unreasonable charges, the committee bill does not even guarantee to the shipper the benefits arising from properly regulated competition. It contains no provision whatever against charging more for a shorter than for a longer distance. This is an important point and merits special attention. It involves a form of discrimination both dangerous and far-reaching in its results. To illustrate: A shipper at Bourbon, Ind., is compelled to pay a higher rate per car-load of freight to Philadelphia than is paid by the Chicago shipper over the same line, though Bourbon is situated ninety miles east of Chicago. Two years ago the railway management operating lines through Michigan City, Ind., granted the Chicago lumber merchants a lower rate than that granted the Michigan City merchant, though the latter city is situated nearer the market than is the former. A very striking illustration of this form of discrimination was developed by an investigation before the Forty-fifth Congress, which elicited the fact that for transporting a car-load of ordinary freight from Omaha to San Francisco the company charged $300, while for transporting a car-load of similar freight by the same line from Omaha to Virginia City, six hundred miles east of San Francisco, the company charged $800. In other words, the charge for the shorter distance was $500 more than for the longer distance.

I might go on multiplying cases illustrating this point, but these will suffice. By this discrimination, Chicago, regardless of the circumstance of greater distance, was placed nearer the market than Bourbon or Michigan City, and San Francisco was moved east of the Rocky Mountains in its relations to the Eastern markets. Now, in the presence of this species of favoritism, there can be no fair trading, no honest distribution of the commodities of commerce, no equitable exchange of the products of labor, between different and distant parts of the country. Yet concerning this dangerous factor in railway management the committee bill is entirely silent.

This silence is especially significant when considered in connection with the exemption of section 1 of the bill from the operation of the penal provision. Where do we find these railways practicing their most violent forms of extortion? Of course, at non-competing points. What is the method employed by the railways at these points in their levy of unjust tribute? The charging of more for the shorter than for the longer distance, as illustrated by actual cases just cited. What is the remedy for this evil? This question is answered by section 4 of the substitute bill, which makes it "unlawful for any person or persons engaged in the transportation of property as provided in the first section of this act to charge or receive any greater compensation for a similar amount and kind of property for carrying, receiving, storing, forwarding, or handling the same for a shorter than for a longer distance on any one railroad."

This provision protects non-competing points against unjust discrimination, and, together with the provision against pooling, renders the benefits of competition universal. The abuse aimed at by this clause is so glaring and the remedy offered so just to both shipper and carrier, that it deserves the unqualified support of every member friendly to the people's side of this controversy.

The substitute bill provides for the complete abolition of the whole system of rebates and drawbacks. The committee bill declares against rebates and drawbacks to any particular person "which, under similar circumstances, are not allowed to all other persons." If the words "similar circumstances" mean simply circumstances of time and place, this section, instead of preventing rebates and drawbacks, opens up the way to discrimination, and in its most violent form. While it might possibly prevent discrimination as between two merchants in the same city, it guarantees no safeguard against discrimination as between two merchants in different cities.

For instance, the Chicago merchant, who gets a nominal rate of $500 per car to New York, is granted a rebate of $200, making the actual rate $300. The South Bend merchant, located eighty miles east of Chicago, gets a nominal rate to New York city of $450 per car, is granted a rebate of $75, making the actual rate $375, or an advantage of $75 to the Chicago merchant. Now, in this case the provision of the law is complied with. All other South Bend merchants must have a $450 rate with a $75 rebate, and all other Chicago merchants must have a $500 rate with a $200 rebate, providing all circumstances connected with and surrounding the various transactions are precisely "similar!" South Bend would be at an absolute disadvantage, as compared with Chicago, in her commercial relations, but as the circumstance of place, to say the least, would not be "similar," there would be no redress. It would be interesting to observe a judge who has agreed to go "to the very verge of judicial discretion" to befriend the roads, as was the case in New York not long since, construe the expression "similar circumstances." If rebates are granted alike to all it amounts to a uniform reduction of rates, and no possible benefits can accrue to roads from surrounding their management by all this red tape.

The whole system of rebates and drawbacks is but a cunning scheme to secure the benefits of discrimination under the color of fair dealing. Wherever it has been practiced the worst results have followed. By granting the Standard Oil Company a rebate of $1 on each barrel of oil shipped over their lines, four companies in the short time of seventeen months paid into the treasury of the Standard Company the immense total of $10,151,000. This monstrous discrimination against all competitors bankrupted and absorbed 95 per cent. of all competition and has made the Standard Oil Company the light despot of the civilized world.

And what is true as between the railway companies and the Standard Oil Company is true in a greater or lesser degree in other directions. And no legislation less radical than that contemplated by the bill offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] will meet the exigencies of the occasion. The "conservative" legislation of which gentlemen speak will only by its impotency retard rather than advance the settlement of existing difficulties. While the committee bill embraces many commendable features, its defects are of a most fatal nature.

Indeed, in view of the exemption of the first section from the operation of the penal clause, its implied indorsement of the rebate system, its uncertain tone on the question of pooling, the absence of any provision against discriminations in favor of the longer as compared with the shorter distances, its limiting the highest penalty for its violation to $1,000, all coupled with the complicated machinery governing the proposed commission, it should be entitled "A bill to not regulate interstate commerce."

In addition to the peculiar features of these respective distinctions already noticed, I would lend special emphasis to the importance of the proposition embodied in the committee bill to create a railway commission, consisting of three men, to be appointed, and one, at least, of whom must be a practical railroad man. If this House, after due deliberation, decides to create this commission, I shall accept that judgment with becoming grace, at the same time seriously questioning the wisdom and practicability of such policy.

I do not share the great expectations professed by the gentlemen who support this measure. While I make the most charitable allowance for the predominance of patriotism over selfishness in the mind of the average citizen who might be appointed on such commission, I am not blind to the plain and palpable facts of the peculiar and overshadowing influence that must surround the board of commissioners.

The railway interests of the United States, representing a capital of $7,000,000,000, operating 125,000 miles of road, moving $15,000,000,000 worth of commerce annually, reaching into every avenue of trade, extending over every field of enterprise, embracing every department of industry, and affecting every fiber of our political and national life, would be placed in the scales held by this commission over the rights and liberties of the people. I am opposed to such a mighty concentration of power in any appointed body of men.

If the railway management of the country was strong enough in its infancy to dispossess the American people of a quarter of a billion acres of public lands; if this management has been able to stifle legislation on the floor of this House for the past ten years; if it could expend $235,000 in a single year to purchase legislation in a single State; if it has, as has been charged and frequently proven, gone into our legislative bodies and broken down the virtue of some of our strongest and best men; if it has, as charged and frequently proven, gone into the courts of the country and defiled the judicial ermine; if, as charged on reasonable evidence, this railway management has gone into the executive mansions and compelled executive favors, and with the wake of Congressional investigation strewn with political skeletons bleaching under the uncooled wrath of public opinion, I am not ready to vote to place this mighty power for good or evil in the hands of any three men, however far above reproach they may be.

No, I prefer the comprehensive, practical, convenient, and, as I believe, potent remedy of the bill presented by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN]. I trust this latter measure may become a law. The time has come, the hour has certainly struck, for this House to take a decisive step forward on this great question of public policy. The 250,000 products of American inventive genius have solved the question of production. By the intelligent application of steam, heat, electricity, and other forces of nature we have multiplied our productive power in the various departments of productive industry from ten to one-thousand fold, so that we are able to produce wealth to-day at a rate not dreamed of fifty years ago. By this means we have solved the great problem of production.

Now the American people are confronted by the problem of exchange and distribution. We must face the fact that progress in improving our systems of production has outrun progress in the development of our systems of exchange and distribution. This condition of things can result only in increased inequalities in the community, which for the want of adequate and proper systems of distribution breed discord and discontent.

This measure is at least a step in the direction of improvement. The problem has been partially solved. By the intelligent application of electricity all considerations of time and distance are eliminated from human calculation and the nations of the earth brought face to face. To improve our facilities for the transportation and distribution of the products of labor is the living issue. Pass the substitute bill. The productive and distributive interests of the country demand it. Public opinion will sanction it. The public conscience will approve it.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not know whether any other gentleman desires to speak on this question to-day, but there are some members of the Committee on Commerce, some from having been absent and others from indisposition, who have been unable to be heard, who wish to continue the debate for another day; and I shall therefore move to adjourn.

INTERNATIONAL MERIDIAN CONFERENCE.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following message of the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication from the Secretary of State, submitting the text, in the English and French languages, of the proceedings of the International Meridian Conference, provided for by the act of Congress approved August 3, 1882, held at Washington during the month of October, 1884.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, December 4, 1884.

The message and accompanying papers were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. VALENTINE for ten days, on account of sickness in his family.

And then, on motion of Mr. REAGAN (at 2 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.), the House, in pursuance of a previous order, adjourned over until Monday, December 8, 1884.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BALLENTINE: The petition of trustees of the Cumberland Presbyterian church—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. BARKSDALE: The petition of Milton S. Haire, to have his claim referred to the Court of Claims to correct errors in the decision of the late Southern Claims Commission—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. CALDWELL: A bill for continuing the improvement of the Cumberland River, Tennessee—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. CLEMENTS: Petition relating to the claim of Eli H. Diekson; also, petition relating to the claim of Harriet Gordon; also, petition relating to the claim of Samuel Harper—severally to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. S. S. COX: Memorial of P. Cudmore, with regard to the claims of volunteer soldiers—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. W. R. COX: Petition of President Battle and others, in behalf of an agricultural experimental station at the University of North Carolina—to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. ELLIS: Petition relating to the claim of A. Verrett—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. D. B. HENDERSON: Resolutions and petitions for the relief of Capt. F. H. Shaw, Company C, Fifty-fifth Illinois Infantry—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. JEFFORDS: Petition relating to the claim of Mary J. Parker; also, petition of James C. Newman, to refer claim to Court of Claims to correct errors in decision of late Southern Claims Commission—severally to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. LYMAN: Petition of Timothy Ingraham Post, No. 121, Department of Massachusetts, for publication in Official Records of the War of the Rebellion of photographic illustrations—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MCMILLIN: A bill for the continuance of the improvement of the Cumberland River above Nashville, Tenn., by locks and dams—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. MILLARD: Petition of the Co-operative Labor and Land Improvement Association, relative to the public lands—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. CHARLES O'NEILL: Petition of R. D. Wood & Co. and others, asking Congress to establish the metric system of weights and measures in the Departments of the Government—to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

By Mr. PETERS: Petition of members of the Eighth Kansas Volunteers, for a pension for Mrs. Blackman—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. PRYOR: Memorial of John D. Inman, administrator, &c., of Argy L. Garner, for reference of his claim to the Court of Claims under act of March 3, 1883—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. ROSECRANS: Petition of William P. Graves, captain Second Artillery, and others, in favor of a bill to facilitate promotions throughout the United States Army—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SENATE.

MONDAY, December 8, 1884.

Prayer by Rev. J. M. REID, D. D., of New York city.

JOSEPH E. BROWN, a Senator from the State of Georgia; WADE HAMPTON, a Senator from the State of South Carolina; and LUCIUS Q. C. LAMAR, a Senator from the State of Mississippi, appeared in their seats to-day.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last was read and approved.

INTERNATIONAL MERIDIAN CONFERENCE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit herewith a communication from the Secretary of State, submitting the text, in the English and French languages, of the proceedings of the International Meridian Conference provided for by the act of Congress approved August 3, 1882, held at Washington during the month of October, 1884.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, December 4, 1884.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the message will be printed, and, together with the accompanying documents, referred to the Committee on Printing for consideration of the question of printing the voluminous report.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a statement of the expenditures at the Springfield armory, and of the arms, components of arms, and appendages fabricated, altered, and repaired thereat during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1884; which was ordered to be printed with the accompanying report, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting the report of the armament board convened under the provisions of an act approved July 5, 1884, for the purpose of determining the various calibers, lengths of bore, greatest and least admissible weights of guns for each caliber, &c., of all ordnance required for the service; which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Postmaster-General, recommending an additional appropriation for clerks in post-offices for the current fiscal year; which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting the report of the surveyor-general of New Mexico in the case of the private land claim of Antonio de Salazar, No. 132; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting the report of the surveyor-general of New Mexico in the case of the New Mexico private land claim of Sebastian de Vargas, No. 137; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate bills from the House of Representatives for reference.

The bill (H. R. 7510) making temporary provision for the naval service was read twice by its title.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, before any disposition is made of the bill the title of which has been read by the Secretary I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the condition and status of the naval appropriations for the present fiscal year, beginning July 1, 1884.

The regular naval appropriation bill for the current fiscal year during the last session gave rise to material differences between the two Houses. In endeavoring to adjust those differences in conference the time of the session was consumed, and the House and Senate found themselves confronted on the very last days with an impossibility on the part of the conferees of the two bodies to agree. Under those conditions a bill was introduced in the House of Representatives and passed making what I may call a lump appropriation for the Navy Department for one half the year, running to the 1st of January next. No attempt was made in that bill to particularize, but the appropriations for the preceding year were taken, and 50 per cent. of them given in bulk to the Navy Department. That bill came to the Senate, and after some debate and some amendment, which the House rejected, was agreed to.

Under that lump appropriation—for I continue to call it by that name as describing it—the Navy Department has been run. The old bill, the regular appropriation bill, with all the subjects of difference which gave in terms to the Department and in detail to each bureau, still remains where it was left, the conferees having reported it, the bill itself being now bodily either with the Senate or the House. It is an appropriation bill framed in the usual manner, giving particular appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885. It was my belief when the temporary appropriation was passed that on Congress reassembling in December that bill, the regular appropriation bill, would be taken up, new conferees appointed, and that they would proceed to consider it and report to the two Houses. Instead of that the House bill, which has just been announced from the table of the President, renews the lump appropriation for the rest of the year, thereby by the two bills simply continuing the appropriations for the year ending June 30, 1884, into the year ending June 30, 1885.

With all due respect to the bill that is now before the Senate, I may say that I do not for one like that method of appropriating money. I do not think there should be a resort to an appropriation of this kind unscrutinized, simply depending on last year's appropriations, except in cases where we are obliged to do it by the imminence of an adjournment or by some cause that can not be removed. I do not think that Congress ought in any case where it is not obliged to embark upon that method of making appropriations of public money, and I should much prefer that the regular appropriation bill, regularly framed last session in the House, discussed and amended there, reported to the Senate and discussed at length and amended here, should be taken up, put into a new conference, and reported as the bill for the rest of the year. I should much prefer that to taking this form of appropriation.

There is another thing which by this measure is entirely taken away from our consideration now. Senators will remember that upon the naval appropriation bill last year was ingrafted the proposition for more new ships. That provision is upon the bill in the form of a Senate amendment. The House refused to accept it. The House conferees took ground upon the action of the House, and the Senate maintained its ground; and, therefore, the bill lodged in conference and was reported to the Senate in that way. But to my mind the sooner now the Senate deals with that great subject which was put upon that bill the better. If we consider the bill with the new ships upon it, and are able in conference with the House conferees to agree upon some proposition which shall accelerate the enterprise of building up our Navy, that will be a work desirable to be done. Under this bill, unless radically amended, all of that is still further postponed either to the next Congress, or to the bill which makes appropriations for the next fiscal year, which does not take effect until July 1 next. If the old bill can be taken, the bill now before the Houses, which contains that feature, whatever is finally agreed upon, will take effect, so that the time between now and July 1 will be utilized in this enterprise.

I simply wish to call the attention of Senators to this matter before the bill is referred. I presume it will go to the Appropriations Committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 7428) to authorize the Hillsborough National Bank to change its name to that of the First National Bank of Hillsborough, Ohio, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill (H. R. 3258) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Saint Croix River at the most accessible point between Stillwater and Taylor's Falls, Minn., was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC RAILROAD LAND GRANT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives non-concurring in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7162) to forfeit the unearned lands granted to the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company "to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific coast, and to restore the same to settlement, and for other purposes," asking a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appointing Mr. T. R. COBB of Indiana, Mr. BARCLAY HENLEY of California, and Mr. L. E. PAYSON of Illinois managers at such conference on the part of the House.

On motion of Mr. MORGAN, the Senate insisted on its amendment, and agreed to the conference asked for by the House.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. MORGAN, Mr. BLAIR, and Mr. PLUMB were appointed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter of the Surgeon-General inclosing petitions from hospital stewards of the Army for increase of pay, recommended by medical officers of the Army; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the petition of Mrs. Kate Morgan Smith, widow of Edward W. Smith, late major in the Twenty-second United States Infantry, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WILSON presented a petition of C. P. Searle and 40 other citizens of Iowa, praying for the passage of a special act of Congress granting a pension to Isabella Higgins, late hospital matron Eighth Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present the petition of John James Crutchett, formerly a citizen of this city, proposing to furnish the United States Government in the District of Columbia carbon gas at a very low figure. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HALE presented a memorial of the president and trustees of the Maine State College of Agriculture and Mechanic Arts, in favor of House bill 7498 to establish agricultural experiment stations; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. PLUMB presented a petition of citizens of Kansas, ex-Union soldiers and sailors, praying for the passage of certain legislation favorable to soldiers and sailors; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MCMILLAN presented the petition of P. Cudmore, late private Company H, Tenth Minnesota Infantry Volunteers, praying for a modification of the pension laws; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

ULYSSES S. GRANT.

Mr. MITCHELL. Some days ago I introduced a bill (S. 2404) granting a pension to Ulysses S. Grant. A day or two ago I received from him a letter, an extract from which I will read. He says:

I learn through the press that you have introduced a bill in the Senate placing me on the pension-list of the nation. I understand the motive which has prompted this action on your part and appreciate it very highly. But I beg you to withdraw the bill. Under no circumstances could I accept a pension, even if the bill should pass both Houses and receive the approval of the President.

I was led to introduce the bill because a recommendation on the subject was made by President Arthur, and because it happens that I am chairman of the Committee on Pensions, and I have been frequently spoken to on the subject. I confess that it did not appear to me to be the proper thing to do in this case. I have always felt that General Grant ought to be placed where he was when he laid down the great office which he won in the late war to accept the Presidency, and that he should be compensated accordingly from the time when he left the office of the Presidency. Therefore, and in view of what General Grant desires in this matter, I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that the Committee on Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that I may have leave to withdraw it from the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred a bill introduced by him providing for a pension for Ulysses S. Grant, be discharged, and that he have leave to withdraw the bill from the files of the Senate. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HARRIS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2296) for the relief of Thomas A. McLaughlin, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BECK introduced a bill (S. 2410) for the relief of the legal representatives of Francois Fournier; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. PLATT (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2411) for the relief of Thomas A. Weston; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2412) for the relief of Mrs. E. A. Benham, widow of Bvt. Maj. Gen. Henry W. Benham, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DOLPH introduced a bill (S. 2413) for the relief of Edward S. Kearney; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 2414) to amend an act entitled "An act in relation to courts and judicial officers in the Territory of Utah;" which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BLAIR introduced a bill (S. 2415) for an appropriation to promote the colored peoples' world's exposition, to be holden at the city of Chicago, commencing on the first Monday of September, 1885; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MORGAN introduced a bill (S. 2416) for the relief of H. M. Jones; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. INGALLS. I introduce a bill to amend section 993 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the District of Columbia, the purpose being to make the day of the inauguration of President of the United States a legal holiday. I ask that it may be read twice and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The bill (S. 2417) to amend section 993 of the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. INGALLS (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2418) to incorporate the Washington Central Railroad Company of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CALL introduced a bill (S. 2419) for the relief of James Filor, William Curry, and William Pinckney; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PALMER (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2420) to provide for the establishment of evening schools in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2421) for the relief of John Snyder; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

ORGANIZATION OF SIGNAL SERVICE AND OTHER OFFICES.

Mr. ALLISON introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 98) extending the time fixed for the joint commission appointed under the sundry civil act approved July 7, 1884, to submit their report; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution may be considered now.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the joint commission appointed under the act of Congress approved July 7, 1884, to consider the present organizations of the Signal Service, Geological Survey, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and the Hydrographic Office of the Navy Department, with the view to secure greater efficiency and economy of administration of the public service in said bureaus, shall report on the first Monday in January, A. D. 1885, or as soon thereafter as practicable, in lieu of the third Monday in December, 1884, as required by said act.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BLOCK ISLAND HARBOR.

Mr. SHEFFIELD submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, directed to communicate to the Senate, without unnecessary delay, whether there exists a public necessity for the enlargement of the basin or harbor inside the breakwater at Block Island, Rhode Island, for the proper accommodation of the shipping seeking refuge at that place; and, if so, to what extent should such enlargement be made, and what would be the probable cost thereof.

PURCHASE OF THE MURRAY PAPERS.

Mr. GARLAND. In behalf of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES], who was called away from the city for a day or two, I ask leave to submit a resolution.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Joint Committee on the Library be, and are hereby, instructed to inquire into and report on the expediency of purchasing, for the use of the Congressional Library, the six volumes of manuscript diplomatic correspondence of Hon. William Vans Murray, minister to the Netherlands in 1797, and envoy to France from 1799 to 1801.

PACIFIC RAILROAD SETTLEMENT.

Mr. GARLAND. Senate bill 2123, in reference to the settlement of the indebtedness of the Union and Central Pacific Railroad Companies, was reported on the 29th of April last by myself from the Committee on the Judiciary. Afterward a bill came from the House of Representatives on the same subject and involving other matter, being a bill of much wider scope than the Senate bill. The House bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; they have it now under consideration, and I ask that Senate bill 2123 be recommitted to that committee to be considered with the House bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas asks that Order of Business 540 being the bill (S. 2123) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862; also to amend an act approved July 2, 1864, and also an act approved May 7, 1878, both in amendment of said first-mentioned act; and to provide for a settlement of the claims growing out of the issue of bonds to aid in the construction of certain of said railroads, and to secure to the United States the payment of all indebtedness of certain of the companies therein mentioned, be taken from the Calendar and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

NATIONAL EDUCATION.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the bill (S. 228) to appropriate and expend $50,000,000 derived from the internal-revenue taxes and sale of public lands for the education of all the children living in the United States, being the first bill on the Calendar, which was introduced by myself and laid upon the table, be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor. A bill relating to the subject of national education was passed at the last session of Congress, and I merely desire to get this bill off the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks that the bill indicated by him be taken from the Calendar and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

FRANCES M'NEIL POTTER.

Mr. WILSON. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Calendar the bill (H. R. 4822) for the relief of Frances McNeil Potter, being an adverse report from the Committee on Pensions, in order that it may be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. WILSON. I move the recommittal of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

SPOKANE FALLS AND CŒUR D'ALENE RAILWAY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the Calendar under Rule VIII, commencing at Order of Business 325.

Mr. DOLPH. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1642) to incorporate the Spokane Falls and Cœur d'Alene Railway Company. In order that there may be no misunderstanding in regard to it, I will state that the only object of the bill is to incorporate a local railway company in the Territory of Idaho, and for the reason that there is no general law of the Territory authorizing such an incorporation. The Legislature of that Territory will not meet until next year. When it does meet it can only act by enacting a general law by which corporations may be formed. The bill itself makes no grant, the company is asking no aid, and there certainly can be no objection to it. It was taken up during one of the last days of the last session, but upon the objection of one of the Senators from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK] it went over. I think there will be no objection to the bill, and that upon the reading of the report it will be passed without discussion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1642) to incorporate the Spokane Falls and Cœur d'Alene Railway Company.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. CONGER. There is a bill now under consideration in the order of business of the Senate which has precedence, and I object to the consideration of this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under Rule VIII it is in order for the Senator from Oregon to move, and for the Chair to put the question, that "the Senate otherwise order," as the phrase of the rule is, and take up some other bill. That motion is not debatable under the rule, the Chair understands.

Mr. CONGER. My colleague [Mr. PALMER] is prepared to make some remarks on the bill now pending on the Calendar, and desires an opportunity to do so. I hope the Senator from Oregon will not interfere with the regular order of business until my colleague has had an opportunity to be heard.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan refer to the bill (S. 1170) for the relief of Richard Hawley & Sons?

Mr. CONGER. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the unfinished business, and will come up at 2 o'clock as unfinished business. It does not come up under Rule VIII. It having been the unfinished business at the last adjournment of the Senate, it will supersede all other business at 2 o'clock.

Mr. CONGER. Then I withdraw any objection to the consideration of the bill moved by the Senator from Oregon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Oregon, that the Senate now consider Senate bill 1642, the title of which has been announced.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has been read.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read again, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be again read for information, on the request of the Senator from Missouri, after which the first amendment recommended by the Committee on Railroads will be reported.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I see there is a report in the case. I ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The report of the committee will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. SAWYER March 26, 1884:

The Committee on Railroads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1642) to incorporate the Spokane Falls and Cœur d'Alene Railway Company, adopting the language of the report made by the Committee on Pacific Railroads of the House of Representatives, submit the following:

The purpose of the bill (S. 1642) is to incorporate the Spokane Falls and Cœur d'Alene Railway Company, a road proposed to be built from Spokane Falls, in Washington Territory, to the Cœur d'Alene mining region, in the Territory of Idaho, a section of country now wholly without railroad or other transportation facilities.

As there is no Territorial law in Idaho under which a railroad company can be incorporated, and as there can be no session of the Legislature until 1885 at which a general incorporation law can be passed, the incorporators of the proposed road are compelled to come before Congress for a charter.

The company ask no aid or help from the United States. They simply ask the privilege of building the railroad at their own risk under the sanction of law, so that when built they can be protected in their rights.

Your committee are of the opinion that the privilege asked for should be granted them, and therefore report back the accompanying bill, with amendments, and recommend that it do pass.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the first amendment recommended by the Committee on Railroads.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 5 the committee report to add:

Provided, That no Territory, or county, or municipal corporation shall take stock, or buy or guarantee stock or bonds, or in any manner lend or give its credit to said company.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add as an additional section:

SEC. 11. That before commencing to build the road said company shall file a copy of the survey and location thereof in the offices of the secretaries of Washington and Idaho Territories, and submit a like copy to the Secretary of the Interior, who shall advertise the fact of such submission in a prominent newspaper in each of said Territories, and delay action on said survey and location for at least two months. Without his approval said company shall not proceed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chief Clerk calls the attention of the Chair to the fact that in line 4 of section 1 the letter "L" ought to be stricken out and the letter "S" inserted, so as to read, "H. S. Cummings." If there be no objection, that change will be made. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, my attention has not before been called to this bill, but from a hasty examination of it I think it contains some provisions that are dangerous. I think that unless some special exigency exists legislation of this kind should be left to the proper Territorial Legislature. The members there will be familiar with the incidents and circumstances and conditions under which a corporate organization is asked for this company. We are here entirely ignorant of all those things.

The Senator from Oregon suggests that there will be some delay incident unless Congress takes this step and legislates for the Territory. It can hardly be that the exigency to which he refers can extend to all of the branches which seem to be contemplated by the bill. I have not had an opportunity to look at the map of that country, but it seems to me probable from the number of branches which are authorized to be built by the bill that the company has probably monopolized all the passes through the mountains in that region, and that if we pass the bill as it is we shall practically confer a monopoly of the railroad business in that section upon this corporation.

In addition to the main line of road, which is described as one beginning at Spokane Falls, in the Territory of Washington, and proceeding by way of Fort Cœur d'Alene, in the Territory of Idaho, by the most direct and eligible route, to an intersection with the Northern Pacific or Utah Northern Railroad, in Western Montana—in addition to that, which is described as the main line, the bill authorizes the corporation to construct branch lines from suitable points on the main line in Idaho Territory up each of three rivers, which are named here, to points near their source; and also a railroad and telegraph line from at or near the city of Spokane Falls to a point at or near Moscow, in the Territory of Idaho.

The bill also authorizes the corporation to construct, furnish, maintain, and operate on Lake Cœur d'Alene and the Spokane, Saint Joseph, Saint Mary's, and Cœur d'Alene Rivers a line or lines of steamers, vessels, steamboats, tugboats, towboats, barges, and other water-craft, with the appurtenances. Now, that is a very wide grant. It can not be that there is any exigency which would justify Congress in bestowing such a grant upon any corporation. If there is such an interest in some portion of the railroad in the main line as that its construction is likely to progress immediately, some argument might be made in favor of Congressional legislation upon the subject; but I submit that unless we intend to tie the hands of the Legislatures of Idaho and Washington Territory altogether and absolutely to invest the corporation with power to occupy the whole Territory, possibly every mountain pass, every river valley in it, and not only that but to authorize placing upon the navigable waters their lines of steamboats, barges, and towboats, and to operate telegraph lines—unless we are prepared to do that this bill ought not to pass. I submit we are not prepared to do so, and that when Senators give their consideration to the bill they certainly will not be ready to pass it in the breadth in which it is suggested here.

Not only this, but there are some extraordinary powers granted. I think it has been the policy of all State Legislatures in their general laws regulating railroad corporations to limit the power of consolidation and of purchase by one corporation of the franchise and road of another; and yet section 4 of this proposed act confers upon the railroad company authority to purchase the stock, lands, franchises, and appurtenances of, and to consolidate on such terms as may be agreed upon between the parties with any railroad company or companies heretofore chartered, or that may hereafter be chartered by Congress, or that may hereafter be chartered by the Territorial Legislature, so that so far as this company goes it is emancipated from any limitation which the Territory may undertake to place upon the consolidation of corporations within that Territory.

There is one wholesome provision upon this subject in the interest of shippers which I think is found in the legislation of nearly all our States where consolidations are permitted, and that is an inhibition against the consolidation of parallel lines. Here is a power granted that would enable this corporation to absorb every railroad that might be built in the Territory, to buy up the stock and to get the control of any competing line which might be established in the Territory, even if it were parallel to this main line or some of its branches. I submit that the fourth section is entirely out of harmony with the most recent and intelligent and conservative railroad legislation as we have it in the different States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair notifies the Senator from Indiana that his five minutes have expired.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I submit that this is not under that rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate is proceeding under an order of the Senate to consider this bill. The Chair supposes, therefore, the five-minutes rule does not apply.

Mr. COCKRELL. It does not apply.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was supposing at the moment that the Senate was acting under Rule VIII.

Mr. HARRISON. I call attention also to the very sweeping provision in section 5 of the bill, by which the company is authorized—to purchase lands or to accept donations or grants of lands or other property from individuals or corporations for the purpose of aiding in carrying out the objects of this company.

The right of a railroad company to hold land ought to be strictly limited to its right of way and to the requisite ground for its depots, shops, and other necessary buildings. I think the grant is wide enough here to enable this corporation to enter into the business of absorbing the public domain as a land speculator. I shall, therefore——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Indiana suspend a moment? On looking at the rule the Chair is of opinion that the five minutes' limitation of debate does apply. This bill was not proceeded with notwithstanding an objection, but it was taken up upon the order of the Senate within the time that the rule imposes the five-minute limitation on debate.

Mr. HARRISON. I had about concluded all I intended to say, but before sitting down I make a motion to strike out all after the word "Montana," in line 21 of section 1, to the end of the section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Indiana will be read by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out, in section 1, line 21, after the word "Montana," the words:

Together with branch lines from suitable points on the main line, in said Idaho Territory, up each of the following rivers: Cœur d'Alene, Saint Mary's, and Saint Joseph Rivers, to near the sources of the same; and also a railroad and telegraph line from at or near said city of Spokane Falls to a point at or near Moscow, in the said Territory of Idaho; and said company is also authorized and empowered to build, construct, furnish, maintain, and operate on Lake Cœur d'Alene and the Spokane, Saint Joseph, Saint Mary's, and Cœur d'Alene Rivers a line or lines of steamers, vessels, steamboats, tugboats, towboats, barges, and other water-crafts, with the appurtenances, and is hereby vested with all the powers, privileges, and immunities necessary to carry into effect the purposes of this act.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I hardly thought, after the appropriate committee of the Senate had carefully examined this bill and made a favorable report on its merits, and after it appeared from that report that the bill had been favorably reported from the appropriate committee of the House, it would be made the subject of such an attack as has just been made upon it.

I agree with the Senator that he is not familiar with this subject. It has been the custom of Congress to incorporate railroad companies in the Territories. This is a bill intended for the purpose only of incorporating a local company in the Territory of Idaho for the purpose of constructing a railroad and certain branches in that Territory.

The necessity of this legislation arises from the fact that there is no existing general law of the Territory of Idaho by which a railroad or other incorporation can be formed, and Congress has provided that no Territory shall pass a special law creating a corporation. The only way that a corporation can be formed in a Territory for any purpose is under a general law of that Territory. Before this enterprise can be undertaken, if this bill does not become a law, these parties will have to wait until the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Idaho meets and has time to pass a general incorporation law.

Now, whenever the Territory has passed a general incorporation law, any limited number of persons, usually three or four, can file articles of incorporation for the purpose of building this proposed railroad line with all its branches, and those articles may contain all the powers conferred by this bill. And more than that, they could be duplicated to any number, and any number of corporations formed for the purpose of building precisely the same road and branches, and whenever a corporation or any number of corporations had been formed for constructing this precise road and its branches, under the general act of Congress of March 3, 1875, by complying with certain regulations of the Interior Department, filing a copy of the act under which they were incorporated, filing a record showing that they had been duly organized, and a list of officers, and a map of the location of the road, they could obtain a right of way over the public lands for the purpose of building their roads. That is all that is asked by this bill for this incorporation, that they be granted the rights and privileges secured by the general right of way act of Congress of March 3, 1875. By that act if, after filing the map of location of any twenty miles of the road, the road is not constructed within a limited time—twelve months I believe it is—the right of way would be forfeited, and any other company could occupy it. It seems to me this disposes of the whole of the Senator's argument in regard to this being an attempt to secure the mountain passes and tie them up for a period of years.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator permit me to ask a question?

Mr. DOLPH. Certainly.

Mr. COCKRELL. This report was made last year, and the principal reason for urging the passage of the bill then was that the Legislature of Idaho, and probably of Washington Territory too, would not be in session until 1885, and therefore it was absolutely necessary that the parties should apply to Congress because they could not apply to the Legislatures. Eighteen hundred and eighty-five will soon be here, the Territorial Legislatures will be in session, and will be authorized to grant all the relief that ought to be granted. Now, why is there any necessity for the attempt to pass the bill at this session?

Mr. DOLPH. I do not now remember at what time the Territorial Legislature of Idaho assembles. If it is the latter part of the coming year, it would prevent the commencement of this enterprise for an entire year. That is the answer to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. COCKRELL. Does not the Legislature of the Territory of Washington meet this winter?

Mr. DOLPH. Washington Territory has already passed a general incorporation law, under which any three citizens of the Territory can incorporate for building a railroad through any portion of the Territory.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then there is no necessity for this bill to apply to Washington Territory.

Mr. DOLPH. It does not necessarily apply to Washington Territory. I am not certain whether any part of this road is within the Territory of Washington. If it is——

Mr. COCKRELL. The bill so states.

Mr. DOLPH. That may be. But that would not avoid the necessity of an incorporation in the Territory of Idaho.

Mr. COCKRELL. Spokane itself is in Washington Territory.

Mr. DOLPH. That is true. But that would not prevent the necessity of an incorporation in the Territory of Idaho, and I presume Congress would not attempt to incorporate a company to build part of the road, leaving it to apply to the Territorial Legislatures for the rest of the charter.

Mr. COCKRELL. Montana Territory has a general law in regard to corporations, has it not?

Mr. DOLPH. I am not certain about that.

Mr. COCKRELL. So that two of the Territories through which this road is to run have ample provision already made.

Mr. DOLPH. They would have no authority, however, to incorporate a company to build a railroad in Idaho Territory. As I said before, I presume Congress would not undertake to grant a charter to apply to one Territory and leave the company to apply to other Territories for the authority to construct the road in part. The provisions of this charter, I think, are the ordinary provisions. If they are not, as I said before, under the existing laws of Washington Territory or Montana or under any future general incorporation law of Idaho Territory, a corporation may be formed with all the powers that are provided for in this act. The last section of the act provides that Congress shall have the power "to alter, amend, or repeal this act whenever, in its judgment, the interest of the people may require it."

Not only is this company not asking more in regard to the right of way than all companies incorporated under general railroad laws or special laws, State or Territorial, can obtain by compliance with the act of March 3, 1875, but an additional burden has, by the report of the committee, been placed on the company, by providing that before the company shall commence to build the road it shall file a copy of the survey and location thereof, not only in the office of the Secretary of the Interior, but in the offices of the secretaries of Washington and Idaho Territories, and submit a like copy to the Secretary of the Interior, and that that fact shall be advertised. I see no good reason why this little bill should have been made the occasion of such objections, and I hope it will pass.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I professed at the outset a lack of any familiarity with the subject presented by this bill, but there are some features of it, I think, that require very little study in order to understand them, and the one feature is that to which I alluded, that here is a railroad proposed to be constructed between two points, and with some five or six branches running up, so far as I know, and so far as any one here knows or has informed us, through every one of the streams in that region, and occupying all the passes.

The Senator from Oregon tells us that if the Territory of Idaho should pass a general railroad law, which he says has not been done up to this time, then some other company incorporated under it could occupy this same line; but under existing legislation no railroad company can do it. We have no assurance that the Territory of Idaho will pass such a law, that there may not be influences against its passage, and, if so, then Congress is conferring an exclusive right upon this company to occupy these lines of road.

Mr. DOLPH. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. DOLPH. May not Congress at any time incorporate another company or repeal this act?

Mr. HARRISON. Undoubtedly Congress could incorporate another company, but the trouble about that is that Congress moves in matters of this kind upon suggestion simply, and the likelihood, if this corporation were to acquire the powers that these grants seem to imply, that Congress would interfere is remote, I think. But the point I make is that this legislation is appropriate legislation for the Territory. It is a field of legislation which, according to the statements of the Senator from Oregon, the adjoining Territories have entered upon and covered by their legislation, of course not to the exclusion of legislation by Congress; and my point is that Congress should do nothing in a matter of this kind except upon an exigency, and that it should do no more than the exigency requires.

Now, the amendment I have proposed leaves the charter for the main line of this road from Spokane Falls to Cœur d'Alene; it simply cuts off from it the power granted here to construct half a dozen branches, to enter generally into the steamboat business on certain lakes and rivers. Certainly that is more than will be accomplished before the Legislature of Idaho meets and has an opportunity to consider this question and to pass some general legislation covering the subject.

Let me take the case upon the proposition put by the Senator from Oregon, that after the passage of this act this corporation, by filing its survey with the Secretary of the Interior, would only acquire an exclusive use for twelve months to the line which it had thus surveyed and the profile of which it had filed. Then we are granting a right which may be of great value to be bartered out to other companies. For twelve months we are granting to them the exclusive right to occupy these river valleys for the construction of lines of road that the Senator will not pretend, I think, at least he has not said so, are likely to be entered upon at all before the Territory of Idaho will have an opportunity to act upon this question. We are laying out a scheme here that looks to years for its completion, if it is ever completed at all, and we are doing it upon the suggestion that the Legislature of Idaho does not meet for a year. My point is that, if it is a question of exigency legislation, we should confine ourselves to the exigency, and it is enough if we give this company, under ordinary restrictions, the right to build this main line of road.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, while this amendment is under consideration there are some other features in this bill to which I would like to call the attention of the Senate, which I think are of considerable importance. I know nothing about this proposed railroad except what I learn from the bill; but it is proposed to charter a railroad which is to be built, as it has become the fashion of late to build roads, without any cash capital, and I think the Congress of the United States had better stop granting such railroad charters. It is proposed that a company may be organized "when 1,000 shares, amounting to $100,000, shall have been subscribed, and 10 per cent. actually paid thereon in money." That is to say, when $10,000 have been paid in money the company may be organized. It is evidently all that it is expected will ever be paid in cash toward this enterprise.

Section 3 provides that, after the organization of course, the capital stock may "be fixed by the board of directors at a sum not exceeding $2,500,000, in shares of $100 each."

Section 8 provides—

That said company shall be, and they are hereby, authorized and empowered to mortgage, in the usual manner, their franchises, road-bed, and all property belonging to said company, to an amount not exceeding $25,000 per mile for the entire length of said roads, including said branch lines, upon such terms as may seem to said company best.

Now, I submit, Mr. President, that it is quite time that the Congress of the United States should cease lending its sanction to the practice of building railroads without any cash subscribed for that purpose. The practice, which has sprung up in this country, of building railroads upon paper is working infinite mischief and is creating the transportation problem which now excites so much attention. With this charter passed, of course the railroad is to be built on borrowed money, or the building of the railroad is to be paid for by the issue of stock and bonds, and every Senator knows that a railroad built in that way costs twice as much as a railroad built for cash should cost; and the result is that having been so built, the people have to be taxed twice as much for freight as they would be if the railroad were built for cash, in order that the company may earn dividends upon the amount of capital stock. And when I say this, I have but begun to enumerate the methods which are employed for the purpose of inflating the capital, and thereby entailing additional burdens upon the people who have to pay the money for freight and passage to raise a sufficient amount to make dividends secure.

I think we ought to go very slow in granting such charters as this. I have but just looked at the bill. I have nothing to suggest in the way of amendment, but I can not vote for a bill for a railroad charter which is so loosely drawn as this.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I ask that the amendment be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment of Mr. HARRISON.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I concur with the remarks made by the Senator from Indiana in regard to the inexpediency of the passage of this bill without the amendment. The grant of a power, a monopoly in fact, of transportation over three of the rivers of this Territory is one that ought not to be made by Congress. The bill provides that this railroad company shall have the right "to build, construct, furnish, maintain, and operate on Lake Cœur d'Alene and the Spokane, Saint Joseph, Saint Mary's, and Cœur d'Alene Rivers a line or lines of steamers," &c. It not only provides for the right of transportation by rail, the construction of a railroad that is practically a monopoly of the transportation within a limited area of country, but it also provides for the maintaining of a line of steamers upon these different rivers—transportation by water. It is a power granted to a corporation, into which private enterprise can not enter; one which, I think, ought not to be granted to a railroad without the most extreme care and without provision for the protection of those who may be engaged in water transportation against the monopoly. For that reason, sir, I shall vote against the bill, unless the amendment of the Senator from Indiana is adopted.

Mr. DOLPH. I will simply say that the amendment would destroy the bill, and it would be as well to postpone it indefinitely as to strike out that portion of the charter. None of these branches are more than a very few miles in length, as I understand, running up these rivers into some mining regions. The entire road is not very long; I am not able to state the extent of it.

I am very glad to see that there are so many Senators who are so very jealous for the interests of the people of that new community. It has a sparse population, which is in great need of transportation. Here come persons who propose to incorporate as a local company for the purpose of constructing a necessary road in a Territory where there is no existing law under which they may be incorporated. They come asking no aid whatever from the Government except that they may enjoy the benefit of the general act already passed by Congress, by which every railroad company can obtain a right of way over the public lands. They are asking no monopoly. Congress can at any time incorporate another company, or a company can be incorporated at any time by any of these Territories, or at least under a general incorporation act, by which this road may be constructed over its entire route—the main line and all its branches.

If there are unusual provisions in this charter, I have not seen them. I think they are the customary provisions which will be frequently found in charters granted by Congress. Now, if the Senate does not desire to incorporate these individuals, to give them an opportunity to build at their own expense and without any cost to the United States a road in that new Territory and afford the people there the means of transportation, or at least give them an opportunity to try it, let it vote the bill down.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator permit me to ask one question?

Mr. DOLPH. Certainly.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to know if there has ever been a bill passed by the Senate in its whole history containing the provision in lines 27 to 34 inclusive, giving this company the right to run steamboats on the free navigable waters of the United States.

Mr. DOLPH. Not exclusive.

Mr. COCKRELL. I want to know if any company ever asked such a privilege of the Senate.

Mr. DOLPH. I think so. I think there are navigation companies incorporated to run steamboats. It is not an exclusive right.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is there any prohibition in any law of the United States against any individual or incorporation running a vessel upon its navigable waters?

Mr. DOLPH. There is not.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then why do you want a right to do that which no earthly law in existence prohibited, unless it is to be a monopoly?

Mr. DOLPH. Because this is to be an incorporation. An incorporation can do nothing except what its charter provides that it may do, and if it proposes to own and navigate steamboats its charter must provide for that. It is not because any individual can not build and run a steamboat, in compliance with the laws of the United States or the local laws, on any navigable rivers of the United States, but it is because this bill is simply to create a company and to define its power, and that company desires to build not only these short lines of railroad, but to navigate the adjacent rivers; and to enable it to do so that provision must be incorporated in its charter. It is no exclusive privilege and it is no monopoly. It is simply granting the power to the company to build and operate steamboats.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I should like to ask the Senator one question. I ask what is the length of this main line as proposed?

Mr. DOLPH. I think perhaps some member of the Committee on Railroads can tell that. The bill was before the committee. They had a map and examined it carefully. I never did examine the map carefully. Some gentlemen with whom I am acquainted, and in whom I have confidence, came here with the bill, told me that they desired to undertake this enterprise, and I introduced the bill. I do not profess to be very familiar with it; but I am somewhat familiar with the provisions in ordinary railroad charters, and I do not see anything unusual in this charter. If persons proposing to form a company for the purpose of constructing a railroad ask only to be incorporated, ask no aid from Congress or from any State or Territory, I think they should be allowed to get their money where they can and build their road where they can, and as much of it as they can.

Mr. VAN WYCK. What committee reported the bill?

Mr. DOLPH. The Committee on Railroads in the Senate, and the Committee on Pacific Railroads in the House.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Will some member of the committee inform us of the length of the proposed line? Is the Senator from Indiana on that committee?

Mr. HARRISON. I am not.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Is any member of the Railroad Committee present in the Senate? I would very much like to know the length of this proposed road.

Mr. DOLPH. The Senator from Wisconsin reported the bill.

Mr. SAWYER. I can not state its length. It is a very short road. My impression is it is not over one hundred miles altogether.

Mr. HARRISON. I think the Senator is mistaken about that. It may be that the distance from Spokane Falls to Cœur d'Alene is not more than that, but this bill authorizes the company to go on and intersect the Northern Pacific or intersect the Utah Northern, which would certainly be much longer than the distance suggested.

Mr. VEST. I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon who has charge of the bill if W. H. Armstrong, named here as one of the corporators, is the Commissioner of Railroads of the United States.

Mr. DOLPH. I am unable to answer that question. I do not know who he is. There is, I think, a man of the same name who was register or receiver of the land office at Spokane Falls, in Washington Territory, and recently defeated on the Republican ticket for Congress. I am mistaken. The name of the Armstrong at Spokane Falls is J. M. Armstrong.

Mr. VEST. This is the same name as that of the Commissioner of Railroads. We had some experience in the last session of Congress with a railroad project engineered and managed by this same W. H. Armstrong, if it be the same person who was then and is now the Commissioner of Railroads of the United States. It is a remarkable fact that he should be connected with a railroad scheme while he holds a position which gives him supervision and a certain sort of control over all the railroads in the Territory.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON].

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 19, noes 12; not a quorum voting.

Mr. VEST called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator who made this motion will perceive that he leaves in the bill the right to continue this road from Fort Cœur d'Alene over to Western Montana. Now, I may say that is the only uncertain element in this section of the bill to me. I can see no serious objection to the part which he proposes to strike out. I can see no difference between a railroad of one hundred miles in its single main line and a road of fifty miles in its main line with fifty miles of spurs or branches running up the valleys which are feeders. The map shows, and my recollection in the Railroad Committee justifies me in saying, that the real main line from the city of Spokane Falls to Fort Cœur d'Alene is not a long one, but that there are valleys running down into this main valley which it is desirable to supply and get the freights of.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator know what the existing fact is as to whether in these valleys there is any present demand for a railroad?

Mr. HAWLEY. There are settlers there, and it is a good deal like a large part of the Western country; railroads get there as early as other things. This railroad is intended to develop these valleys, and will do so. I see no objection, I say, to a railroad with fifty miles in the main line and with branches of fifty miles running down and feeding it. I see no reason why that is any more objectionable than a road of one hundred miles main line. When this bill was considered in the Railroad Committee, and considered with a good deal of care, I remember suggesting some amendments to it. I do not remember how far it is from Fort Cœur d'Alene over to the Northern Pacific road by any route they propose to use. That matter remains quite indefinite in my own mind; but to the rest of it I see no particular objection. I see no objection whatever to the main line up these valleys, and no objection to giving this corporation the right to use steamboats, tugboats, or towboats on these rivers, even if they should never build the branch roads up the valleys.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator says he sees no objection to granting this railroad company the right to own and run steamboats, barges, &c., on these rivers. Now, does the Senator not know that if this railroad company which owns the railroad also owns the steamboats and transportation on a river, that is an absolute and unqualified monopoly of the entire freight transportation on that river, because the railroad company will not give one pound of freight to any other than its own vessels, and it will practically and absolutely drive from these rivers every solitary individual vessel? It will drive from them every vessel not owned by this company, and you had just as well grant it the exclusive right and privilege of running vessels of all kinds on these waters as to retain this clause in the bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not see that that is in the nature of an inquiry addressed to me. It seems to have been an argument injected, which the gentleman might just as well have made in his own time.

Of course I would do some things in opening a new Territory that I would not under other circumstances. I do not see any objection to permitting a railroad, for example, which is to come down and strike the Potomac at the city of Alexandria, to run some steamboats in connection therewith down to the harbor at Fortress Monroe. I think you will find plenty of such examples in the history of railroads. Here is a complete line of transportation proposed. The railroad itself is a monopoly up the valley from the city of Spokane Falls to Cœur d'Alene. It is not likely that any one else will build a parallel road there. It is not likely that anybody else will set up a line of steamboats if this company should set up one on these rivers. Of course there would be to some extent a monopoly, but the railroad is the same thing, a monopoly to Cœur d'Alene, and it would undoubtedly be of great value to the land-owners and aid in the development of that Territory.

The only thing that remains doubtful in my mind is the length of the line from Cœur d'Alene to the connection with the Northern Pacific, which is not distinctly pointed out. The route of it is not clearly pointed out. I would rather, before chartering a railroad, know something near the line it is to take; and with a view to partly correct these things or avoid any evil that might arise under them, there is an amendment in one of the later sections which requires that the location and route of this road and branches shall be filed with the Secretary of the Interior and publication thereof made, and that no operations shall be commenced until a certain time shall have elapsed after the filing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON], on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope that amendment will be agreed to. It does seem to me that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana is eminently just, right, and equitable. If this bill is to be passed at all, the clause which he proposes to strike out should be stricken out. There is, in the first place, no necessity now for the passage of the bill at all. We, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] and others, are assuming to know more about the wants and necessities of those three Territories than the people living there and electing their representatives and delegates to the Territorial General Assembly. The Territory of Washington has already enacted laws on the incorporation of railroads. The Territory of Montana has, as I am advised. It is only the Territory of Idaho through which this company wants the right to run its road by act of Congress.

The pretext made at the last session was that the Territorial General Assembly of Idaho would not meet until 1885. Now we are within a few days of 1885. The Territorial General Assembly will be in session, and can grant the charters which are necessary and proper. It meets in January, my colleague says. Now, within a month of the meeting of the Territorial Legislature Congress takes up and passes this anomalous and, as I say, monstrous bill.

The yeas and nays were taken on the amendment.

Mr. FRYE (after having voted in the negative). I withdraw my vote, and announce my pair with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES].

The result was announced—yeas 37, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—37.

Beck,	Groome,	McMillan,	Slater,
Brown,	Hampton,	McPherson,	Vance,
Call,	Harris,	Maxey,	Van Wyck,
Camden,	Harrison,	Morgan,	Vest,
Cockrell,	Hoar,	Morrill,	Walker,
Coke,	Ingalls,	Pendleton,	Williams,
Colquitt,	Jackson,	Platt,	Wilson.
Edmunds,	Jonas,	Pugh,
Garland,	Jones of Florida,	Ransom,
George,	Kenna,	Sherman,

NAYS—16.

Blair,	Dawes,	Mitchell,	Sabin,
Cameron of Wis.,	Dolph,	Palmer,	Sawyer,

Cameron of Pa.,	Hale,	Mahone,

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of the bill——

Mr. HARRISON. Will not the Senator allow me to move an amendment which precedes his?

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes, sir; certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. I move to strike out the fourth section of the bill. It is the section which confers unlimited power on this corporation to buy all other railroads and all their lands and all their stock and all their franchises. I do not think that power ought to be granted to any railroad company.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out section 4, as follows:

SEC. 4. That the Spokane Falls and Cœur d'Alene Railway Company shall have power and lawful authority to purchase the stock, lands, franchises, and appurtenances of, and consolidate, on such terms as may be agreed upon between the parties, with any railroad company or companies heretofore chartered or that may hereafter be chartered by Congressional, State, or Territorial authority.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I do not find in the bill any limitation upon the power of the company to contract indebtedness. It is usual in bills of this kind to place a limitation upon that power. I therefore offer the following amendment to the third section of the bill. After the word "each," in line 4 of section 3, I move to insert:

And the indebtedness of the company, except as hereinafter provided, shall not exceed one-half of the capital stock.

Mr. President, the eighth section authorizes the company to issue bonds to the extent of $25,000 per mile. That, of course, would be a limitation upon the bonded indebtedness of the incorporation; but there is no limitation upon the power to create a floating debt, so called. I think there should be some limitation upon that, and therefore offer the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. In section 5 of the bill power is granted—

To purchase lands or to accept donations or grants of lands or other property from individuals or corporations for the purpose of aiding in carrying out the objects of this company.

An amendment proposed by the committee was intended to prevent the involvement of the Territory or the counties or other municipal corporations in any liability on account of this corporation. I do not think the amendment effects that end. Express authority is granted to receive donations in lands, money, or property from individuals or corporations, and the restrictive provision which is appended simply restrains the municipal corporations, the Territory and counties, from taking stock or from buying or guaranteeing stock or bonds or from lending credit to the railroad company. So far from prohibiting, it really suggests that donations by these municipal corporations may be made and may be taken by this railroad corporation. We certainly ought to provide that no donation should be made by any of these corporations; otherwise there is full power to burden them in the interest of this railroad company.

I move to strike out, beginning with the word "also," in line 5 of section 5:

Also to purchase lands or to accept donations or grants of lands or other property from individuals or corporations.

Perhaps I ought not to strike out the whole clause; I will move to strike out, in section 5, line 5, the words "to purchase lands or"——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. 1170) for the relief of Richard Hawley & Sons.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I ask leave to submit amendments to the bill the Senate has just been considering with the view that they may be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the proposed amendments will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. Res. 289) authorizing the Superintendent of the Census to continue the work on the Tenth Census; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

RICHARD HAWLEY & SONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1170) for the relief of Richard Hawley & Sons.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, when, by request, I introduced this apparently innocent bill, I had no idea that its consideration would invoke such an exhaustive discussion. I think if I had known how it would be regarded by the distinguished Senators who oppose it I should have shrunk from introducing it, even with the qualification that it was done "by request." I am not versed in legislation, and experience has not shown to me the possible dangers which may lurk in a bill of this character, and yet—looked at from a moral or business standpoint—Messrs. Hawley & Sons are entitled to relief. By two errors of two officers of the Treasury they have been deprived and kept out of their property. To any one who has carefully read the lucid report of the committee it seems to me but one conclusion is possible, and that is that the claimants are entitled to relief. What that relief may involve indirectly I leave to Senators of riper experience to determine.

The Treasury is prevented from giving relief by a statute wisely enacted for its protection, but I can not believe the animus of it to be to enable the Government to retain moneys improperly and illegally collected from our citizens; and when it works an injustice there is, I understand, no other course open to the victim but to come to Congress for redress. I have no doubt that if such cases as the one before us could have been foreseen a method of relief would have been provided other than by a bill in Congress, if one could have been devised that would not have been subject to abuse and opened the way to frauds.

The ruling of the Secretary of the Treasury that an excise duty imposed upon malt by a foreign government, which duty never became operative on this importation and which therefore never contributed to the enhancement of its commercial value, should be added to the price paid for it in Canada to increase the dutiable value was an absurdity to the commercial mind and so evident an error that I should feel ashamed that the Government should take advantage of it even if it had been sustained by the courts.

However, when the importation had been made and this crude and erroneous ruling appeared, what could the importer do? He had to pay. These parties did pay, but under protest, and were about to take an appeal when they were met by a second error made by an officer of the Government—the collector at Detroit—who dissuaded them from it, read them the ruling of the Department, and showed to them, as they believed, the futility of such appeal.

Messrs. Hawley & Sons did not wish to incur the expense and chances of a legal contest, for they considered it an unequal one and the coutcome adversely assured—the Government, with unlimited means and able counsel, to whom time was no object, on one side, and men following a precarious business, which demanded all their time and all their means, on the other. They preferred the lesser evil and submitted to the wrong, which was none the less a wrong because they did not resist.

It will be said, however, that if they had taken an appeal their rights would have been conserved. I would answer that if this importation had been entered at New York or Chicago, then an appeal would have been made, and long before this Messrs. Hawley & Sons would have had their money back. Customs brokers, who swarm in the corridors of the custom-houses of those ports, would have been at their elbows, and all the technicalities which attend upon importations would have been observed.

At Detroit, however, in 1870, there was not a customs broker. The collector there was and is regarded not only as the guardian of the interests of the Government, but generally as the adviser of the people in the matter of importations. What he said in regard to duties was accepted as law, and when he emphasized it by reference to the rulings of the Department, the average importer looked upon it as law and gospel.

As I said before, Messrs. Hawley & Sons submitted, and the return of this money, wrongfully exacted, would never have been applied for had it not been that some party in Chicago—probably making a larger importation—was stimulated by a customs broker to make an appeal and bring his case into court.

As the committee reports, the court held that the price actually paid for the malt was the dutiable value. The decision of the court was thereafter recognized by the Secretary of the Treasury. It has been the rule of the Department ever since. All the duties thus illegally collected, where protest was made and an appeal taken, were refunded, but in this case, where no appeal was taken, he considered he had no authority to refund.

The Secretary of the Treasury did not reject this claim because he considered that it was not an equitable one, but because he had no authority to refund. His decision does not affect the merits of the case, but is merely an indication of his conception of his authority in the premises.

I suppose it is necessary that limitations should be fixed to the discretionary powers of all public officers, but all these limitations disappear when a party comes to Congress for relief.

The things, in my opinion, to be considered are, first, did the Government illegally and wrongfully take the money of Messrs. Hawley & Sons? Second, did Messrs. Hawley & Sons use due diligence in asserting and protecting their rights?

All will concede that the Government did wrongfully and illegally take the money, and I think when the report of the committee is carefully read, and the circumstances and conditions under which the protest was made and the appeal not taken, with the reasons shown therefor are fully considered, most persons will conclude that this is a meritorious bill.

While I have the highest respect for the opinions of the distinguished Senators from Vermont and Missouri and the zeal and solicitude they evince for the interests of the Treasury, I feel that individuals have rights as well as the Government. The objections made by those honorable gentlemen would, I am sure, never have been interposed by them were they personally the parties against whom a like claim was made. They would scorn to retain moneys which came into their hands by an error of others, much more so if the error was their own. They would scorn to urge the statute of limitations, or any other technicality, to avoid or retard payment. None would be swifter than they to make restitution when the facts were laid before them. I ask that they apply those rules to the dealings of the Government with its citizens which have marked their own long and honorable careers.

The honorable Senator from Missouri urges against the passage of this bill his opinion that the principle involved may lead to the return to similar claimants of $20,000,000.

If our citizens have been illegally mulcted of $20,000,000, or any other sum, we can not too soon set about the work of restitution. Every such claim should be considered here upon its own equities and every citizen has the right to such consideration.

The just pride of Americans in an overflowing Treasury should not be marred by the knowledge that any part of its surplus is made up of illegally wrung and wrongfully retained domestic contributions.

I hope, Mr. President, that this bill may pass as recommended by the Committee on Claims and the $473.42 which these claimants have asked of Congress time and again, since its extortion, may be returned to its rightful owners.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I think this bill ought not to pass unless the case for which it provides can be brought within some exception to the existing statute. I notice that the Committee on Claims endeavor to so bring it by showing that the fault rests with the collector of customs in Detroit. If that be true, it may be a reason for the passage of this bill; but otherwise it seems to me the bill ought not to pass, because the claim comes within the provisions of the statutes which absolutely exclude the payment of this class of claims, as I understand.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The statute to which the Senator from Iowa refers simply prohibits an executive officer of the Government from paying this or any similar claim.

Mr. ALLISON. That is true, and it provides certain processes by which duties may be refunded; but in this instance these processes were not adopted by the person paying the duties. If we are to refund to every person who pays duties whatever sum a court may say ought to be refunded, there will be no end to the refunding of duties. A few years ago the Secretary of the Treasury required by an order of his that the polariscope should be used as a method of testing the rates of duties upon sugar. The Supreme Court decided some three or four years afterward that that was not a proper ruling of the Secretary of the Treasury, then Mr. SHERMAN, and that those duties were improperly exacted. If every duty thus improperly exacted at the time should be refunded, that single decision would cost the Government three or four million dollars. There is no question of the fact that the amount of duty paid was added to the price of the sugar, and the consumer paid it. Now, is there any equity, is there any justice, in an importer of sugar requiring from the Government a refund of that amount of duty? That may not be so in every case, but I think it will be found to be notably so in this malt case.

The duty upon malt imported from Canada was 20 per cent. ad valorem. The Secretary of the Treasury decided that a certain measure of value should be the true value, namely, the market price of malt in Canada, there being an excise duty of 1 cent a bushel upon it there. I do not know that it is true, but I have no doubt of the fact that this importer of malt added that sum to the price, and therefore I see no equity in refunding to him this money, and I do not know of a single instance where the Government has refunded money, either through the Secretary of the Treasury or by legislative enactment, in cases where there has not been a formal protest made as required by law.

Mr. HOAR. There was a protest.

Mr. ALLISON. If there was a formal protest, then of course there ought to be no question.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me. I understand the facts are these, and I should like to submit them to him: The law requires a protest and an appeal to the Secretary. Then if the Secretary does not grant the appeal the remedy is open by application to a court. In this case the man made his formal protest and was about to take his appeal when the collector of the port told him that he had better not be at the trouble of making his appeal; it would be of no use to him, because the question was settled in the Treasury Department, and he could receive no benefit from making the appeal. So, for that reason, under the advice of the officer, he failed to take what was a technical, not a substantial step. Under the decision of the courts the other men got their duty back.

Mr. ALLISON. So I said in the beginning of my remarks that if this case was put on the idea that there was an actual protest, but by the fault of the collector of customs or some officer of the Government this man was misled so that he did not make the protest in accordance with the statute, then there might be some reason why he should be paid. But I desire, for one, to know that this excuse is clearly and distinctly set forth as a reason for payment, because if that be not done, we are bound to refund to every man who has wrongfully paid duties when a court shall decide that those duties have been wrongfully paid; and if that be true, we shall be practically receiving money through the Treasury and paying it out through the courts, because under our system the courts frequently decide that the Secretary of the Treasury or the collector of customs is wrong in his rulings, and when those cases arise the statute comes in and protects the Government, by saying that an importer shall be required to make formal protest at the time he pays the duty, and must commence a suit within sixty or ninety days to recover the same, in order that a statute of limitations may be placed upon the importers preventing them from coming in eight, ten, or twelve, or fourteen years afterward, and exacting, either through the courts or through Congress, a refund of duties after the articles imported have gone into consumption and use, and the price in many cases, as notably in the sugar cases, has included the excess of duty and has been paid by the consumer. That is the reason why I desire that this case shall be placed clearly upon some construction which will give Congress the authority to pass this bill because of the dereliction of its own officers, and not because of anything relating to the decision made in Chicago whereby the 1 cent per bushel should be taken from the valuation of the malt in Canada, and that was the question decided.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I am sorry to find myself in a matter of principle differing with my friend, whom I have followed so often, the chairman of the Committee on Claims. I do not agree with him in what he said the other day, that this is a body which is not bound by precedents, or which ought not to be bound by precedents. I think that the Senate, and every legislative body, in dealing with citizens, especially in regard to a matter of private claim, should establish, as the courts do, general rules, which it will act upon in all possible cases, and which it should depart from rarely. I do not agree with the Senators who have thought it our duty to refund to the citizen all duties which have been illegally exacted of him. The process of taxation is of necessity a clumsy and inexact process. It must be so at best. We can not have the ordinary processes by which private property is taken for public use in regard to taxes, and each generation ought, as a general rule, to be left to bear its own burden, and it would be an undue and improper burden upon the people in any year to require them to go back and correct all the mistakes and informalities of the past.

Take the question of the cotton tax, where the Supreme Court I think was evenly divided as to the legality of the assessment. Suppose at some time there should be a change of one person in the court, and a majority should hold that it was illegal. It seems to me there would be no justice or propriety in requiring us to go back and take upon ourselves this burden which belonged to a past generation, and restore to everybody the tax that had been assessed upon him. So this case, as the Senator from Iowa has very properly and clearly stated, ought to fall, unless it can stand upon some ground which gives this citizen a special equity.

Now I understand that there were a considerable number of cases like this, and one of the persons having such a case brought his suit and tested it. This individual was not cognizant probably of that fact, but he made his protest and he was proceeding as I understand the report made by the committee—I think it was made at a meeting when I was not present; I do not remember hearing of the case before—but as I understand it he made his protest in due form, so that the Government had the proper notice and the notice required by the statute of his objection to the legality of the tax and his purpose to resist it. Then the collector, whom any citizen might fairly suppose to be specially acquainted with the law on that subject, advised him not to make his appeal to the Treasury, on the ground that it would be a mere useless formality and a waste of trouble and expense, because the question had been amply and finally settled in the Treasury Department, and accordingly he did not take the appeal. Soon after, the court deciding that he was right in his claim that the tax was illegal, he came shortly after the fact—I do not know how long, but very shortly after—to Congress for relief. Under these circumstances, does the absence of this second step, which would have done no sort of good to the Government, which was a mere formality, nothing more, of carrying his appeal to the Treasury, when it was occasioned by the advice of an intelligent Government officer to whom any citizen would reasonably and properly look for advice and information on that subject, make the case an exception to the ordinary rule?

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. ALDRICH. As I understand the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts a member of the Committee on Claims, he now places the position of that committee in favor of this bill upon the ground that an officer of the Government advised these claimants not to take a step which was essential to preserve their rights before the collector and in the courts of the United States. Now I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether he would apply that rule to all cases of this kind.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me. His question gives me the opportunity to say one thing which I omitted. The Senate has repeatedly since I have been a member of the Committee on Claims, where one case of a number has gone up as a test case, the others having refrained from suing solely to abide the result of that, treated that as a sufficient compliance with the statute for the purpose of legislation.

Mr. ALDRICH. Under the revenue laws?

Mr. HOAR. No, I do not mean a particular compliance; but I say we have excused the burdening of the Government with a hundred suits where one suit would raise the entire question and the others had abstained from suing in order to abide the result.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator mean to say that there has ever been a case of that kind where the construction of the revenue laws was involved?

Mr. HOAR. Yes.

Mr. ALDRICH. Then I am certainly mistaken about the facts. I have never known a case of that kind, and I think the Senator will have hard work to point to such a precedent.

The statement made by the Senator from Massachusetts involves two things. In the first place, he assumes that this officer of the customs had a right to represent the Government in the way which he did and that oral proof of his statement—because there seems to be no other proof except the assumption on the part of the friends of this bill of such an oral statement—was sufficient to exempt these claimants from prosecuting their claim in a legal manner.

I want to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the fact that under an order of the Secretary of the Treasury a rule was established for exacting duty upon sugar which was afterward declared erroneous by the Supreme Court of the United States. If the precedent established in this case should be followed in those cases, duties which have been assessed and collected, amounting to $200,000,000, would be open to question.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question in my turn?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator say that in regard to that tax he knows or has heard of a single case where a party paid his tax under protest and then proceeded after doing that to abandon the technical step of taking an appeal under the advice of an officer of the United States? That is this case.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do say that precisely that case exists at the present time, and parties are now before the Committee on Finance pressing a bill to give relief and remedy in precisely the case which the Senator supposes.

Mr. HOAR. After an officer of the Government had advised them not to take an appeal?

Mr. ALDRICH. Where they had made a formal protest but neglected to follow that formal protest by an appeal as required by the statute.

Mr. HOAR. The sugar case, as stated by the Senator from Iowa, was a case purely and simply of an overvaluation by reason of an error of the polariscope test, and not of an erroneous construction of the law; a totally distinct case.

Mr. ALDRICH. In the sugar case the Secretary of the Treasury, to avoid frauds upon the revenue, made an order which prescribed an entirely different method of ascertaining the valuation of sugars and assessing the duties upon sugars from that provided by law. The Supreme Court of the United States afterward decided that the order was not warranted by law, and was erroneous and void. Now, there come some parties after the lapse of fourteen years and claim that they too made a formal protest, but did not follow up the steps required by law, and they ask the Senate to refund to them duties erroneously assessed upon statements made that some officer of the customs, perhaps, told them it was not necessary to do what the law required them to do.

The law in this case prescribes in the first place that a man shall file a protest within ten days; that within thirty days he shall take an appeal, in case the decision is made in the first instance by the collector of customs, to the Secretary of the Treasury, and upon the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury being made if it is adverse to his interest he must within ninety days commence suit in some court of competent jurisdiction. There is no pretense that in this case these steps, made essential by the revenue laws of the United States, were taken. It is said that these claimants did not take them because some collector of customs stated that it would not be necessary or that it would do no good.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator permit me to read that clause of the report, so that we may see the application of the point he is making?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. COCKRELL. The report of the Committee on Claims says:

Hawley & Sons paid the duties so imposed, verbally protesting against the exaction, and declaring their intention to appeal to the Department. They were told by the collector that they had the right to do so, but that the Department would undoubtedly reaffirm its decision; and then read to them the decision which had been made by the Secretary.

Mr. ALDRICH. So that the collector merely called the attention of the claimants to the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury had made an adverse decision in this very case.

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly; did not advise them to take an appeal.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Here is the statement made in the report which, if the Senator from Rhode Island will permit me, I will read:

Hawley & Sons paid the duties so imposed, verbally protesting against the exaction, and declaring their intention to appeal to the Department. They were told by the collector that they had the right to do so, but that the Department would undoubtedly reaffirm its decision; and then read to them the decision which had been made by the Secretary.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is precisely the sentence I read.

Mr. ALDRICH. If I understand the position just taken by the members of Committee on Claims, speaking through the Senator from Massachusetts, it is this: They propose to substitute in place of the legal requirement of the law, of the various steps which must be taken in order to give a claimant any standing in court at least, a verbal statement that some officer of the United States had said that it would not perhaps be well or it would do no good to take the appeal which the law required. Now I say that if this bill is passed and this precedent is established it will be the thin end of a wedge which will open wide the door of the Treasury of the United States to a mass of claims of this kind which no man can number and the amount of which no man can foretell.

As I have said, in the sugar cases there is a question of $200,000,000 that have been collected under a ruling which was afterward declared erroneous, and if you allow these claimants to come to the Senate and make the Senate a court to consider such questions and allow them to prove what some officer of the customs, acting without any authority either of statute or otherwise, said to a claimant fourteen years ago, you are opening a door that I believe the Senate would be very unwilling to open if they understood fully all the facts.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, from the beginning these parties have asserted their right to come before Congress and ask a return of money which confessedly was exacted from them contrary to law. There is no question about that. They were charged as the proper valuation for the assessment of duties, in addition to the market price, or the rule that would obtain, 1 cent a pound for excise duties levied by the Canadian Government, when the fact was that there was no excise duty upon this malt. These parties bought it in bond; there had been no excise duty, and its price in bond was the amount upon which the duty should have been laid, as I understand. There is no pretense by any of the Senators who have talked here but that these four hundred and odd dollars were taken contrary to law, to right, to equity, to justice, from these men, Hawley & Sons; that the amount was paid under protest; the reason given and the reason assigned when it was paid; and after it was paid Hawley & Sons went to make their appeal, and while they were engaged in that—for the report is not as full as the facts are on that subject—while they were present to make an appeal, as they might under the law, the collector of customs said to them: "You can take your appeal, but here within a few days I have received this letter from the Department, saying that they still persist in their ruling, that this cent a pound should be a part of the valuation upon which duties should be levied." He showed it to them there—Collector Bell, of Detroit.

Mr. MCPHERSON. May I ask the Senator from Michigan a question?

Mr. CONGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Does he know whether at that time there were any suits pending against the Government for the return of like duties?

Mr. CONGER. I do not know whether there were; but there was at that time or there was within six months afterward a decision rendered in the courts in Illinois upon this very question, whether that 1 cent a pound export duty formed a part of the valuation of malt bought in bond just as this was, and the court decided that it was not a proper subject of valuation on which to levy duty.

Mr. ALLISON. The Secretary decided the other way.

Mr. CONGER. The Secretary had decided the other way. Immediately upon that decision of the United States court the Secretary of the Treasury, by circular and by order sent out to all the collectors, declared that he followed the decisions of the courts and that they were not to collect duties on this percentage.

Mr. MCPHERSON. If the Senator will bear with me one moment longer, I will state that the reason for my asking the question was because of the fact that the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Rhode Island both compared this case to the sugar cases. I have not watched the argument in this case closely, but I would like to make a suggestion with regard to the sugar cases, if those be like cases, and perhaps it will assist the Senator a little in his argument. I should like to know by what process of right this Government, because it has the power to do it, will play upon the rights and the liberties of its citizens which they have under the law? For instance, a Secretary of the Treasury makes a ruling which the courts decide to be contrary to law. Now take the sugar cases. In most of those cases the sugar had absolutely been purchased before the ruling was made. The Secretary of the Treasury imposes a new rule for the collection of the duty. When the sugar arrived in the port of New York, one importer protests, enforces it by every step that the law requires—by appeal, first to the Secretary and then to the courts. A second one does the same thing and a third and a fourth. A case was made before the courts. The case was then pending and likely to be decided at any moment. Other cases arose under like circumstances. The collector of the port simply states to the parties importing, "These cases are pending and will be decided in a few days; what is the use of your going to the expense of going through this formal protest when certainly this great Government will be equitable and treat you all alike?"

Mr. ALLISON. Was that the case with all the sugar importers?

Mr. MCPHERSON. I do not know what the Senator means by "all."

Mr. ALLISON. Or with many of them?

Mr. MCPHERSON. I suppose after a few cases appeals would not be taken.

Mr. ALLISON. But I understand the Senator that some of the importers made protests as required by law. Further, I understand the Senator from New Jersey to say that some others did not do so simply because the collector of the port said, "The question is now pending in the courts, and you had better not do it."

Mr. MCPHERSON. Well, I claim in the first place that protests were made according to law. The importer protested first to the collector, then to the Secretary, and afterward brought suit, and a second importer did the same thing, and a third one, until four or five of the parties did it. The collector of the port did say in many of the cases to the aggrieved parties, "Suits are pending; they will be decided, and when they are decided as a matter of course you will be paid in common with others." If I understand it, this is almost a like case, and certainly the equities of the case are with a man who is not supposed to understand all the requirements of the law, and I do not see how it can be made to apply to $200,000,000 or to any particular sum except that which absolutely occurred from the time the first protest was made till the decision of the Secretary was reversed by the courts.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

Mr. CONGER. I prefer going on with my remarks, as I can very well get along with one interruption, and I do not with too many of them, especially from Rhode Island.

Mr. President, there is no comparison or analogy between the sugar cases and this case. In this case it is admitted that the valuation assessed upon the 1 cent a pound more was either right or wrong. The court said that it was wrong. The Secretary of the Treasury immediately revoked his order and said it was wrong, but he got the money of these men and put it in the Treasury, and the gentlemen here who seem to have charge of the Department are seeking to keep in the Treasury money which was assessed contrary to law, contrary to the decision of the courts. It was paid in July, and in November of that same year—of course there were suits pending, because there could not have been a suit brought to issue from July to November, as any one knows—the decision of the court was rendered, and in November, too, the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury himself was reversed. In the sugar cases the Secretary of the Treasury undertook to make a new way of computing the saccharine qualities and strength of sugars, contrary to law, as was said. He said not. We have heard him say it here often. He said he merely brought in the polariscope as an additional means of detecting fraud. There is no question of fraud in this case. It is a simple, plain question of the Secretary of the Treasury, by a construction taking four hundred and odd dollars from a citizen which he himself in four months thereafter admitted was wrong; and when he was asked to refund that, he said, "You must go to Congress to get the money; it has gone into the Treasury and I can not pay it out."

Hawley & Sons in good faith (for they are great importers of malt) had been importing malt for years and years and are to-day.

This kind of a case arose just at that time: The Canadian Government that same winter and spring, for the first time, had laid by law an export duty of 1 cent a pound on malt, and all these cases had arisen after February 10, if I remember the date aright, when this export duty was laid by the Canadian Government. It all came together in Chicago, Detroit, and other ports where malt was introduced, and the Secretary of the Treasury made this unjust ruling, as the court said, and took money which the Government ought not to have taken. That is a plain question of fact and of law. There was no law ordering this. It was supposed by the Secretary of the Treasury that the 1 cent a pound had been added to the purchase value of the malt in Canada, whereas this was bought in bond, the malt being then in the city of Detroit.

Mr. MORRILL. May I ask the Senator for information a single fact in relation to this case?

Mr. CONGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRILL. Did not the seller and purchaser of the malt understand at the time that this 1 cent was an addition to the cost, and did not the seller obtain a price accordingly? In other words, did he make any loss on the malt?

Mr. CONGER. I can not say from my own knowledge or from my recollection of the facts, but I think this malt was imported into Detroit before the law took effect making the 1 cent export duty, for I think it was that very spring or winter that the law of Canada was passed laying the export tax of 1 cent a pound, and it never had attached to this property. This property was in bond in Detroit; it was bought there in bond at a given price in the market.

Mr. ALLISON. Why "in bond?"

Mr. CONGER. Just as all other goods may be stored in bond until taken out and the duties paid. Our warehousing law provides especially for that. Our laws provide that goods may be kept in the warehouse a certain length of time. My colleague says I am mistaken about this being in bond in Detroit; that it was in bond in Canada.

Mr. ALLISON. I thought so.

Mr. CONGER. I accept the correction, but the proper amount paid on purchasing under our laws was the amount upon which the duty should be levied. There is no question about that.

Now, I pass along down to the point where these parties, large importers of malt, wished to test this question, and when they came to make the appeal, to take the proper steps, they were met by Collector Bell with the last letter from the Department, saying that they ruled upon this, that their ruling should stand, and he said: "You can appeal, but there is no use; here is the last letter that I have received within a week. You are not going to get the Department to change it;" and they did not change it until the courts directed it to be changed. Hawley & Sons ought not to have listened to the collector; but they ought not to be robbed because they were misled by the collector. This Government does not need to take and keep the money of its citizens illegally and unlawfully and by force collected against law. That is not the kind of Government we have. And whether it takes one thousand or ten thousand or a million dollars out of the Treasury, it is better for the Government of the United States that it deal fairly by its citizens than it is to get a great surplus revenue into the Treasury for my friend from Vermont to boast of.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I protest against the assumption and assertion of the Senator from Michigan that this duty was improperly and illegally assessed and collected. Under the construction of the law given by the Secretary of the Treasury, whose duty it was to construe the law, this duty was properly and legally assessed and collected from these parties. There can be no question whatever about that; and there was no question about the legality of his construction until it was decided by a court of competent jurisdiction, and of course that decision did not apply to cases which had occurred before that time.

The Senator might as well say that the duties assessed and collected under the order of the Secretary of the Treasury in the sugar cases were all illegal and in fraud because the Supreme Court afterward decided that that order was not according to their construction of the law. All these steps were properly and legally taken, and these duties were as properly and as legally collected as any which were ever assessed and collected by the customs officers of the United States. I care not what representations were made—and there is conflicting testimony as to what they were—these parties neglected to take the only steps which would give them a right to pursue their remedy against the Government of the United States.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I am myself becoming somewhat confused about the facts in this case. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] spoke of this malt being in bond in Detroit.

Mr. CONGER. I corrected that before I sat down. I admitted that I was mistaken about that. My colleague told me it was in bond in Canada.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator called attention to the fact that this was an export duty and one which had been recently imposed under the laws of Canada, and said that therefore there was a very natural confusion along the border, both in Canada and in the United States, with reference to this business. Now I find in the report that there was an excise tax and not an export tax of 1 cent per pound upon malt. It seems to me that is rather an excessive tax, but if it was an excise tax, of course it was to be included in the cost of the malt sent here by the people who manufactured it in Canada in competition with our own malsters in the United States—in Detroit and Buffalo and New York and elsewhere—whom we supposed we had protected by a duty of 20 per cent. ad valorem, in order that the Canadians might not be permitted to come in and sell their malt in competition with ours unless they paid 20 per cent. ad valorem, which meant 20 per cent. of the value of the article in Canada, and did not mean the value of the article in bond, which could thereby exclude itself from paying the 1 cent excise tax, but meant the market value of the malt in Canada, where it was to be consumed.

Now the Senator from Michigan says that this is acknowledged to have been on the part of the United States an improper exaction of duty. For one I do not believe it. I beg leave to differ, humbly of course, from the decision of a subordinate court in the State of Illinois with reference to what was the true measure of valuation in Canada of the malt there. It is understood under our import laws that where we exact an ad valorem duty upon articles imported into this country we mean to levy it on the valuation of those articles in the markets of the country from whence they are exported, and not that the people who export articles to this country can, by devices of their own, reduce the valuation of those articles at the place of production, and thus by the intervention of their laws change our existing laws in reference to import duties. The facts are that this decision of Judge Drummond in Chicago had the effect to reduce the duty on malt to 19 per cent., instead of 20 per cent. ad valorem, as we supposed we had placed it.

I did not make this case absolutely analogous to the sugar cases. I only made allusion to the sugar cases for purposes of comparison and illustration. The Secretary of the Treasury discovered that instead of the sugar importers importing their sugars according to the Dutch standard of value, they were manipulating the Dutch standard of value, and injecting into it saccharine matter, although the color made a low rate of duty, whereas in fact the saccharine strength would have justified the Secretary of the Treasury in exacting a higher rate of duty. Thereupon he said this new instrument, the polariscope, might be used for the purpose of protecting the Government against this artificial coloring of sugar, and the Supreme Court, I believe, though I have not the decision before me, took a somewhat technical view of the subject, and decided that the order of the Secretary of the Treasury was improper. I only used the sugar cases as an illustration.

I remember very well that many years ago we passed a law with reference to the number of threads of silk or cotton or linen that should be included in a textile fabric imported from another country. The then Secretary of the Treasury decided that that meant one thing, and some importer, being a little more dexterous than his neighbor, made a protest in writing, as the law requires, and carried that case to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the court decided that the Secretary of the Treasury was wrong. In the mean time millions upon millions of dollars' worth of these goods had been imported under the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury and no protest made, and meanwhile all these textile fabrics had gone into the markets and into the consumption of our country with the duty or at least a portion of the duty added to the price and paid by the consumers. Will anybody tell me that this Government is bound either in justice or in equity to go back and pay all those importers the amount of excess of duty which had been exacted from them when they themselves did not comply with the particular provisions of the statutes in this regard? If we do that, then there is no statute of limitations in reference to our tariff laws.

Here is a case that arose fourteen years ago. There are other cases of equal importance and greater magnitude that arose more than twenty years ago or thirty years ago. Can it be said that there is any principle of justice or equity which requires us to go back and pay a man the amount of excess of duty collected because a court has decided that that was an unjust exaction? I say that in our revenue laws, and especially in our tariff laws, there must be an end to these things, and that that end must come quickly and speedily. Your statute (I do not remember the number of the section of the Revised Statutes) requires that when the man who pays the duty objects to the rate of duty and to the valuation fixed by the appraisers and the collector of the port, as he must pay the duty in order to secure his goods, he pays under protest, and he shall make a protest in writing that the valuation is excessive, and it shall be the duty of the collector of customs to send that protest to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of the Treasury either reverses or upholds the decision of his subordinate officer; and if he does uphold that decision and the importer desires to pursue the matter further he must within thirty days bring his suit in the circuit or district court of the United States. Now, why is all that exact promptitude required of the importer? It is for a purpose, so that at some time and in some way the question of the amount of duty shall be closed up as between the importer and the Government of the United States.

Therefore it is I say that unless we can plainly bring this case within some exception to these general provisions it is a great mistake for us to undertake here in this way to pay Hawley & Sons even the trifling sum of $473. So in the remarks I have made I have not undertaken to assimilate this case to any particular thing, but only to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that we are opening a door here which if we follow and follow the logical arguments made by Senators on this floor that because a court has decided that the Secretary of the Treasury is wrong with reference to the amount to be exacted under the revenue law, we must refund the money, there will be no end to the claims that will come before Congress for adjudication under the statute with reference to import duties.

Mr. COCKRELL. I want to get at the foundation of this case exactly. In this report (and it is a very anomalous report, I must confess, when we consider the original papers which I have had now the pleasure of examining) it is claimed that these parties paid the money to the Secretary of the Treasury in July, 1870, and that in November, 1870, the United States court made the decision that the ruling of the Treasury Department was incorrect. In July, 1870, the tax was paid. In November, 1870, the United States court rendered a decision which they say (and which we have not before us) reversed or overruled the prescription or rule of the Treasury Department.

Now, when did Messrs. Hawley & Sons undertake to recover this money? What steps did they take? Let us look at it just as it is. It is an old, stale claim, and nothing else. The officer of the United States made no misrepresentation to them. He practiced no deception; they do not pretend it. There is not a Senator here who will dare to say that the United States officer misrepresented one solitary thing to Hawley & Sons. The United States collector simply told them that the Secretary of the Treasury had decided in a certain way, and read the decision; that was all. He told them the truth. It was so decided; it was the truth. He made no concealment and no misrepresentation.

What did Hawley & Sons do? They laid perfectly dormant until 1874, four long years after this occurred. Not a step did they take to recover this money back until after the lapse of four years, and that fact is not disclosed in the report. We would infer from the report that these gentlemen had been diligent in recovering the money; that immediately, just as soon as the decision of the United States court in Chicago had been made, they came in and asked for the refund. I have before me the papers in this case. Here is what is called the petition that was first presented in Congress, the inception of the claim in Congress. I want the members of the Committee on Claims to notice it. Here it is:

DETROIT, MICH., January 19, 1874.

DEAR SIR: We want the United States to refund us an overcharge of duty which the collector of customs here illegally collected from us on three lots of malt imported by us in the month of July, 1870, and we will be obliged to you for any assistance you can give us in this matter. The facts are as follows:

We imported on July 6, 1870, from James Slater, London, Ontario, 99,736 pounds of malt, being 2,770$\frac{16}{56}$ bushels, which at 80 cents per bushel cost us $2,116.40, and on which we paid duty $660.75—

That is July 6, 1870, remember. Now—

On July 16, 1870—

Ten days later—

we imported from Labatt & Co., London, Ontario, 41,976 pounds, being 1,166 bushels, which cost us at 79 cents per bushel $912.14, and on which we paid duty $289.40. On July 28, 1870—

Twenty-two days after the first importation—

we imported from George Kains, St. Thomas, Ontario, 89,296 pounds, being 2,480$\frac{16}{56}$ bushels, which cost us, at 79 cents per bushel, $1,959.55, and on which we paid duty $565.80.

As we bought this malt in bond in Canada we at first proposed to pay duty only on what it cost in bond, but the deputy collector, Mr. D. V. Bell, would not consent to this. He informed us that in order to get the malt we would have to pay duty on its value in Canada out of bond. We objected to this, and proposed to protest against it. He replied—

I am reading the statement that was made here by this man himself.

He replied "that in justice to us he would inform us that it would do us no good, as the Department had lately decided that duty must be paid on goods out of bond, and if we protested the Department would only reiterate the decision."

Seeing no other way to get possession of the malt than to pay the duty according to the decision of the Department, we paid the duty as assessed on the three lots of malt as above stated.

The excise tax of Canada on malt is 1 cent per pound, and consequently in Canada malt out of bond is worth 1 cent per pound more than it is in bond. In these three lots there were 231,008 pounds. One cent per pound on this would be $2,310.08, and on this $2,310.08 we had to pay duty besides the duty we had to pay on the cost of the malt in bond. We understand—

Now, this is very instructive—

We understand that the Department has since then acquiesced in the decision of the United States court that duty should only be collected on the cost or value in bond, and that other parties who imported malt have had the excess of duties paid by them refunded by the Department.

We think that we, too, should have the excess of duty, $462.01, that we paid refunded to us, and hence we would be obliged to you for any advice you can give us as to the steps for us to take to have this overcharge refunded to us.

Yours, truly,

R. HAWLEY & SONS.

To Hon. J. W. BEGOLE,
Washington, D. C.

It seems that when this letter was received the advice given was to present the claim to Congress, and it was presented, this letter as a petition, four years after the taxes were paid, without one solitary thing having been done.

I have here a copy of an affidavit of Mr. Hawley which was made in 1880. It seems they did not file the evidence until long afterward. It goes on and states the amount that was paid, &c. Here is a copy of a letter of the collector giving the whole transaction:

CUSTOM-HOUSE, DETROIT, MICH., February 4, 1874.

Four years after the transaction—

Messrs. R. HAWLEY & SONS:

GENTS: In reply to your request for a statement in writing of the facts connected with the entry at this office by you of certain three lots of malt imported from Canada in the month of July, 1870, I submit the following:

Four years after this thing had occurred they go back and try to find out what transactions actually occurred and what were the facts at the time. They had taken no step; they had no intention of bringing a suit to test this matter; they had no intention to appeal from the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury and took no steps to do it for four long years, and then they write a very polite note to the collector of customs to have their memory refreshed as to what took place, as to what were the facts.

In reply to your request for a statement in writing of the facts * * * I submit the following:

On July 6, 1870, you presented to the entry clerk in this office a certified invoice of 2,770$\frac{16}{56}$ bushels malt, valued at 80 cents per bushel, upon which you desired to make entry and pay duties. When asked by said clerk if the value expressed in the invoice included the Canadian excise tax of 1 cent per pound, you replied that it did not, but was the price paid for the malt in bond in Canada. Said clerk then informed you that the entry should express the market value of the malt in Canada out of bond, to which you objected, but in order to obtain possession of the malt made your entry in accordance with the clerk's suggestion and paid duties.

Just what occurs every day in every custom-house in the United States. A question arises as to valuation; the clerk tells the rule of valuation; the man says, "Oh, no; my other rule ought to prevail;" the clerk says, "No; I can only receive it this way," and acquiescence is made. It is just what occurs nearly every day in almost every custom-house in the United States.

Afterward, on the same day, I think, you called upon me for a fuller explanation of the matter, verbally protesting against the exaction of duty as aforesaid, and expressing your intention to appeal to the Department against the decision of this office—

The local office.

To this I replied in substance, to the best of my recollection, that of course you had a perfect right to do so, but that the question had been already decided by the Department, and in my opinion would reaffirm its former decision on the subject if again appealed to.

That was the truth; he simply told him the regulation of the Department.

At the same time I showed or read to you the decision referred to, as follows—

Here is the decision:

The dutiable value of goods, &c., imported into the United States is the value at which such goods enter into consumption in the country of export. A drawback allowed by a foreign government on the exportation of any article does not affect the value in the markets of that country, for the drawback is not paid or allowed until after the goods have ceased to form a part of the common stock of the country whence exported. (Collector, New York, June 12, 1869.)

On July 16, 1870, and July 28, 1870, you imported respectively 1,167 and 2,478 bushels malt, invoiced at 79 cents per bushel, but on entry increased the value 1 cent per pound and paid duty accordingly.

The duty paid by you on the three said importations was as follows: 6,415 bushels, value, commissions included, $7,662, at 20 per cent., equal to $1,532.40. I do not remember any conversation between us on this subject, excepting the one herein referred to, on the occasion of any importation by you.

Yours, &c.,

D. V. BELL, Deputy Collector.

There is not one solitary fact in this case that can not be found in every case where there has been any dispute at all between the importer and the collector. It is exceedingly doubtful whether the Treasury Department ought to have acquiesced in the decision of the United States court in Chicago in the interpretation of that law. It is still a question as to whether the Department was not right in its rule and regulation in regard to the rate of duty that ought to have been imposed.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Who makes that question now?

Mr. COCKRELL. I make it now, and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] made it. The question now is whether, without any final decision having been made in that case by the Supreme Court of the country, we are to follow that decision.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The decision was final until an appeal was taken.

Mr. COCKRELL. I know it was final; but are we bound by it? I say we are not bound by it.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. We are not bound by any decision.

Mr. COCKRELL. We should be bound by a decision of the Supreme Court.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. By no means.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator allow me to read an extract from the Revised Statutes which I think covers the case?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. That is always interesting reading. I should like to hear it.

Mr. ALDRICH. It covers, I think, the point made by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] very distinctly. Section 2906 provides that the value shall be the "wholesale price thereof," that is, of goods assessed for ad valorem duty:

Wholesale price thereof, at the period of the exportation to the United States, in the principal markets of the country from which the same has been imported.

Of course the value in this case would have been the value in the principal markets of Canada at the time when the malt was imported into the United States.

Mr. CONGER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ALDRICH. Let me finish my point, and then I shall be glad to answer the Senator. That malt could not have been sold in Canada unless the excise tax had been paid. The value in the principal markets of Canada would have been with the excise tax added, and could never have been less the excise tax.

Mr. CONGER. The question I wanted to ask the Senator is this: Under our law whisky has a tax of 90 cents a gallon, and under our law if exported it has no tax of 90 cents a gallon. That 90 cents a gallon is added to the value of whisky in the markets of the United States. If exported to a country where there is a duty similar to ours on its value, does the Senator claim that the 90 cents which was not taxed if exported would form part of the market value in the United States?

Mr. ALDRICH. Undoubtedly it would if they had the same statutes, because it could only be sold in the principal markets of this country with the tax paid.

Mr. CONGER. Then, as I understand the Senator, the 90 cents a gallon would be added to the valuation, although our law says, if exported, that it shall not be added, that it shall not be paid.

Mr. ALDRICH. The law of the country in which the duties were paid of course would control, and, if their statutes were precisely the same as ours, I think, undoubtedly, that rule would apply.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Mr. President, I suppose no Senator has any question in regard to the facts of this case. They are correctly stated in the report which was made to the committee by the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. FAIR]. If any Senator had any doubt in regard to the correctness of the facts, that doubt would have been removed by the documents just read by the Senator from Missouri. It is quite unnecessary to repeat the facts. The Senator from Rhode Island admits the correctness of the facts as stated in the report, but he dissents from the decision made by Judge Drummond, and which has since been acquiesced in by the Secretary of the Treasury. The decision, as has already been stated, was made by Judge Drummond, the circuit judge for the seventh circuit, a judge of great learning and great experience in this particular class of cases. If the Government were dissatisfied with that decision, an appeal might have been taken and a decision ultimately obtained by the highest judicial authority in the country; but the Government was satisfied with the decision of the circuit judge of the seventh circuit, and, as has already been stated by the senior Senator from Michigan, the Treasury Department immediately notified collectors to impose the tax in accordance with that decision. I say that it is too late for the Senator from Rhode Island to claim——

Mr. ALDRICH. I know that the Senator from Wisconsin does not desire to do me an injustice.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Not at all.

Mr. ALDRICH. The point was raised by his neighbor, the Senator from Iowa, and I merely read the statute to show that I thought there might be some force in his statement.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I understood that the point was acquiesced in by the Senator from Rhode Island. But no matter about that, the legal question was decided by competent judicial authority, and that decision was acquiesced in by the Secretary of the Treasury, and has been acquiesced in from that time to this.

Mr. SHERMAN. The amount involved in this bill on the face of it is very limited, being only some $400, and is scarcely worth the discussion that has been had upon it; but the number of cases that will depend upon the decision of this case is infinite. The number may be so great that any number I could name would probably fall within the lines. The law upon this subject is perfectly well understood. It has been in existence almost since the customs laws have been in operation. I should like to read to Senators the law, to show that this applicant had not complied with the law in any sense, in any part of it. The law requires the notice to be in writing. This notice is alleged to have been verbal. A verbal notice opens the door to fraud constantly. I will read the law; it is very short, and it has been the law, I believe, almost from the beginning:

SEC. 2931. On the entry of any vessel, or of any merchandise, the decision of the collector of customs at the port of importation and entry, as to the rate and amount of duties to be paid on the tonnage of such vessel or on such merchandise, and the dutiable costs and charges thereon, shall be final and conclusive against all persons interested therein, unless the owner, master, commander, or consignee of such vessel, in the case of duties levied on tonnage, or the owner, importer, consignee, or agent of the merchandise, in the case of duties levied on merchandise, or the costs and charges thereon, shall, within ten days after the ascertainment and liquidation of the duties by the proper officers of the customs, as well in cases of merchandise entered in bond as for consumption, give notice in writing to the collector on each entry, if dissatisfied with his decision, setting forth therein, distinctly and specifically, the grounds of his objections thereto, and shall within thirty days after the date of such ascertainment and liquidation, appeal therefrom to the Secretary of the Treasury. The decision of the Secretary on such appeals shall be final and conclusive; and such vessel or merchandise, or costs and charges, shall be liable to duty accordingly, unless suit shall be brought within ninety days after the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury on such appeal for any duties which shall have been paid before the date of such decision on such vessel or on such merchandise, or costs or charges, or within ninety days after the payment of duties paid after the decision of the Secretary.

Then section 3010 of the Revised Statutes provides that—

All money paid to any collector of the customs, or to any person acting as such, for unascertained duties or for duties paid under protest against the rate or amount of duties charged, shall be placed to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, and shall not be held by the collector, or person acting as such, to await any ascertainment of duties or the result of any litigation in relation to the rate or amount of duty legally chargeable and collectible in any case where money is so paid.

* * * * * * *

But no recovery shall be allowed in such action unless a protest and appeal shall have been taken as prescribed in section 2931.

That law of the United States has always been the law in regard to the collection of duties. It is applicable alone to the collection of duties, and the reason is because the taxes imposed upon importations enter into the cost of the article, which at once becomes an article of merchandise, and are refunded by the consumer. That is a principle which I believe is conceded by every one. It does not always hold good, but that is the general rule upon which the customs laws are based. It is absolutely necessary to have the decision definite and final before the goods enter into consumption. If the appeal is made, it must be made in writing, by filing a protest with the collector of customs. The collector of customs has no right or authority to waive this rule. If the notice which is given is merely verbal, it is not a compliance with the law. Every intelligent merchant knows the law, as I have no doubt the merchants named in this bill knew very well what the law was, because they did make a protest. They made a verbal protest, which could not be communicated to the Secretary of the Treasury. It was merely a declaration that they did not think the decision was right. Nor has the collector any power whatever to waive this formal notice. It would not be right or safe for the interests of the United States to allow him that power and to permit verbal proof to be given as to a conversation between the importer and the collector of customs.

When the importer makes his appeal to the Secretary of the Treasury he must do it promptly within ten days. The case goes to the Secretary of the Treasury and it is again decided, first by the collector and then again by the Treasury Department. The law then is peremptory that within thirty days after that time suit must be brought. The reason for that is apparent. The collection of customs could not go on safely unless upon some strict rule which required a prompt assertion of a right.

There must necessarily be in the administration of customs laws a great variety of opinion. In the first place, the collector decides. The importer is not bound to listen to that decision. He may take the decision to the Department. He is not bound to listen to the decision of the Department. Those decisions are made promptly and summarily upon the face of the law. Whether the decision is right or wrong it must be made promptly. The decisions are made immediately in the ordinary course within thirty days, and then the law expressly requires an appeal to be made from that decision and a suit to be commenced in the proper tribunal of the United States. If you waive these provisions of law, which are intended as a safeguard to the Treasury in a class of claims like this, the number of claims would be infinite. To open the door for the benefit of this $400 claim would be to involve the Government and involve Congress in all sorts of claims of this kind.

The custom has always been, so far as I have known, that this class of claims has gone to the Committee on Finance, and they have uniformly enforced the requirements of the law. I suppose that no case could be found, there is no case to my knowledge in the history of the Government, where Congress has undertaken to waive every provision of the law. Here no protest was made. The protest must be in writing. Here was a verbal declaration. The collector said there was no use in appealing to the Secretary of the Treasury, because he had already decided. That does not at all relieve the importer from taking the formal proceeding required by the law. Suppose the Secretary of the Treasury decided against him, that would not be the end of his remedy; he could take his appeal, and then he might immediately commence his suit.

It would not be just, it would not be right or prudent, it would not be safe to waive the full, strict, legal application of this rule. Otherwise an infinite variety of suits would spring up and claims would be made upon Congress almost infinite in number.

The importers know this provision as well as any provision of the law. These parties seem to have been the importers of malt from Canada. They were probably brewers. They no doubt converted their malt into beer, and the beer was sold and consumed, and probably the parties who drank the beer are dead long, long ago. Now, to allow them to come here and open up this question on a claim of this kind would be very unsafe. The amount involved may be infinitesimal in this particular case, but the multitude of cases would be so great that the bills would overload your Calendar. There are similar bills now pending in committee, I am told by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], where they will be fairly considered and fairly presented.

Mr. CONGER. I feel thankful for the revelation of the Senator, knowing that we may have the benefit of the advice and the suggestions of Senators who for years have been at the head of the Treasury Department and are familiar with all the workings there to instruct us Senators who have not had the benefit of that experience, that if we had followed certain provisions of law we could have got back our money without coming to Congress. That is a revelation which it is desirable to have made here. That is all that the Senator has said, that if these parties had followed the law, made a written protest within so many days, made an appeal if the decision was against them, gone to the courts and waited until after a decision should have been made, after the Chicago decision, they could have got their money without coming to Congress.

Now, I venture to say, and I hope I am not immodest in the assertion, that I knew myself, and I doubt whether there is a Senator here who did not know, that if Hawley & Sons had pursued that course they would not have had to come to Congress. But what do men come to Congress for and ask for the enactment of a law for their relief? Because they have been in default or in neglect or ignorant of some other remedy. That the Senator knows as well as I do. It gives me no information to say that we had not complied with the law, for the report says we had not complied with the law. The report says we were required to come to Congress for a new law. Will the Senator tell me or tell his brother Senators that a citizen of the United States may not come in a proper way and ask Congress to pass a new law for his relief when he has been wronged? That is what I want the Senator to tell me. If the position of the distinguished Senator from Ohio is correct we ought immediately to pass a law, or perhaps prepare the way for a constitutional provision, that no man should come to Congress to ask for a new law who had failed to pursue his remedy under the then existing law. By constitutional provision or by law we should shut the door against every citizen who sought the passage of a law for his relief.

That is all there is in the argument. The argument is against permitting a citizen to come to the law-making power for relief at all for fear somebody else may come. Has it come to this, that the Senator will not trust the discretion of his fellow-members of the Senate of the United States and the House of Representatives on each particular case for fear we shall be misled? Are we of necessity to bar the doors of Congress against any applicant coming here for relief? That is all there is of the Senator's argument.

If this case on its merits deserves relief, then under the law, the Constitution, and the institutions of the United States the Senate and the House of Representatives are the proper bodies to make new laws to give relief. That is all there is of it. Is this such a case, or should gentlemen stand up here and wave the uncertain and the unknown millions that are floating around in the empty space of their imaginations to prevent the Senate from doing what is right? That is the argument of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH]; that is the argument of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN]; that was the argument with which our revered friend from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] started into this debate, but with his usual judgment and with his usual good sense he has withdrawn from such a position, as we always expect him to withdraw from any position which he takes contrary to justice and to equity and to right. It is for that I admire my venerable friend from Vermont, for although with the injustice and the rashness of youth he sometimes makes assertions here, when the falsity of his position is exposed he has too much pride of character to persist in them when he sees that he is wrong and doing wrong to citizens of the United States. I would to God other Senators would profit by the distinguished and illustrious example of this father of the Senate, who has withdrawn his objection to this bill.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, the statement of the Senator from Michigan in relation to my position on this bill is just as much warranted as his argument for the bill and no more.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill be ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and read the third time? [Having put the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken.

Mr. SEWELL. I am paired on this question with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN]. If he were present, I should vote against the bill and he would vote for it.

The result was announced—yeas 19, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—19.

Blair,	Coke,	Jackson,	Sawyer.
Bowen,	Conger,	Kenna,	Van Wyck,
Call,	Cullom,	Palmer,	Williams,
Camden,	Dolph,	Pike,	Wilson.
Cameron of Wis.,	Frye,	Riddleberger,

NAYS—29.

Aldrich,	Garland,	Morgan,	Sheffield,
Allison,	Hampton,	Morrill,	Sherman,
Beck,	Harris,	Pendleton,	Slater,
Brown,	Jonas,	Platt,	Vance,
Butler,	Jones of Florida,	Plumb,	Walker.
Cameron of Pa.,	Maxey,	Pugh,
Cockrell,	Miller of Cal.,	Ransom,
Edmunds,	Mitchell,	Saulsbury,

ABSENT—28.

Bayard,	Gorman,	Ingalls,	Mahone,
Colquitt,	Groome,	Jones of Nevada,	Manderson,
Dawes,	Hale,	Lamar,	Miller of N. Y.,
Fair,	Harrison,	Lapham,	Sabin,
Farley,	Hawley,	Logan,	Sewell,
George,	Hill,	McMillan,	Vest,
Gibson,	Hoar,	McPherson,	Voorhees.

So the bill was rejected.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the Senator to withdraw that motion. I desire to give notice that I shall ask for a reconsideration of the vote just taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont withdraw his motion?

Mr. MORRILL. The Senator from Michigan has already given the notice. I think that it is important that we should have an executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that the notice has no operation as a notice. Any Senator voting with the majority may during to-morrow or the next day's sitting, the Chair thinks—certainly to-morrow—move to reconsider without any notice.

Mr. CONGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. SLATER. I appeal to the Senator from Vermont to allow me to call up a bill so that it may be the unfinished business for to-morrow.

Mr. MORRILL. That can be done just as well to-morrow.

Mr. SLATER. I prefer to do it to-night, because there may be a struggle to-morrow and I wish to make it a matter of record. I gave notice that I should call the bill up to-day and I wish to get it out of the way of other business.

Mr. MORRILL. It is so late.

Mr. SLATER. I do not propose to proceed with the bill to-night, but ask that it may be taken up so as to be the unfinished business for to-morrow.

Mr. MORRILL. I prefer to insist on my motion for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont declines to withdraw the motion. The Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 3 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 8, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last was read and approved.

CHAPLAIN CHARLES M. BLAKE (RETIRED).

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the petition and other papers in behalf of Chaplain Charles M. Blake (retired), United States Army; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

GUNS AND PROJECTILES.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the report of the board of officers of the Army appointed by the provisions of the act of July 5, 1884, of the various calibers, the length of bore, the greatest and least admissible weights of guns and projectiles for each caliber, and of all calibers required for the service, and the number of each caliber required; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

UMATILLA INDIAN RESERVATION, OREGON.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs relative to the establishment of a definite northern boundary to the Umatilla Indian reservation in Oregon, and submitting an amendment to Senate bill No. 66, now on the Speaker's table; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR INDIAN SERVICE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting supplementary estimates of the Indian Department for appropriations for the Indian service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

ENGRAVING, PRINTING, AND FUNDING NATIONAL-BANK NOTES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a communication from the Comptroller of the Currency correcting his former estimates for expenses of the national currency, and submitting an additional estimate of $110,000 for the expense of engraving, printing, and funding national-bank notes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

COMPENSATION OF INFORMERS, ETC.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with law, a detailed report of awards of compensation to informers and seizure officers in customs cases for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department.

LAND CLAIM, ANTONIO DE SALAZAR.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a report of the surveyor-general of New Mexico in the case of the New Mexico private land claim No. 132, Antonio de Salazar; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

RAILWAY POSTAL-CAR SERVICE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster-General, recommending an additional appropriation of $100,000 for the railway postal-car service for the remainder of the current fiscal year; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PURCHASES FOR INDIANS IN OPEN MARKET.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a statement from the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs of purchases exceeding in amount $500 made in open market, without advertisement, from February 1, 1884, to June 30, 1884; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department.

JUDGMENTS, COURT OF CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a report from the clerk of the Court of Claims, containing a list of judgments rendered by said court for the year ending June 30, 1884, with the amounts thereof and the parties in whose favor the same were rendered; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIM, SEBASTIAN DE VARGAS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a report of the surveyor-general of New Mexico in the case of the New Mexico private land claim No. 137, Sebastian de Vargas; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This being Monday, the first business in order is the call of States and Territories for the introduction and reference of bills and joint resolutions.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. KEIFER. I rise to make a privileged report from the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will send the report to the desk.

Mr. KEIFER, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. 7577) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. KEIFER. I give notice that on to-morrow I shall call up this bill for the consideration of the House.

Mr. BEACH. I trust the gentleman will not insist upon that course, and that the consideration of this bill will be deferred at least until Wednesday, so that we can have an opportunity of examining it.

Mr. KEIFER. I will furnish the gentleman with a copy of the bill to-day.

The SPEAKER. There is nothing before the House.

JAMES A. PATTERSON.

Mr. PRYOR introduced a bill (H. R. 7578) for the relief of James A. Patterson for property taken by and for the use of the United States during the war of the rebellion; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

H. W. BOUTWELL.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, introduced a bill (H. R. 7579) granting a pension to H. W. Boutwell, of Pickens County, Alabama; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

JAMES H. HAMILTON.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas, introduced a bill (H. R. 7580) for the relief of James H. Hamilton; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PETER COOK.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas, also introduced a bill (H. R. 7581) for the relief of Peter Cook; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

RANE C. HUTCHINSON.

Mr. ROSECRANS introduced a bill (H. R. 7582) to enable the Secretary of War to adjust, settle, and pay the accounts of Rane C. Hutchinson for services and expenses incurred in the military service of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

SUSPENSION OF SILVER-DOLLAR COINAGE.

Mr. BUCKNER introduced a bill (H. R. 7624) to suspend the coinage of standard silver dollars, and for other purposes; and moved its reference to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The SPEAKER. The practice has been to send such bills to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, but the Chair will entertain the motion of the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BUCKNER. I move, then, that the bill be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. MILLS. And I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it goes to that committee, and that motion is unnecessary. If the House declines to refer it to the Committee on Banking and Currency, the Chair will send it to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures under the rules of the House.

Mr. MILLS. I wish to make the issue so sharp the House can understand it.

Mr. BUCKNER. While I think the bill should be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, I do not care to press a vote upon it. I will, however, submit the question to the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BUCKNER. There were several bills introduced at the beginning of this Congress——

The SPEAKER. The Sergeant-at-Arms will request members in the rear of the seats to suspend conversation, as it is impossible to hear what is transpiring on the floor.

Mr. BUCKNER. It is not because I feel any interest as to where this bill goes so much as to have a correct ruling on this subject. If the Chair will consider the subject properly I think he will see that it has been the universal practice heretofore, up to within the last two or three years, to refer bills of this character to the Committee on Banking and Currency. Why, sir, the original bill itself, which passed this House by a two-thirds vote, came from the Committee on Banking and Currency. At that time every bill on the subject, so far as my recollection goes, was referred to that committee. I take it the distinction is this, that so far as the fabrication of coins is concerned, that is exclusively within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures; but when the coins are fabricated and go into circulation, they are then as much a part of the general circulation of the country as the bank notes themselves, and being currency, matters referring to them should be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The SPEAKER. To what original bill does the gentleman refer when he says it came from the Committee on Banking and Currency?

Mr. BUCKNER. The original bill known as the Bland bill was ordered to be reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency. That is a part of the legislative history of this country, and every bill at that session in reference to the coinage of the standard dollar was referred to that committee.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I understood that bill came from the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. CASSIDY. And that is my understanding, that that bill originated with the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. BUCKNER. The gentleman is mistaken altogether. The record will bear me out that the Bland bill was reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency. It was put into the hands of Mr. BLAND by myself, and in that form was reported and passed. The records will show I am correct.

Mr. CASSIDY. It has been my impression that that bill came from the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. BUCKNER. The gentleman is mistaken.

The SPEAKER. Clauses 5 and 6 of Rule XI, which regulate the jurisdiction of the several committees of the House, provide that all matters relating to proposed legislation shall be referred to the committees named in the preceding rule, as follows:

5. To banking and currency: to the Committee on Banking and Currency.
6. To coinage, weights, and measures: to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

Now, it seems to the Chair this relates to coinage, and nothing else.

Mr. BUCKNER. It is not a metal, but a currency.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has understood the fifth subdivision of that rule to refer the business relating to bank paper currency of the country to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and all matters relating to the metallic coinage to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

Mr. BUCKNER. That has not been the construction of former Speakers, as I understand it, though I bow to the ruling of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. In the first place the present rules were not in force at the time that the Bland bill, so called, was reported from the committee and passed by the House. The Chair thinks that under the present rules it is his duty to refer this bill to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, subject, of course, to the right of the House to direct a different reference if it sees proper to do so.

The bill was accordingly referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. O'FERRALL submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to report to this House as follows:

First. Whether he has purchased a site for a suitable building for the accommodation of the United States courts, post-office, and other Government offices at Harrisonburg, State of Virginia, as authorized and directed by an act entitled "An act for the erection of a public building at Harrisonburg and Abingdon, State of Virginia," approved July 7, 1882.

Second. What price was paid for said site, if purchased, and whether a valid title has been vested in the United States, and whether the State of Virginia has ceded to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein.

Third. What amount of the money appropriated for the purchase of said site and the commencement of the erection of a suitable building has been expended, and how and for what expended.

Fourth. The estimated cost, including site, of said building and the amount necessary to be appropriated, in addition to the sum already appropriated, to complete the same.

SWEARING-IN OF A MEMBER.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. Speaker, I present the credentials of Hon. John Bratton, elected in the fourth Congressional district of South Carolina as successor of my late colleague Mr. JOHN H. EVINS. I ask that Mr. Bratton be now sworn in.

The SPEAKER. The credentials will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA.
By the Secretary of State.

To the honorable the House of Representatives of the United States of America in the Forty-eighth Congress:

Whereas, in pursuance of the constitution and laws of the State of South Carolina and the Constitution and laws of the United States of America, an election was duly holden on the 24th day of November, in the year of our Lord 1884, in the said State of South Carolina, in the fourth Congressional district thereof, for Representative of the said State of South Carolina from the said fourth Congressional district thereof in the House of Representatives of the United States of America in the Forty-eighth Congress to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of the late JOHN H. EVINS; and

Whereas upon the examination of the returns of the said election, and by the determination and declaration of the board of State canvassers from the said State, filed and of record in my office, it appears that John Bratton was duly elected at the said election by the highest number of votes Representative of the State of South Carolina from the said fourth Congressional district thereof in the House of Representatives of the United States of America in the Forty-eighth Congress:

Now, therefore, I, the secretary of state of the said State of South Carolina, by virtue of the power in me vested by the acts of the General Assembly of the said State in such case made and provided, do hereby certify that the said John Bratton, at the election aforesaid, was duly elected Representative of the State of South Carolina from the fourth Congressional district thereof in the House of Representatives of the United States of America in the Forty-eighth Congress.

Given under my hand and the great seal of the State of South Carolina, in Columbia, this 5th day of December, in the year of our Lord 1884, and in the one hundred and ninth year of the Independence of the United States of America.

[SEAL.] JAMES S. LIPSCOMB,
Secretary of the State of South Carolina.

Mr. BRATTON appeared at the bar of the House, and was duly qualified by taking the oath prescribed by law.

MARCUS A. RENO.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to introduce a bill at this time.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the Chair will recognize gentlemen who were absent when their States were called for the introduction and reference of bills. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky (by request), introduced a bill (H. R. 7665) for the relief of Marcus A. Reno; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PRYOR. I ask unanimous consent for the purpose of taking from the Speaker's table and have referred at this time a Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is now recognizing gentlemen for the introduction of bills, but if there are no further bills to be introduced the Chair will submit the gentleman's motion to the House.

PUBLIC BUILDING, HUNTSVILLE, ALA.

Mr. PRYOR. There is a bill upon the Speaker's table (S. 505) for the erection of a public building at Huntsville, Ala., which I ask may be taken up and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

There was no objection, and the bill was taken up, read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

COMMITTEE-ROOMS.

Mr. WEMPLE. I offer the following resolution for present consideration:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be directed to inquire whether this House requires any more rooms for its committees, and, if so, where they can be procured, with leave to report to this House at any time.

There was no objection, and the resolution was received and adopted.

Mr. WEMPLE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INTERSTATE-COMMERCE INFORMATION.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask by unanimous consent to offer a resolution for present consideration in reference to printing a document.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the expert testimony taken by the Committee on Commerce and the arguments before that committee on the question of interstate commerce be printed for the use of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not object provided the resolution is introduced for reference to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I will suggest to the gentleman from Indiana, if he will withdraw his motion for reference for a moment——

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly, sir.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. The object of this resolution is simply to get at an early day—to-morrow if possible—the arguments and testimony submitted before the Committee on Commerce, so that members may have the information before them when they are called upon to vote upon the pending interstate-commerce bill. I know if the members of the House could have those arguments and that testimony before them they would enlighten those who have so far had no opportunity of seeing in print that testimony and those arguments presented to the Committee on Commerce. The members of that committee of course have had that advantage, and it is important that the other members of the House shall be equally favored by possessing all the information possible on this very important subject. The Committee on Commerce had a few copies printed for the use of that committee, and, I presume, as this debate goes, we regret we did not present a resolution to the House at the beginning asking for the printing of the testimony and arguments for general distribution to members of the House. Then each one would have had a copy before him and would be enabled to understand all phases of this interstate-commerce question.

The resolution is not introduced for the purpose of delay, but merely for the purpose of supplying information to members as the debate goes on and will go on. If my resolution be adopted, I have no doubt by to-morrow morning each member can have a copy of this very valuable document. I can not see why there should be any objection to its being printed. It consists of arguments and expert testimony, as I have already stated, the testimony of men who thoroughly understand the subject and arguments upon the various provisions of the bill and on the whole subject, in fact, generally. I ask the gentleman from Indiana to withdraw his objections, so that the resolution may come before the House for adoption.

Mr. REAGAN. The document referred to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania and which he asks to have printed is made up of arguments and testimony covering about three hundred pages of print. There were a considerable number of copies printed which have not yet, I believe, been distributed. The arguments and testimony are by lawyers and railroad officers who appeared before the Committee on Commerce.

The SPEAKER. There is nothing before the House, objection having been made to the introduction of the resolution.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I understand, Mr. Speaker, there were about fifty copies printed for the use of members of the Committee on Commerce. I was not aware that there were any of those copies left. I understood they were distributed long ago. They were not indeed sufficient, so far as I remember, to go around. The members were asked for copies in many instances when they were unable to supply them. If the resolution be allowed to come before the House for adoption it will inure to the benefit of the House.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania desire to have the resolution referred to the Committee on Printing?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. If I can not have the resolution come before the House in any other way, why I must consent to its introduction for reference to the Committee on Printing. I should prefer of course, however, to have the resolution submitted for adoption.

The SPEAKER. There is so much confusion in the House that it is almost impossible to hear what is going on.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that inasmuch as I do not understand the value of this paper, I will for the present withdraw my suggestion as to its reference to the Committee on Printing, and leave the matter to the gentleman from Texas, who knows not only the document referred to but the necessity for its further printing.

Mr. REAGAN. The document which is requested to be printed is a very large pamphlet, covering some three hundred pages of print, and composed of arguments made by counsel of certain railroads before the Committee on Commerce.

There were a large number of copies more than were needed. I believe copies remain undistributed in the committee-room, and if there are members desiring copies at this time I have no doubt they can get them by going to the committee-room.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I am sorry to say that the gentleman from Texas is mistaken as to there being any copies left over for distribution in the committee-room. My sole object in introducing the resolution is for the purpose of securing information for the members of the House while we are discussing this important subject of interstate commerce, which will be voted on in a few days. I know that I have not been able to get copies for those who desire them, and I should be glad by the adoption of the resolution to be the means of furnishing copies to those members who wish to act intelligently on the subject. I believe that the type still remains undistributed, and all the expense there would be would be for the paper and printing, so that if the resolution were adopted the information could be furnished by to-morrow or the day after.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. REAGAN. I do not wish to waste time further on this subject, and believing that sufficient numbers already have been printed and distributed, and that if any more were ordered they would not be read, I object to the introduction of the resolution.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the consideration of business coming from the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BARBOUR. As I understand the Chair states to the House at this time the business in order is that coming from the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the second and fourth Mondays of each month are set apart for the consideration of business reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BARBOUR. I have been requested by that committee to waive their claim for the consideration of their business to-day, as it is not sufficiently advanced, or rather there is not enough ready to take up the time of the House, but the committee will be ready on the fourth Monday, to go on regularly with their business.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. STEELE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STEELE. Is it not in order to call up the Mexican pension bill at this time?

The SPEAKER. The bill known as the Mexican pension bill is upon the Speaker's table, and can only be reached at the proper time by a motion to go to the business on that table.

Mr. STEELE. I was under the impression that it had been made a special order for the 26th.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. No; it was not. At the proper time, Mr. Speaker, I have intended to move to go to the business on the Speaker's table for the purpose of taking up that bill. For the present I have been waiting for the disposal of the interstate-commerce bill.

CENSUS BUREAU.

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask by unanimous consent to report back from the Select Committee on the Census joint resolution (H. Res. 289) authorizing the Superintendent of the Census to continue the work on the Tenth Census for action at the present time. I send the joint resolution to the Clerk's table to be read. It extends the Census Bureau, without further expense, until the 1st of July. It dies out on the 1st of January. No further appropriation is asked for.

Mr. McMILLIN. Is it intended to ask for an appropriation hereafter?

Mr. COX, of New York. If they do, it will be time then for decision on the matter. I do not ask for it.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That so much of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes," approved July 7, 1884, as provides that the Census Bureau shall be closed on January 1, 1885, be, and is hereby, repealed; and the Superintendent of the Census is authorized to continue the work of the Tenth Census until the further action of Congress: Provided, That in no case shall any expense be incurred under this resolution, either for salaries or other items, in excess of the balance of appropriations heretofore made for the work of the Tenth Census which shall remain unexpended on January 1, 1885.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York if this comes from any committee?

Mr. COX, of New York. I ask unanimous consent.

Mr. RANDALL. Let us understand what the fact is before unanimous consent is given.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the gentleman can make a statement subject to the right to object.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to ask whether there is any of the previous appropriation remaining over?

Mr. HOLMAN. About $15,000.

Mr. COX, of New York. I can make that clear so everybody can understand it if the Clerk will read a communication from the Superintendent of the Census. The Superintendent asked for a larger sum than the bureau got. They did not get enough by $45,000. They do not ask any more now. They ask that the balance now remaining of what the committee gave them at the last session be used until the 1st of July. No further appropriations are asked for now.

Mr. MILLS. Will any more be required?

Mr. COX, of New York. I shall not for myself or the committee. I do not ask for any more appropriation. That depends on the Committee on Appropriations, which are not in favor of giving any more.

Mr. RANDALL. The Committee on Appropriations recommended what was put into the law, and the bureau was to be discontinued after the 1st of January.

Mr. COX, of New York. Yes, the committee recommended the discontinuance of the bureau on the 1st of January, but they can not close up the business at that time, although they have money unexpended.

Mr. McMILLIN. How much?

Mr. COX, of New York. About $15,000 or $20,000.

Mr. RANDALL. The effect will be to repeal the law providing for the closing of the bureau, and continue it without limit.

Mr. COX, of New York. Without any further expense.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask the gentleman if he expects a bureau can be run by this Government without expense.

Mr. McMILLIN. If there is a plan for doing it it ought to be patented. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX, of New York. Gentlemen are facetious in advance of the facts. The money now remaining on hand is all they ask to run the bureau to the 1st of July next. I ask to have the statement of the Superintendent read.

Mr. RANDALL. Then the gentleman should ask that the money remaining on hand should be reappropriated and the bureau continued.

Mr. COX, of New York. I will do so.

Mr. MILLS. Let us facilitate the work of the Superintendent in finishing his report and make the appropriation he asks.

Mr. COX, of New York. I can not do that.

Mr. MILLS. I ask the House.

Mr. COX, of New York. That depends on the Appropriations Committee. I leave that to them.

Mr. MILLS. Here we are in the fourth year of the next decade, and that work has not yet been completed.

Mr. COX, of New York. This is for continuing the bureau. The gentleman inquires in relation to printing. The law which was passed is being executed. This is only to authorize the bureau to wind up its affairs upon the money already remaining unexpended and on hand.

Mr. MORRISON. Amend the bill, then, by providing for winding up the bureau when the money has been expended.

Mr. COX, of New York. I have no objection to doing that.

Mr. MILLS. That ought to be done.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania chairman of the Committee on Appropriations a question.

Mr. RANDALL. With pleasure.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if I did not understand him to say the Committee on Appropriations, after consideration, had provided in the law that this bureau should be discontinued on the 1st day of January?

Mr. RANDALL. They did, and both Houses approved of their action by passing the law. It seems, however, under the statement of the gentleman from New York, that the entire amount of money appropriated has not been expended, and as he proposes to amend the joint resolution it will provide for continuing the bureau and reappropriating the money now remaining unexpended.

Mr. McMILLIN. It would be unfortunate, of course, to stop the bureau before the money was expended. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and the joint resolution is before the House.

Mr. COX, of New York. I move to amend by adding to the resolution the following:

Provided, That the said bureau shall be closed with the expenditure of the money heretofore appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COX, of New York. I ask by unanimous consent that the letters of the Superintendent be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. COX, of New York. As to the matter of printing, ordered by this House by a separate law, in order that members may understand what progress is being made I ask to have printed the following:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, CENSUS OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., December 3, 1884.

SIR: With reference to the subject of your verbal inquiries made on Saturday last, I beg to say that the monographs of the Tenth Census, whose republication was ordered by Congress at its last session, are being prepared for printing as rapidly as the facilities of the Government Printing Office will permit. That matter is wholly in the hands of the Public Printer, whose usual energy and push are being brought to bear to secure its earliest publication.

By the same act as provided for the issue of a second edition of the several monographs it was ordered that a new edition of 25,000 copies of the Compendium be printed, all changes necessitated by errata in the former edition to be first made by the Superintendent of Census.

The Compendium was originally published under very high pressure, and went to the public without having received that careful revision which is essential for the prevention of errors in all statistical work, and for lack of which many corrections have been found necessary in preparing the copy of the Compendium for the second edition. Such corrections and changes required a force wholly incommensurate with our clerical and financial resources, the additional work of preparing these several reports having been thrown upon the office not only without any additional appropriation therefor, but upon the heels of a serious reduction in the amount asked for the current expenses of the office exclusive of the extra labor thus imposed.

We have therefore been unable to make as rapid progress as we had hoped with the work of republication in addition to the labor involved in the preparation and publication of several quarto volumes of new matter for the final report. But we shall make every effort to furnish the revised copy during the present month, so that the additional copies of the Compendium can be printed at an early day.

I take this opportunity of again calling your attention to the subject-matter of my communication of the 28th ultimo.

If early provision for the continuation of the work of the census is not made by Congress this office will be closed by operation of law January 1, 1885. By a joint resolution the limitation of time now enjoined on the office is removed, and without further appropriation the work of the office could be continued until Congress shall have had time to consider and determine whether the report shall be abandoned or a further sum of about $55,000 shall be appropriated to complete a work which has, it is true, cost some $5,000,000, but whose real value to the country could not be overstated in a much larger sum, if, indeed, its value could be stated in dollars at all.

If the report is to be abandoned January 1, 1885, some provision should at least be made for the disposal of the records looking to their preservation for future reference, and for attention to current and future correspondence, which must otherwise be neglected.

Very respectfully,

C. W. SEATON,
Superintendent of Census.

Hon. S. S. COX, M. C.,
House of Representatives.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, CENSUS OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., November 28, 1884.

DEAR MR. COX: As I understand the provision of law relating to this office which is contained in the sundry civil bill approved July 7, 1884, all work on the Tenth Census must cease January 1, 1885, unless in the mean time further legislation shall extend the time for the completion of our work, and this without regard to any balance of appropriation for the work which may then remain unexpended.

You will remember that I asked an appropriation of the sum of $75,000 for the completion of the report on the Tenth Census, to be expended within the current fiscal year. Congress appropriated $30,000 only, and provided that the office should be closed January 1, 1885. This action necessitated an immediate reduction of our clerical force as constituted at the date of the passage of that legislation, and a consequent postponement of the date at which the completion of our work was possible. Even with the continued services of all employés on our roll July 1, 1884, it would have been impossible to complete the report by the 1st of January proximo. The large reduction of force, made imperative by the insufficient appropriation, has still further delayed us. I have therefore already submitted to the Secretary of the Interior a request that he will ask the further sum of $55,000, of which $45,000 shall be available for the completion of all compilations and other original matter for the report during the present fiscal year, and $10,000 to be used after July 1, 1886, in such work of proof-reading, revision, &c., as may be required in this office in conjunction with the office of the Public Printer while the remaining volumes are going through the press.

It is not likely, I presume, that any Congressional action can be had on this request before January 1, 1885, at which date we shall be compelled to suspend work and close the office, unless some provision is made for continuance; and I write now to inquire whether it would, in your judgment, be advisable to submit to Congress a joint resolution giving authority to the Superintendent of Census to continue the work of this office without further appropriation from January 1, 1885, for such time only as may suffice to exhaust the unexpended balance of appropriations heretofore made, or until Congress shall, by subsequent action, make further provision for the work. On the 1st of January, 1885, there will remain a small unexpended balance of appropriation for this office. The reason for the non-exhaustion of the entire appropriation is as follows: In July last, when the appropriation of $30,000 was made, the current expenses of this office were larger than the above sum of appropriation would justify, and a consequent reduction of our force was made, by transfer principally to other bureaus. But the apparent or seeming disposition on the part of Congress to close this office and leave the report on the Tenth Census unfinished alarmed our remaining clerical force, many of whom sought and obtained transfers to other and more permanent bureaus, thus depleting us to a point even lower than would have been required by the condition of our appropriation. A sufficient force remained, however, to co-operate with the Public Printer in pushing through the press such volumes as could be printed, and it was not deemed advisable to employ any further force than was necessary for this purpose until further action of Congress could be had with relation to the unfinished compilations. We shall therefore have on January 1 an unexpended balance sufficient to continue our present minimum force for perhaps forty or fifty days after that date, provided the consent of Congress can be obtained. In this way we can get through the press much matter for the report now complete in manuscripts, and in the mean time we should hope that Congress will not suffer the remainder of this magnificent report to be lost to the public for lack of the small concluding appropriation already asked at its hands.

I inclose a rough draught of a joint resolution for your consideration, with the request that it or a similar one may be submitted in the House immediately on its reassembling, if such action is not inconsistent with your own views.

Very truly, yours,

GEO. W. RICHARDS,
Acting Superintendent.

Hon. S. S. COX, No. 1 Du Pont Circle.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, CENSUS OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., November 13, 1884.

SIR: I have the honor to submit the following report of the operations of this office during the past year. At the date of the last annual report of the Superintendent of Census, September 15, 1883, there had been published only the Compendium of the Tenth Census, consisting of two octavo volumes of 923 and 856 pages, respectively. During the year which has since elapsed the following numbered volumes of quarto size have been published:

Vol.	Subject.	Pages.
1	Population	1,050
2	Statistics of Manufactures	1,248
3	Statistics of Agriculture	1,149
4	Agencies of Transportation	869
5	Cotton Culture in the United States	924
6	Cotton Culture in the United States	848
7	Valuation, Taxation, and Public Indebtedness	919
8	Miscellaneous volume, containing four reports, namely:
	On Newspapers and Periodicals	1,111
	On Alaska, its Resources, &c.
	On the Alaskan Fur-seal Islands
	On Ship-Building

Volume 9, a quarto of 620 pages, devoted to the statistics of forestry and the lumbering interests of the country, and supplemented with a portfolio of maps, showing the distribution of the forests in the several States, will be published in the month of November. It is now in the hands of the Public Printer, and all printed except the [illegible], which is being rapidly prepared.

Volume 10, a quarto of 868 pages, will contain the following-named monographs: (1) Quarry[illegible]uilding Stones; (2) Petroleum; (3) Coke. This volume is stereotyped, and the [illegible]e edition has been printed. It only awaits the receipt of a few illustrations before being bound and published. It will doubtless appear simultaneously with or immediately after the issuance of volume 9.

The little work remaining to be done by special agents is as follows:

The text of the report on the defective, dependent, and delinquent classes of the population is being prepared by Mr. F. H. Wines. A like labor is being performed by Surg. J. S. Billings on the mortality of the population. Mr. J. R. Dodge is similarly engaged on the report relating to sheep-husbandry, and an introductory chapter to the report on the production of the precious metals is being prepared by Mr. Clarence King. This latter report, which will be comprised in two volumes, is otherwise ready for the printing-presses, having been put in type and stereotyped some months ago.

The report of Surg. J. S. Billings on the mortality of the population has in the main been stereotyped, a few small tables, the introductory text, and the index only remaining incomplete. The two volumes containing this report can readily follow the publication of the volumes devoted to the report on the precious metals.

The report by Professor Raphael Pumpelly on the production of minor and base minerals lacks only the introductory text before being placed in the hands of the Public Printer for publication.

The manuscript of the several monographs, constituting a report on the water-power of the country, is all in hand, with illustrations, and ready in turn for the printer.

The report on the fisheries of the United States, by Professor G. Brown Goode, is also complete and in hand, as is also the report on the social statistics of cities, by Col. George E. Waring, jr.

A monograph by Professor F. R. Hutton on the manufacture of shop and machine tools, vividly illustrated, has been stereotyped and is at the Government Printing Office ready for publication. It will form part of a volume devoted to the statistics and history of the manufacture of mechanical contrivances. The remainder of the matter for this volume is also in hand, and only requires arrangement for the printer.

A report by Special Agent J. D. Weeks on wages paid in manufacturing industries in the United States is substantially completed.

The publication of this paper has already been ordered by the House of Representatives to be issued as a miscellaneous House document. It will, therefore, first be given to the public in this form.

A volume devoted to the statistics of fire and of life insurance will form part of the final report. The manuscript is in hand, and only requires arrangement for the printer.

Statistics relating to the manufacture of gas are complete and await publication. A report on the ice crop and its consumption is also finished.

With the exceptions heretofore noted the only unfinished work in the preparation of our report relates to the tabulation of statistics of schools, churches, and libraries. These completed, the entire force would be employed in revision, proof-reading, &c., necessary, in co-operation with the Public Printer, while the several volumes are going through the press. Estimates of the amount required to bring the complete report to publication have already been submitted. By the terms of the act of July 7, 1884, making appropriations for sundry civil expenses, it was provided that the sum of $30,000 should be appropriated "for the work of taking the Tenth Census and closing the bureau on January 1, 1885." Even with the retention of the entire force employed at the date of the passage of this bill it would have been impossible to complete the final report within the limitation of time therein prescribed; but the inadequate sum appropriated necessitated a heavy reduction in our clerical force, and has thereby correspondingly delayed the work of the office.

Furthermore, the same act authorized the printing of additional copies of the Compendium of the Tenth Census and of various monographs, thus devolving upon the Superintendent and his already crippled force a serious burden of extra labor, which was not considered in fixing the limitation of time and of appropriation prescribed by this act.

I have, therefore, the honor to request that a recommendation may be submitted to Congress that the time for the completion of all tabulations and the preparation of all original matter for the final report on the Tenth Census be extended until July 1, 1885; that the additional sum of $45,000 already submitted in estimate for a deficiency in the present fiscal year be appropriated, and that the further appropriation of $10,000 be made for the expenses of such force as shall be required in this office during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, for revision, proof-reading, &c., in co-operation with the office of the Public Printer, while the remaining volumes of the report are being published.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

C. W. SEATON,
Superintendent of Census.

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, D. C.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COX, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BENJAMIN F. FOX.

Mr. SPRINGER introduced a bill (H. R. 7666) for the relief of Benjamin F. Fox; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

LORENZO DURHAM.

Mr. SPRINGER also introduced a bill (H. R. 7667) for the relief of Lorenzo Durham; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

VENEZUELA AWARD.

Mr. SPRINGER submitted the following resolution of inquiry; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

Whereas on the 19th day of April last past there was reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and passed by this House, a resolution of which the following is a copy:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of State be requested to furnish this House with a copy of the list of certificates issued by the late Venezuelan mixed commission, together with copies of all assignments or transfers of such certificates notified to the Department of State, and a statement showing to whom the several payments by the Department upon such certificates have been made; and also copies of all correspondence relating to requests for payments thereupon, or in respect to the hearing of all claimants before a new commission; and as by the joint resolution approved by the President on the 3d day of March, 1883, the moneys paid by the Venezuelan Government, and remaining in the hands of the Secretary of State and to be applied on such awards as may be made by the new commission provided for by said joint resolution, the Secretary of State is requested to furnish this House with a statement of the amount now on hand applicable to the payment of such new awards;" and

Whereas the request contained in said resolution has not been complied with, nor any communication whatever made to this House by the Secretary of State in respect to the same,

Be it resolved, That the attention of the Secretary of State be called to said resolution, and that he be again requested to furnish the House of Representatives with the information called for therein, and also to state the cause of the delay in complying with the request of the House.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the further consideration of the interstate-commerce bill.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, by order of the House at the last session the contested-election case growing out of the election of Mr. SKINNER, from the State of North Carolina, was postponed until this day, but the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RANNEY] who has in charge the views of the minority is absent from his seat, and I am reluctant to proceed with the case in his absence. I will, therefore, submit to the order of business which the Chair has announced, and will endeavor to call up the election case at a later period.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. REAGAN. Before proceeding with the consideration of the pending measure I desire to modify the motion that I made to amend, so as to provide for striking out all after the enacting clause of the committee's bill from the first to the seventh section inclusive, and inserting the provisions of the substitute bill for those sections.

The SPEAKER. There having been no vote taken upon the gentleman's motion, he has the right to withdraw or modify it. The Chair would suggest that it had better, perhaps, be withdrawn and modified as he now contemplates.

Mr. REAGAN. The only modification is to substitute the provisions of the substitute for the seven sections which precede that portion of the committee's bill providing for the creation of a commission, instead of for the whole bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman, then, does not desire to offer the substitute for the entire bill?

Mr. REAGAN. No, sir; only for the first seven sections of that bill.

The SPEAKER. It will be so modified.

Mr. FINDLAY. Mr. Speaker, I am neither a friend nor an enemy of railroad corporations. While as a rule I believe they have been instruments of great good in facilitating and cheapening transportation, I have also knowledge of some conspicuous instances and shrewdly suspect the existence of others where they have abused the great powers intrusted to them. I have no disposition, therefore, either to praise Cæsar or to bury him. The questions which concern us in the measures now pending before the House are principally two: first, the right to legislate at all upon the subject; and, second, conceding the right, the proper scope and limitations of such legislation.

It has not been disputed, nor do I believe that a respectable argument can be made, that the functions of these bodies are not in some sense and to some degree fit subjects for public scrutiny and control.

This is a postulate which has been assumed in all the discussion which has taken place upon these bills, and I shall not therefore enlarge upon the proposition that quasi-public agencies affected with what the courts denominate a public employment can not in the nature of things emancipate themselves from public responsibility. The cognate question as to how far regulations of this kind fall within what is called the commercial clause of the Constitution seems also to be settled, and I shall therefore not attempt to enter upon that inviting field of discussion. The only remaining question, then, is how far ought this plain constitutional right be exerted; and that is a question to be solved by the extent and nature of the wrong which we propose to remedy.

It is absolutely necessary to have a clear perception of the grievance itself before we set about to devise the means to abate or remove it, for otherwise we run the risk, too common in legislation, of waging a profitless warfare against imaginary evils. What, then, is the just cause of complaint which has aroused public opinion upon this subject and which demands relief at our hands? It is simply this, that the rule of equality, which constitutes the bond of the social compact itself, has been systematically and persistently violated by some of the transporting agencies of the country in the bestowal of discriminating favors in behalf of one shipper against another.

It is not, as I understand the case, that these carriers charge more for a long haul than for a short haul or more for one service than another, but that for the same or similar service one man is made to pay more than his neighbor, engaged in the same and perhaps a rival line of business. It is perfectly obvious that the circumstances and conditions of traffic between given points may be such that the enforcement of a uniform tariff of rates would be fatal to the existence of the carrier. Take the familiar instance of two competing railroads which terminate at both ends in populous centers, but, reaching these by different routes, pass on the way intermediate points of shipment of varying degrees of commercial importance, both relatively and absolutely.

The proposition contended for by those who are disposed to take an extreme view of this subject is that a uniform rate per mile shall be prescribed for the carriage of goods between the termini themselves of these competing lines and between the termini and any intermediate station, as well as between stations along the route going and returning. That I understand to be the effect of the provision that there shall be no greater charge proportionately for a haul of a thousand miles or any fractional part of the distance.

This is an unreasonable requirement, because it ignores some of the most obvious considerations which control the movement of freights, and confounds two distinct classes of business, the through and the local, each subject to peculiar conditions, which the carrier is bound to respect or fail. In one case there is a fierce competition, coupled with the necessity of making long contracts based upon an uncertain, capricious, treacherous rivalry, but with no certainty that such contracts after they are made will be or can be faithfully observed without ruinous loss, as the observance of them depends not merely upon the good faith of the contracting parties, but also upon the contingent rapacity which, at an opportune moment for injuring a competitor in business, may seize the rival line. There are other differences, growing out of the return cargo and the intimate connection that may exist between it and the ingoing freight, which distinguish a through from a mere way service, and make it simply impossible to prescribe a proportionately uniform rate of carriage for each.

But the intermediate points of shipment scattered along these competing lines differ in commercial value to the carrier not only with the termini but also with themselves, and to say that these differences are not to be taken into account in determining the law is simply to assert that it would be wise to make laws without regard to the facts of the case. These differences may be further enhanced by the fact of local competitions between the through line and other roads which only cover a part of the distance between the principal termini or may touch at local points on the through line without leading from the termini at all, and this difficulty may be still further complicated by the necessity for making provision for a constantly varying volume of interdependent outgoing and incoming business.

Let me offer an illustration of what I mean. It will be a humble one, and will have none of those sacred associations to commend it in the use of which my distinguished friend from Massachusetts, in his masterly speech on Wednesday last, invested railroads with a new interest, although he left Jericho and Jerusalem, hitherto happy with a string of pack mules, in very doubtful company. My honorable friend Judge REAGAN, who has this matter so much at heart and who deserves the thanks of the country for his arduous, intelligent, and responsible labors in this behalf, hails, I believe, from Palestine, and it was just like my honorable friend from Massachusetts, whose kindness and courtesy are such marked features of his character, after giving the judge's bill a merciless overhauling, to restore the equilibrium and make him happy again by a thoughtful reference to these two central figures in the history of Palestine—Jericho and Jerusalem. It was a delicate compliment.

I shall not go so far afield for my illustration, but begin nearer, I may say right at home, upon the principle that the waters of Abana and Pharpar (I do not like to hurt the judge's feelings) are better than all the waters of Judea, the Jordan included. If anybody will take the trouble to observe, he will see between the Avenue and the Baltimore and Potomac depot, at the corner of Sixth and B streets, three apple and peanut stands, not the oriental kiosk with which New York proposes to adorn her streets, but the original, primitive, severely simple stand of the fakir, where the merchant stands himself and his wares rest in a basket or movable tray on the pavement. I will designate these merchants as numbers 1, 2, and 3, respectively, and locate number 1 at the corner of B and Sixth streets, at the entrance of the depot; number 2 on the opposite corner, made by the intersection of B with Sixth street, and number 3 at the corner of Sixth street and the Avenue.

Now, a priori, any person with an eye to business would say at once that the intermediate man, located midway between two giants in business, one intercepting all the through trade up and down the Avenue as well as the small inflow toward the depot, and the other catching in his big net all the custom from the depot outward to the Avenue, would, as between these contending forces, fare very badly on the purely local custom—the crumbs, as it were—from this lordly table, which might be scattered at his feet, faventes auræ, from the direction of B street; nor would this conclusion be incorrect, for on examination it would be discovered that the terminal merchants, so to speak, had a better stock, more of it, a higher grade of storage device, though short of a kiosk and all the other unfailing signs of a prosperous trade, than the poor monopoly-ridden intermediary, who could only boast of a peck-measure basket, with its scant contents, like Captain Jackson's feasts, arranged more for the imagination than consumption. Now, I would like to know whether there is any law of our devising which can supersede, modify, or repeal this dominant law of condition and reverse the positions of these merchants, from a commercial point of view, without at the same time compelling a change of stands, and with it of course a change of condition.

I might extend the scope of the illustrations still further, and show that one of these merchants, and that one, too, having the advantage of position, might have the additional endowment of keener insight, superior energy, more persistent endurance, than he of the simple basket and humble store, and then repeat the question, whether it lies in our power to establish an equilibrium of forces when nature herself depresses the scale and destroys the balance?

I have not been altogether vainly wanton or eccentric in the selection of this homely illustration, for be assured that if this force, which I call the law of condition, is so universal and inexorable in its sweep that not even the humblest relations involving the simplest combinations can escape, then those higher and more complex adjustments with which we are now concerned must submit to the same imperious sway. The result of it all is, that there are inequalities created and continued by force of natural law which no legislation can change or destroy.

But what are these inequalities? Some are congenital, some acquired, and some accidental, and for all such there is no help. In the utter hopelessness of the case we mutter between our teeth, "God help them," or, with a deeper charity and a more genuine submission to His will, put our hands in our pockets and do what we can. But there is another class of inequalities entirely within the reach of remedial legislation, and which it is not only our right but our duty to remedy. They are such as do not spring from natural defects or from the automatic operation of natural law, but are forced into being by the rapacious greed of man, in the abuse of power conferred as a public trust, and yet treated as a private possession to be dealt with as the holder pleases.

The difficulty lies in the failure to distinguish between a mere private faculty, which its owner may exert to the utmost for his profit and advantage, and a public franchise which is held by title of popular will, and which is to be enjoyed not merely for the profit of the holder, but for the mutual advantage of both the grantor and the grantee. Let me recur again to my humble parable of the applemen. Each one of these merchants sells his wares by the same title that he enjoys the liberty of locomotion or any mere personal right. He is under no obligation to his fellow-merchants as to his hours of business, the character of his goods, the schedule of prices, or any other thing.

It is possible this great city may charge him a license for the privilege of selling on the street, but outside of this and a few perquisitial peanuts to the vigilant policeman on the beat for keeping a sharp eye on some predatory boot-black, he is as free to carry on an unrestricted commerce, without regard to the interest, the feelings, wishes, prejudices, or tastes of his rival, as he is to go to market or to church. Not so with the corporation operating a railroad. It has no natural, original, underived powers. It is the creature of the State, and can enjoy just such franchises and perform just such offices and in the mode and manner prescribed for their performance as the State may allow, and no more and in no other way.

It is affected with a public duty and is invested with one of the sovereign functions of the State for the purposes of acquiring the necessary ground for its road-bed, stations, and other purposes. It takes the place of the State in the ownership of the highway, and, in my judgment, is to be charged with the same general responsibility toward shippers using this highway, either in rolling-stock provided by themselves or the corporation, precisely as if the State itself was the owner of the highway.

If this is a sound proposition it will help to classify the subject very much. It will be clear that the first rule governing freight charges which a State operating a railroad would be bound to prescribe must, in the nature of things, be based upon absolute equality between shippers of the same general class, and relative or comparative equality between all others. Discrimination by the State in favor of one of its citizens shipping over the road and against another would be tolerated just so long as it would take to reap in legislation the fruits of an aroused and indignant public opinion. The injustice of such a discrimination would be so patent, and the dangerous consequences to flow from it so serious, that the wrong would provide its own remedy.

To those who are familiar with the genesis of railroads both in this country and in Great Britain it is well known that the original design of these structures was to carry freights on trucks owned by the shipper as well as by the railway company, and in the earlier stages of railroad development it was quite common to witness this joint use of the tracks by foreign in common with proprietary owners. The difficulties, however, of this joint occupation and divided dominion became rapidly apparent, and in a very short time, both in the United States and in Great Britain, the railway companies were charged with the full responsibility for the management of their lines, and in consequence were permitted to exercise exclusive control over the road-bed and all its appurtenant equipment. But the fact that such joint ownership of the right of way existed clearly shows the public character of the railway function and upon what equal terms all customers were required to be received. Equality, therefore, is at the base of the duty which these semi-public agencies owe to the public, and any systematic violation of this duty is in its nature radical and fundamental.

The railway company, substituted in part for the State, performing a vicarious service for the State, and in order to enable it to perform this service invested by the State with the sovereign right of eminent domain, can no more lawfully establish unequal rates between the same classes of shippers and for the same or similar services than the State itself could if it had not transferred this power and was operating the railroad itself. I do not care to repeat what I have already said upon the subject of relative and absolute equality; but as this question has been repeatedly before the courts both here and in England, it may be just as well while I am laying down general principles and before I come to the discussion of the provisions of the bill to refer to one or two of these cases.

In a leading English case, construing what was an undue or unreasonable preference or advantage under the English railway and canal traffic act, 17 and 18 Victoria, the court held that the interests of the railway as well as the interests of the shippers were to be taken into account, and enforced an injunction to enjoin the railway company to desist from giving special rates upon the distinct ground that the cost of the service and the volume of business which one shipper could bring as against another were both to be considered in determining whether a rate was reasonable or not. (In re Ransome and another vs. The Eastern Counties Railway Company, 3 Jurist, N. S., page 217.)

Relief, however, was granted to the complainant as to that part of his bill which prayed for an injunction requiring the company to desist from giving an undue preference to other shippers and to carry the freight of the complainant on equal terms with others, having due regard to the circumstances of each case. (Ibid, page 219.)

So in a leading case in this country it has been held that while the charge must be reasonable, yet it may vary in amount according to circumstances, without being, therefore, necessarily unreasonable. If reasonable, it may, though unequal, be unobjectionable, but in general equality is the standard of both reasonableness and impartiality. Equality, however, is a relative term, and is to be distinguished from simple ratable equality, to be regulated by weight or bulk, and, I may add, or by other considerations affecting the volume of the business and the cost of the service. (See Cambless vs. the P. & R. R. R., 4 Brewster, page 563.)

Such, then, is the construction of what is reasonable and what constitutes undue preference by the courts. It is not that A gets a different rate from B, or that the rate charged to one is relatively lower than the rate charged to the other, but upon the ground of absolute inequality and partiality between shippers who stand upon an equal, or proximately equal, footing of commercial value to the carrier, that the courts can be prevailed upon to interfere. Let me illustrate this still further by a case which has been tried within the last month in one of our courts against a prominent and powerful railroad corporation.

The plaintiffs in this case were wholesale grocers, and on the 24th of January, 1879, agreed to give all their New York freights to the defendant for one year, to date from the 1st of January. The company, through its Baltimore agent, agreed to carry these freights at as low a rate as it was then charging, or would thereafter charge, any Baltimore house engaged in the same line of business during the existence of the proposed contract. The rate for sugar was then fixed at 12 cents on the hundred pounds, and the representation was made by the agent of the company that this was the lowest rate it was then charging other wholesale grocers in Baltimore or would charge them while this contract continued with the plaintiffs. The contract was renewed for the year 1880, and the conditions of it on the part of the plaintiffs faithfully observed. About the close of the year 1880 the plaintiffs discovered that prior to the 24th of January, 1879, the date of the first contract and continuously since to the date of the discovery, the defendant had been carrying sugar for another house from New York to Baltimore at the rate of 10 cents on the hundred pounds. During this period the company had carried for the plaintiffs 5,011,875 pounds of sugar.

An action on the case for the deceit was then brought by the plaintiffs, in which the above facts were set forth and the allegation distinctly made that the plaintiffs were induced to enter into the said contracts by the false and fraudulent representations of the defendant; that the plaintiffs' business, owing to the closeness of competition and the narrow margin of profit realized on sugar, had been seriously impaired, and that this injury had further been increased by the ignorance of this discriminating rate in favor of a rival house in which the plaintiffs had been kept by the fraudulent conduct of the defendant.

At the trial of the case the proof was clear and specific that the representation was not only false, but that the defendant knew it was so. The plaintiffs in this state of case contended that the jury in making their allowance for damages should not be restricted to the mere difference of 2 cents on the hundred pounds, but should allow punitive damages for the fraud which had been committed and compensate the plaintiffs for injury to business. This instruction, however, the court refused; and, after instructing the jury that in order to find for the plaintiffs they must first believe from the evidence that the representation was both false and fraudulent, confined them to the allowance of mere damages for the breach of the contract; that is, 2 cents on the hundred on the 5,011,875 pounds of sugar carried. The jury found for the plaintiffs this sum with interest.

Here, then, is a case where the jury have found from the evidence that a public carrier has practiced a deliberate and most injurious cheat upon a shipper; the shipper has waived the contract, and brought his action in tort for the deceit, the breach of the contract being a part only and a small part of his injury, and yet is no better off nor the company any worse than if the action had been grounded on the con tract alone. The plaintiffs contended that this was an invitation to the transportation lines of the country to commit what frauds they pleased, as the only penalty they would suffer if caught would be the payment of the mere difference between discriminating rates.

As deriving these franchises from the public and as affected by a public employment, it was contended that the same principles of public policy which hold railroad companies to the strictest care and courtesy in the carriage of passengers and visited them with heavy exemplary damages for even very slight breaches of duty should be prescribed in enforcing the obligations which these corporations owe to the shippers of freights; that, in fact, considering the ease with which frauds of this kind could be practiced and the difficulty of detecting them, there was greater reason to hold these companies to a stricter line of duty in the carriage of freights than of passengers, and that unless the courts of the country took high ground with reference to these questions the business of every man would be at the mercy of the railroads.

Mr. HORR. Has that point been decided?

Mr. FINDLAY. Yes, sir; it is a case that I tried myself.

Mr. HORR. But has it been decided by a court of last resort?

Mr. FINDLAY. No, sir; by the court below.

Mr. HORR. You do not believe it is good law?

Mr. FINDLAY. And let me say in passing, in reply to the suggestion of the gentleman from Michigan, that the judge who sat upon the bench in that case was an upright, fearless, and conscientious man as well as a learned jurist, and he could not find sufficient authority to justify him in granting the instruction asked, although I believe he was sorry for it, and was forced to say that such wrongs must be remedied by the Legislature where we are now.

I allude to this case for two reasons: first, because it illustrates the nature and kind of inequality of which I have been speaking, and also because it has a direct connection with some of the provisions of these bills which I now propose to discuss. To make the case perfectly intelligible, however, I should state in addition that the nominal, the schedule rate was 20 cents on the hundred pounds, and the discrimination was effected by a rebate in the one case of 8 cents and in the other of 10 cents on the hundred, making the actual charge 12 and 10 cents, respectively.

The second section of the Reagan substitute provides that there shall be no rebates of any kind whatsoever allowed, and the third section of the committee's bill contents itself with a prohibition against discriminating rebates. One prohibits them altogether; the other, recognizing the rule of equality, which I have attempted to show is the only rule applicable to the case, allows them, but requires that they shall be impartially bestowed. Just as original rates are to be reasonable, as required by the first section of both bills, and as the common law itself, independently of statute, requires, and to be reasonable of course must be relatively equal, so if exigencies arise when the contrivance of rebate can be brought into useful and harmless requisition, the principle of equality, which is all that can be justly demanded, shall be rigidly enforced. It seems to me that in this respect the provision of the committee's bill has been cast in a wiser and more practical mold than the provision of the substitute bill.

It may be argued with great force that the recognition of the system of rebates is an evil in itself, and that the only possible way to get rid of it is to prohibit it altogether. But experience seems to have confirmed this as a necessary commercial contrivance; and recognizing experience as my only guide in legislation, I think we had better regulate the use of the contrivance than attempt to abolish it altogether. And, besides, our ability to regulate may be conceded when our power to prohibit may be very well doubted, and I believe it to be a wise course in legislation to do what we can, not what we would.

The bill of the committee differs from the substitute in another important particular, and that is in providing for the appointment of a commission, the most important duty of which will be the prosecution of those companies for breaches of the law through the agency of the courts and with the aid of the public prosecutor. This I regard as the most valuable provision in the bill. The honorable gentleman from Kansas fell into an error the other day in discussing the bill when he stated that it was necessary in order to institute a prosecution by the commission for the party aggrieved to have his petition certified to by the district attorney or somebody of official or semi-official authority. Anybody may complain to the commission; and the commission may entertain the complaint and prosecute it to judgment. Whenever the complaint comes up officially certified to as above indicated, then in that case the duty of the commission to prosecute ceases to be discretionary and becomes compulsory. This is just what is needed.

Mr. REAGAN. Let me interrupt the gentleman from Maryland to ask if he means that that would give any actual or positive remedy to the injured party?

Mr. FINDLAY. I see no reason why it would not.

Mr. REAGAN. If the gentleman will read the provisions of the bill carefully he will see that it gives no actual remedy, but simply prosecutes the complaint to an inquiry.

Mr. FINDLAY. But I understand the commission is back of the United States district attorney in this matter.

Mr. REAGAN. But the district attorney can not give a remedy to the citizen who is aggrieved. The commission may involve the citizen in the costs of a suit if he fails to get a general principle established for the benefit of the public; but neither the commission nor the district attorney can give any judgment that amounts to a remedy for the wrong complained of.

Mr. FINDLAY. I do not so understand the scope of the bill. On the contrary, I understand that a remedy is provided by the bill.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman will find that he is incorrect.

Mr. FINDLAY. I have read carefully the provisions of the bill and they do not strike me as the gentleman from Texas seems to have understood them.

Mr. REAGAN. I would invite the attention of the House to it.

Mr. FINDLAY. I am unfortunate in having left my bills at home, but will not now pause in my argument to answer the objection of the gentleman from Texas further than by saying that I have read both of these bills very carefully, that reported by the committee and the substitute of my honorable friend from Texas, and the best construction I can give to the measure does not lead me to any such conclusion as he has reached.

I want to illustrate what I think would be the probable effect of some of these provisions. The ordinary litigant is powerless to cope with the organized machinery of these corporations, which generally manage to starve out a successful suitor in the lower courts by the interminable delays of appellate procedure; few men, too, are willing to incur the displeasure of an agency which can work him serious injury by corrupt and secret means difficult to detect and harder still to adequately punish.

But with a commission behind his back and with the organized machinery of the United States courts to carry on his suit he will be neither starved nor terrorized out of his rights. This provision has my most cordial support, and the want of it I regard as a very serious defect in the proposed substitute. But the substitute contains a provision in regard to the measure of damages which I think is more just than the committee's bill, which simply allows, in addition to the damages for the breach of contract, costs, expenses, and disbursements for counsel fees. When the violation of the contract has been willful, I think it would be much more just to allow, as Mr. REAGAN proposes, a sum equal to three times the amount of the damage sustained; and for this reason: the damage in these cases of secret discrimination is not merely the difference between rates, but it goes deeper than that, and does an injury of a subtle character difficult of analysis, and under the rules of evidence still more difficult of a specific pecuniary computation.

In the Baltimore case which I have cited there was complaint that the plaintiffs' business had been injured, and the plaintiffs offered to show that a difference of 2 cents on the hundred pounds of sugar was not only a considerable loss of profit in such transactions, but that a competitor in business enjoying this discriminating rate would gradually absorb the business and drive his rivals out of the market. But the court held that this evidence was too remote, and refused the offer. Now, suppose that this discriminating rate had been lower still, it is a matter of demonstration that the business of the plaintiffs might have been utterly destroyed, and yet under the rule of damage laid down all that they could recover would be the actual difference between rates. Again, systematic discrimination of this sort is necessarily a corrupt act. It is not bestowed without some corresponding advantage to the donor.

It would seem in such a case there would be justifiable cause for the infliction of vindicatory damages, through the medium of which the plaintiff might be compensated for such injuries as the rules of evidence prevented him from proving. This, in my opinion, is the true philosophy of exemplary or punitive damages, and the only ground upon which these allowances can be defended. They are not allowed merely to punish the defendant, but to compensate the plaintiff for such losses as are not legally reducible to some specific money value. But the court in the case to which I have referred restricted the jury to the actual pecuniary loss suffered by the plaintiffs and refused to allow smart money. Now, then, assume that the Reagan proposition had been law when this cause of action accrued and the plaintiffs could have availed themselves of the triple damage clause, is there a man who now hears me who doubts for a moment that the infliction of damages in this amount would have promoted justice, not merely of a semi-penal character, but absolute compensatory justice, in the reparation of a wrong which was only half righted by the simple allowance for breach of contract?

In this age of rapid exchanges it should be the policy of the law to encourage the most absolute good faith in the levying of freight charges. The common carriers are partners in every business carried on by men. They take a part of everything that is made or grown. This profit is exacted before the article is ready for use or consumption.

The freight, therefore, is an item of original cost. It makes no difference whether you pay a few more cents for an article or whether they are taxed to you in the carrier's bill; the result is the same. To permit a carrier, therefore, to secretly establish unequal rates is in effect to give it control of the business of the country. But this secret inequality corrupts the beneficiary also. It makes him the subservient instrument of the carrier and degrades him from his position as a freeman into the pliant tool of a corporation. In this way the corporation becomes mightier than the state; the creature is exalted above and defies the creator. As the area of state citizenship narrows and the field of corporate brotherhood expands the state necessarily weakens, and it is a mere matter of time before it will fall from sheer exhaustion. But the recipient of these favors is corrupted in another way. Humility and equality go together; they are republican virtues and a democracy can not survive without them. A special privilege for the person or a diminished rate for goods inflates the beneficiary with false pride and forces him into invidious comparisons with his less favored neighbor.

But consider the effect of this partiality upon the corporation itself. It is not unreasonable to presume that these favors are granted without consideration. It is not in the usual course of business to be the medium of a gratuitous bounty in the advantages of which the donor, in some form or other, does not contrive to share. All the reasons and all the analogies of the case point to a division of the spoil or a corrupt participation in the advantage. Is it not a monstrous phenomenon of our modern business life that a corporation owing all its franchises and its very existence to the public should be permitted to systematically rob a part of the public in order to enrich another part by enriching itself? Consider, too, the subtle character of this offense—how difficult it must be to detect, when the motive for concealment, both in the donor and the beneficiary, is so strong that exposure seldom comes, except as the result of accident—and I think, putting all these considerations together, I have made out a case for which even the allowance of triple damages falls short of a just compensation for the public and private wrong involved in discriminations of this character. For these reasons I shall give my hearty support to that feature of Judge REAGAN'S substitute bill, and I hope that it may be offered in some shape as an amendment to the committee's bill so that I can also give it my vote.

With this exception, however, I am constrained to say that the bill of the committee commends itself to my judgment as a wiser and more practical measure in every respect. The first section of the committee's bill provides that the charge shall be reasonable. The substitute contains this requirement also, but nullifies it, in my opinion, by the prohibition contained in the fifth section against making a greater charge for a shorter than a longer distance. The conditions of through and local business, I have attempted to show, are essentially different; and, if so, an inflexible requirement that the rate per mile should be the same for each would, so far from producing a reasonable scale of charges, result in the establishment not only of an irrational but an impossible one.

Mr. REAGAN. Do I understand the gentleman from Maryland to maintain that the provisions of the substitute provide for any rate per mile?

Mr. FINDLAY. As I understand the provisions of the proposed substitute, it is contemplated that there shall be the same rate per mile for short as for long distances.

Mr. REAGAN. That is not contemplated by the substitute. On the contrary, I have labored time and again to demonstrate to this House that that was not the case. The substitute provides simply that there shall not be more charged for a given amount or quantity of freight for a shorter than for a longer distance—no more for a car-load, for instance, for one hundred miles than for five hundred miles.

Mr. FINDLAY. I am sorry that I have misapprehended my friend upon that point, but I do not construe that as the practical effect of his bill. It may be so.

If freight is a part of original cost, then it must be apparent that shippers as between themselves and in competition with persons belonging to the same or a similar class, are mainly interested in the establishment of a proximate relative equality, for if the conditions of competition are equalized between persons engaged in the same or a similar line of business, the fact that some non-competitive shipper of a different class and in another line may be charged a different and an apparently lower rate can not of itself constitute the offense of unjust discrimination.

Suppose all the merchants engaged in the flour trade at a particular place on the route of some through line are charged a rate which is higher in proportion to the distance carried than some through shipper is made to pay, but which is absolutely the same for each of these local dealers, without any distinction or discrimination whatever, then as between themselves and the carrier there would seem to be no substantial cause of complaint. Each man upon the hypothesis stated buying his transportation at the home price charged his competitor is placed by the carrier upon an equal footing, and if the obligation as to equality terminated here the carrier might be treated as having discharged the full measure of its duty. But there are obligations which concern the consumer as well as the vender of merchandise, and as the cost of an article in the last analysis is paid by the person using it, it is obvious that any schedule of freight charges which does not take the consumer into account will be unreasonable and unjust.

The conditions as to competition between the rival and conflicting interests of venders may be fully gratified by the prescription and enforcement of a relatively equal rate of freight, and yet that rate may be placed at such a high figure as to be ruinous to the consumers. Hence it becomes necessary to adopt some rule in the interest of this the most numerous and important class affected by these charges. A uniform rule seems be out of the question. That being the case, there is but one alternative, and that is to require that there shall be no discrimination between the same, or substantially the same, classes of shippers, and that all charges shall be reasonable.

If the rate charged be a reasonable one on the service performed, the reasonableness of it to be determined by the cost of the service, with a fair profit added, then the consumer can not complain that he is forced to pay an unreasonable price for the article he uses by reason of the extortionate freight charges levied upon the middleman or distributer from whom he buys. It is impossible to prescribe any fairer rule than this for the carrier, who has some rights I suppose, for the shipper, and all the distributing agencies, as well as the consumer. It is a rule which is in fact only declaratory of the common law, and would have no special significance in this bill if it was not connected with the efficient machinery of procedure devised for its enforcement, and which might be made more efficient still.

I do not subscribe to the doctrine that transportation is merchandise, to be sold like any other article for whatever price it will bring in the market, and with no restriction except what the traffic will bear, for such a doctrine ignores entirely the public character and function of the carrier, and, conducted to its logical results, would deny the right of the public through the law-making power to interfere to any extent, either in establishing fixed rates or in declaring the principles by which they shall be controlled. If that doctrine could be accepted, then the reasonableness of a rate would not only be exempt from judicial determination, but would be made to depend in every case upon the simple discretion of the carrier. On the other hand, I not only believe that a rule of absolute uniformity, based upon distance alone, to be inflexibly applied, without regard to overruling equities, is impracticable, but I am strongly inclined to doubt its legality. The very fact that you declare that rates shall be reasonable, and that that declaration is but the still small voice of the common law speaking here in statutory thunder, is a proclamation in itself that there is no power vested in this body or elsewhere to make rates unreasonable.

The man who travels to-day from New York to Chicago for $8 doubtless considers the rate an extremely reasonable one; but he is simply mistaking his own interest for the true conditions of the problem. Taking into account the cost of the service, it is, in fact, a very unreasonable one. It is obvious that what may be reasonable in the eyes of the passenger or the shipper may be unreasonable in the view of the carrier, and vice versa. The reasonableness of a thing between conflicting interests must necessarily be determined by considerations drawn impartially from both sides of the question. This inquiry is in its nature judicial, and any attempt to forestall or anticipate it by a legislative declaration approaches very near, if it does not overstep, the border line which separates these great functions of government.

It is perfectly legitimate to prescribe that a rate shall be reasonable and then leave it to the courts to determine what is and what is not reasonable, but to declare in advance not merely the principle by which the fixing of the rate shall be governed but to prescribe the rate itself by referring it to a fixed standard and apply the rule to the complicated system of interstate transportation, with all its vast ramifications and subtle competitions, is the exercise of a power which, if it be legislative in its nature, certainly ought to be sparingly and cautiously used. The bill of the committee keeps this distinction full in view in all of its provisions and is consistent and symmetrical throughout; but the Reagan substitute, as I have shown, is not only not distinguished by this unity and integrity of purpose, but is complex and contradictory in some of its essential features. It seems to me to confound the judicial with the legislative function, and seems also to leave in one section the question of reasonableness to be determined by the courts and then in another attempts the settlement of the same question by its own declaration.

Mr. REAGAN. Will my friend indulge me with a remark at that point?

Mr. FINDLAY. Certainly.

Mr. REAGAN. I know the gentleman's purpose is to be fair.

Mr. FINDLAY. It is.

Mr. REAGAN. But it would be understood from his reasoning that my bill not only requires rates to be reasonable, but fixes the rates. There is not a word in the bill having that effect.

Mr. FINDLAY. I used the words "fixed the standard" purposely, because I will say to my friend I have read his substitute most carefully and desire to do it exact justice. In some of its features and in one important particular it has not only my support but my hearty sympathy. In what I said on the subject of a fixed standard of rates I referred to the fifth section.

Mr. REAGAN. My substitute provides that the charges shall be reasonable, and if they are unreasonable it provides that the party charging them shall be punished; it provides both an equitable and legal remedy.

Mr. FINDLAY. Section 4 provides—

That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in the transportation of property as provided in the first section of this act to charge or receive any greater compensation for a similar amount and kind of property, for carrying, receiving, storing, forwarding, or handling the same, for a shorter than for a longer distance on any one railroad.

Mr. REAGAN. That is just what I stated.

Mr. FINDLAY. What is the meaning of that?

Mr. REAGAN. If my friend from Maryland will allow me, I will state the meaning of it is this: If a railroad charges 50 cents for hauling a barrel of flour five hundred miles it can not charge 75 cents for hauling a barrel of flour on the same line half that distance; or if it charges a dollar for carrying a bale of cotton five hundred miles it can not charge $1.50 for carrying a bale of cotton half that distance. That is what it means.

Mr. FINDLAY. If that is the meaning of it, and if that is the construction that would be placed on it by the courts when it comes up for judicial construction, then I did not so read the bill and did not so understand it; and of course what I have said about the meaning of the provision of the bill fixing a specific rate based upon distance alone and prescribing that no more should be charged for a shorter distance than is charged for a longer distance—what I said in that connection would seem to have been a misapprehension of what the learned author of the bill intended, but I do not so read his bill.

I shall therefore reluctantly be compelled to vote against it, but if the House should be of the same opinion and should adopt the bill of the committee instead of his own, my distinguished friend from Texas will still have the consolation of knowing, and the country will understand that without his fearless, untiring, thankless, intelligent, and conscientious labors, pursued in the face of great difficulties and against immense odds, this wrong of wrongs would have continued to run unwhipped of justice. My friend from Massachusetts, Governor LONG, hands me the eleventh section of the committee's bill, which provides the penalty and also prescribes the powers of the commission proposed to be appointed by the bill. It is in these words:

That upon notice that any such railroad company has neglected or refused to conform to the decision of said commission, and to desist from such violation or contravention of this act, it shall be the duty of such district attorney to apply by petition, in the name of the party aggrieved, to the circuit court of the United States for such district, for, and it shall be the duty of such court to grant, an order upon such railroad company to show cause why such company should not be enjoined and restrained against the continuance of such violation, and for such other order and relief in the premises as may be just and proper. For the purpose of making any order or decree in the premises, final or otherwise, such court shall be always open, and the day on which any such order or decree is made shall be a special term of such court. Upon the service and return of such order to show cause, and notice to the parties interested, such court shall proceed in a summary manner to ascertain whether the said report and findings are true; and whenever said court shall be of opinion that such company has done or is doing any act in violation or contravention of this act in said report and findings described, it shall so adjudge; and it then shall be the duty of said court forthwith to issue a writ of injunction requiring such railroad company to desist from such violation, and in respect of the matters in said report contained to conform to and obey all the provisions of said act.

Now there is the equitable remedy. The section proceeds:

Such court may enforce obedience to any such injunction, order, or decree, by any person or party, by fine, proceedings for contempt, and all other means within its lawful jurisdiction sitting as a court of equity. Any person interested to restrain such violation may, on application to the court, be allowed to appear and be heard, by himself or counsel; and upon proof that any district attorney has failed in any proper case for the period of ten days to apply for such order to show cause, the court may permit such application to be made and prosecuted to effect by or in behalf of any person so interested.

Mr. LONG. That is in addition to the legal remedy.

Mr. FINDLAY. Yes; as I understand, that is in addition to the legal remedy. I propose to vote for the section of the substitute of the gentleman from Texas which provides for the recovery of triple damages. I have distinctly said, so far as that feature of the substitute is concerned, it is better than the committee's bill. If you have the remedy by injunction to force the company to desist from these unlawful acts, if you have also a commission exercising a quasi-public authority, and if, in addition to that, you have a private suit by the aggrieved individual himself, in which he may recover triple damages, it seems to me about as great a right as we can confer upon these parties.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 7162) to forfeit the unearned lands granted to the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific coast and to restore the same to settlement, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House, agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. MORGAN, Mr. BLAIR, and Mr. PLUMB as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution (S. R. 98) extending the time fixed for the joint commission appointed under the sundry civil act approved July 7, 1884, to submit their report; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5461) to establish a board of commissioners of interstate commerce and to regulate such commerce.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I desire to stete to the House in as frank and explicit a manner as I can the ideas of the Committee on Commerce upon the subject of interstate commerce and this bill and substitute. I will remark at the outset that the bill as presented by the chairman of the committee of course is not the specific bill of the chairman, and does not embrace, as a general thing, or even to any great extent, his ideas; he merely, as the medium of the committee, reported as instructed the bill agreed upon by the majority of the committee to the House. I will also state that the paternity of that majority bill should be given to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SEYMOUR] who spoke a few days ago. It is not absolutely a bill of the majority of the members of the committee in all its parts. I will also state that when a vote comes to be taken on the substitute bill of the gentleman from Texas the chairman of the committee, I doubt very much whether it will receive the votes of more than a small portion of the members of the committee.

The House has thus for its consideration this great subject cut up in divers ways and with various and different suggestions presented. I, if I am permitted to refer to myself, would prefer simply a commission bill; and yet I preferred that the bill agreed to formally by the majority of the committee should get into the House, because I did not approve of the provisions of the substitute bill offered by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my remarks I wish to say that the word "monopoly" is not to me a frightful word. It is an illy-understood word. It may mean one thing at one time or place and another thing at another, just as it refers either to individuals or corporations. Though corporations only are generally spoken of as monopolies, yet there are individuals who may be called monopolists, persons not in a corporate capacity, traders upon their own account, enterprising men, speculators, who have accumulated millions of dollars. Yet these are not designated as monopolists in the sense of the word as used on this floor to stigmatize railroad companies.

I am not in favor of monopoly which oppresses the people. I am not in favor of any legislation which will operate in that way. But while we are seeking to legislate in the interests of 55,000,000 people of this country, let us be exceedingly careful how we strike down or in any way affect injuriously the interests of incorporated capital, which in the case of railroads has proved itself to be for the benefit of the people.

But fifty-six years ago the first shovelful of earth was thrown up in the construction of a railroad in this country, and those who have ridden on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad between Baltimore and Washington can not but have observed at the point where the main stem connects with the Washington branch a monument to the men of that day who conceived the great enterprise of connecting the waters of the Atlantic and of our Eastern rivers with the great rivers of the West. I refer to this fact because in the course of the remarks I may make I want to show—though members of the House in their intelligence can hardly have failed to see and understand it—that as railroads have been built in this country the country has not only increased in population but has advanced in every interest that a free people and a business people desire to see subserved. I wish to show by the reports of the census that this increase is to be seen in every State and in every great commercial city of this country proceeding pari passu with the building of railroad lines. I might refer to the State of the chairman of this committee [Mr. REAGAN], who has been for the past nine or ten years the great advocate in Congress of an interstate commerce bill. His State in 1871 had within its borders but 700 or 800 miles of railroad. To-day it has, I think, nearly 6,000 miles. Under the last census the representation upon this floor from that State has more than doubled; and if she does not push back capital, individual or incorporated capital, that State will soon be represented here by a still larger number of members; and before very long the day will come when in accordance with the provisions of the act admitting her to the sisterhood of States of this Union she will have population enough to demand that her territory be divided into some four or five States.

The views of the chairman of this committee have greatly changed within the past ten years. He has even to-day modified his proposition; I could not understand the exact effect of the modifications, for the House was not very quiet. As modified it does not propose such radical and extreme legislation to break down railroad corporations as did the proposition first introduced by him years ago. Why? Because, although as I must say he has, according to my conception, shown an undue prejudice against railroad corporations (which, I suppose, he will disavow), the intelligence which has been poured into his ears and the ears of members of the Committee on Commerce during the last few years by those who have practical knowledge of the working of railroads has changed his views, as it has changed the views of many others who have listened to gentlemen who practically understand the subject.

I sought to-day by a resolution to get before the House all the testimony and arguments that have been heard by the Committee on Commerce on this subject, because I knew there were no copies to be had by individual members of the House. I wanted the House to have the benefit of all the intelligence communicated by these railroad experts, communicated by persons who, although they may have been interested perhaps as correct thinkers and practical men on the subject of railroads, have presented facts and logic which are incontrovertible, and would be so considered by every unprejudiced member when read from beginning to end and fairly considered before voting.

I must state frankly that I am in favor of railroad extension. I was born and brought up in a railroad State. Years ago, when the contest was going on for the extension of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad through one corner of the State of Pennsylvania, I was a friend of railroad extension and desirous to afford facilitities for the employment in that way of capital voluntarily subscribed by many men in this country of great enterprise and ability, so that the people might be benefited by it.

A Pennsylvania man can not but favor railroads. What have they done for the State of Pennsylvania? The example of the early incorporation of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, organized by the wisdom of citizens of Maryland, was followed somewhat later by the State of Pennsylvania. Her public improvements of a different kind, her canal system combined with railroads, connected at last the waters of the Delaware and the Ohio. In New York the wisdom of De Witt Clinton and his contemporaries of that great Commonwealth recognized the necessity of connecting the waters of the Hudson with the lakes; and with this purpose the Erie Canal was constructed. Pennsylvania and New York did not rest with their canal communications, but built through railroad lines; thus having both canal and railroad transportation across their States. I wish to mention here, by way of tribute to a gentleman of Pennsylvania long deceased, Hon. George G. Leiper, who represented on this floor the district then embracing Delaware County, and who carried on a large business as proprietor of immense and inexhaustible quarries of stone, that when in Congress he could state that his father had laid down the first railroad in this country, running about the distance of a mile or more from a creek emptying into the Delaware River to these quarries. Perhaps I should except Massachusetts, which is always coming in to make a claim, and in this case claimed priority in the construction of a somewhat similar railway of a few months. But this question of priority will continue to remain in dispute.

I make this statement to show that the idea of railroads was in the minds of Pennsylvania people long ago; and a road from New Castle, on the Delaware, to Frenchtown, on an estuary of the Chesapeake Bay—a road of about sixteen miles, connecting the waters of the Delaware with those running into the Chesapeake Bay—was I believe the first road drawing passengers and freight upon it by a locomotive That road was not within the borders of Pennsylvania, but Pennsylvania capital was largely invested in it. The great State of Pennsylvania need not defend herself for voting down through her representatives any measure that trammels unfairly and unjustly railroad enterprise or any other enterprise seeking to develop, either directly or indirectly, the resources of the country. Citizens of Pennsylvania, most of them residents in Philadelphia, had sunk into the bowels of the earth millions upon millions in explorations for coal. This was in the line of railroads, as developments of veins of coal were made. It led to the building of the Reading Railroad, which for years was, if it is not now, the largest anthracite coal carrying company in the United States.

So, then, Pennsylvania stands here, or rather I stand here as a Pennsylvania Representative, proclaiming my adherence to anything that looks like a fair extension of railroads, a fair treatment of capital invested in railroads. You stigmatize railroads as monopolies and the owners of them as monopolists. I do not think it is fair in the broadest sense of the term to do anything of the kind. Why, sir, stocks in railroad companies as well as bonds in railroad companies can be subscribed for by any citizen. They can subscribe for them to any extent they may wish, whether for one share or a hundred or a thousand. They can acquire control in railroad companies as incorporated in the State of Pennsylvania. Does this prove them monopolies?

But, Mr. Speaker, when it is announced or argued here that railroad companies themselves do not want proper legislation, I wish to say that that is not so. It is not a fact that these railroad corporations in the different States have not sought for legislation not only to protect themselves, but to protect the citizens; not only to protect the citizen against any wrong being done to him, but also that justice may be done to all parties concerned, the citizens as well as the corporations.

I have here a copy of the Pennsylvania law on the subject passed in June, 1883, which in my judgment covers all that is necessary for the purpose of protecting the people against any injustice on the part of railroad corporations. It is short, and as it covers what I believe to be the points Congress in its wisdom should provide for in its legislation, I ask that it be read at the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

LEGISLATURE OF PENNSYLVANIA.

An act to enforce the provisions of the seventeenth article of the constitution relative to railroads and canals.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted, &c., That any undue or unreasonable discrimination by any railroad company or other common carrier, or any officer, superintendent, manager, or agent thereof, in charges for or in facilities for the transportation of freight within this State, or coming from or going to any other State, is hereby declared to be unlawful.

SEC. 2. No railroad company or other common carrier engaged in the transportation of property shall charge, demand, or receive from any person, company, or corporation, for the transportation of property, or for any other service, a greater sum than it shall charge or receive from any other person, company, or corporation for a like service, from the same place, upon like conditions, and under similar circumstances; and all concessions in rates and drawbacks shall be allowed to all persons, companies, or corporations alike, for such transportations and service, upon like conditions, under similar circumstances, and during the same period of time. Nor shall any such railroad company or common carrier make any undue or unreasonable discrimination between individuals, or between individuals and transportation companies, or the furnishing of facilities for transportation. Any violation of this provision shall make the offending company or common carrier liable to the party injured for damages treble the amount of injury suffered.

SEC. 3. If any director, president, officer, agent, or employé of any canal or railroad company shall be interested, directly or indirectly, in furnishing material or supplies to such company, or in the business of transportation, as a common carrier, of freight or passengers over the works owned, leased, controlled, or worked by such company, such director, president, officer, agent, or employé shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof in the court of quarter sessions of any county in which any overt act of such offense is committed such person so offending shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $2,000, and shall be imprisoned not more than two years in the proper county jail or in the penitentiary of the proper district.

Approved the 4th day of June, A. D. 1883.

ROBT. E. PATTISON.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Iowa tells me that they have had a law of that kind upon the statute-book of that State for ten years. In Massachusetts they have a law more in detail and have had for a number of years, and so have other States legislated. I do not know why here we as representatives in the Congress of the United States should seek to bring into the hands of the Government in the remotest degree the control of these railroad corporations.

I say this, Mr. Speaker, because I know by sad experience in the past action of other States, and especially in the State of Pennsylvania, to just what corruptions such a policy leads. In the State of Pennsylvania the management of the public works of that State was confided by law to the control of a board of canal commissioners, and it was not long before it became such a sink of corruption that the people rose in their might and by legislation abolished the board and drove those men out of office. Some fifteen or twenty thousand men were employed under those canal commissioners in the management of the public works, and they managed to secure for the party to which they belonged the absolute control of the State. I think the Whig party for one year or so had control of the board of canal commissioners, but for the rest of this long period the Democrats were in office and the Democratic party of Pennsylvania had control of them, and, as I have already said, it became so fearfully corrupt that it was entirely abolished.

I speak of this as a matter of history. I was one of those who helped to get rid of that great incubus of the board of canal commissioners which so seriously affected the prosperity of the State of Pennsylvania. I was one who helped by legislation to build up the great railroad corporations of that State and formed consolidations of connecting roads running into and through other States in order that we might in Pennsylvania have our business interests increased and have quicker transit for freight and passengers. The State of Pennsylvania has always been liberal on the subject of railroad corporations.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] in opening his speech disavowed, as I have already stated, any idea on his part of injuring or distressing any one. He especially disavowed any intention of doing injustice to the railroads or of damaging unnecessarily in any way any one connected with them. He spoke of the 125,000 miles of railroad in the country and of the ten billions of business carried over those railroads. I wish to say to him that perhaps to-day is the saddest time which he could take to legislate on this subject, for at the present time throughout the country of the 1,000,000 employés of railroad companies from 15 to 20 per cent. have been discharged, as there was no work for them to do—nearly 200,000 men out of employment on railroads in this country.

The sensitiveness of capital invested in railroads is damaged by this agitation to-day. It has been heard in Congress for nearly ten years past. The complaints against railroads upon the subject of improper discriminations for freight traffic have almost entirely ceased. I would like to see the petitions of citizens of the different States which have been presented at this session to the House or the communications from boards of trade or other business boards complaining of the course of railroads in this regard, and the gentleman from Texas, the chairman of the committee, who reports the substitute, knows that the Board of Trade—the National Board of Trade—disapproved of his bill, as was stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts a few days ago, by distinctly voting down the propositions embodied therein. A greater light has been thrown upon the subject than formerly existed. Men have been called upon to give their views, large-minded men, fair men, statesmen, men known throughout the country, and competent to give their opinion upon such a subject—such men as Charles Francis Adams, of Massachusetts, who, though he believes we should have some legislation, does not go to the extreme proposed by the gentleman from Texas.

I am going to quote here, sir, the name of a man who is very distinguished in this line, because he rose from early boyhood to prominence as years passed on in the railroad business. I refer to Mr. Albert Finck, a man who is competent to speak upon the subject. The statement comes to us from such men as he is that such legislation as proposed by the gentleman could not but be injurious, and from such statements I can not but come to the conclusion that we should beware how we trample capital and injure these great vested interests and enterprises that are of so much benefit to the country.

The gentleman from Texas commenced by having views in opposition to the commission part of the committee's bill. I do not know whether by his present amendment as modified to-day he is willing to accept that provision of the bill, as I could not gather from what he said this morning exactly what his views were.

Mr. REAGAN. I am still opposed to the commission, but I did not want to bring that issue up now.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I could not hear the gentleman, as I have said. I now understand him that he still opposes the commission. Upon what ground he opposes it I can not understand.

Mr. CASSIDY (from his seat). His proposition is now to accept it, is it not?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Do I understand you to accept the sections of the committee's bill providing for the creation of the commission?

Mr. REAGAN. No; I merely stated that I offered the substitute for the first seven sections of the committee's bill.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Very well.

There has been a great deal of distrust exhibited on the part of these radical interstate commerce legislators and statesmen of men connected with railroads. Some have approved of putting the matter directly into the courts, or to form new courts for the consideration of disputed questions and complaints. Some approve of a commission. I, and I believe others of the committee which considered the matter, approve of the commission plan, a commission merely to examine into the matter, to gather information, and to give information to the Congress, so that in a few months from now when the next Congress meets with that information before it there may be enacted proper measures for relief, if relief be needed, upon facts presented on which might be framed a suitable bill. Not information derived from mere theorists who know nothing upon the subject; not information from men who have merely vague ideas that they want to have carried out by legislative enactment, but from men who understand the scope of the subject from the beginning to the end, and understand it as men can only understand a subject who have given long study to it, who have practical experience in its workings, and are interested in the business transactions involved.

Would this House hesitate if such a man as ex-Senator Thurman should be selected by the President as railroad commissioner? Would it hesitate if such a man as the distinguished Judge Cooley, known all over the country as a man who has investigated the subject? Would there be an objection to such a man as Mr. Adams, of Massachusetts, and many others that I might mention, as able to-day to take up the question and consider it as any men or set of men in the United States, men who are as clear-minded, as patriotic, and as honorable as any who ever sat upon the Supreme Bench of the United States, or occupied a judicial position in any court in any part of the country? I think, sir, for one, that what we want is information upon this subject. Of course the House can not but see that what the committee presents and the substitute suggests, at present at least, are very crude. The differences of opinion are so great among us that members must see that it would be better if we waited for a period of time, and then after this information is furnished to us adopt some plan which had been recommended upon investigation by the distinguished men selected for their knowledge of this subject.

It would not hurt us to postpone final action upon this subject for a few months. A postponement of one year would not do harm. On the contrary it would be a benefit. Every month of every year in the last ten years these great railroad corporations have been reducing rates, and are still considering the ways and means by which they can further make reductions in freight and passenger charges, until in fact to-day such charges are almost infinitesimal as regards freight. But that part of the subject was thoroughly explained by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG], so that I do not now wish to go over it. Why, the reductions in the charges of freight per ton per mile have been so great in the past few years that they can not be any burden upon any one, whether they be for a short or a long haul.

What can we look forward to in the next five years? If these reductions go on we will have freight carried at the rate of one-half cent per ton per mile. I think it will be so. Railroads are so rapidly extending, capital is being so largely invested in them, that at this moment, we have railroads extending to almost every village in all of the States and Territories throughout the whole country and branches running out from main lines in all directions where the population is sufficient to warrant the expense of railroad connection. The complaints that come here come from those who are not living upon the railroads. It is the expense of getting their goods, their articles, grain, or whatever it may be, to the railroad stations. And yet you are asked to legislate upon a subject that is so extremely sensitive as the vast amount of capital invested in railroads. The estimated amount is immense, absolutely immense. It is useless to state it here again; it is well known that it is between seven or eight billions of dollars. The mileage is immense. At the end of 1883, from Poor's Manual, we find that the railroads have increased nearly double in length of miles in a few years. There were 61,000 miles in operation in 1871 and 121,000 up to January 1, 1884.

Capital is extending these means of communication to our Territories, however distant they may be. If you look at the census tables, or if you look at this table in Poor's Manual, you will see the wonderful increase of capital finding investment in the railroads in the Territories. Some of those Territories are increasing rapidly in population. Some of them are knocking at our doors here for admission as States. How have they come into that prosperous position? By the increase of population, by the easy means of access to them by the railroad systems of the country. In the next ten years, if fairly dealt with, whatever may be the complexion of Congress, Democratic or Republican, we will have probably five Territories admitted as States in this Union. But that never can be unless you carefully legislate upon the subject of railroad enterprise and extension.

The early pioneers who went to California—and the commencement of the settlement of California is in the memory of many of us in this House—toiled on foot, some of them, across the deserts and through the valleys and over the hills; some of them went in wagons. Do you not suppose that those enlightened American men as they sat in their wagons moving slowly or traveling slowly on foot—do you not suppose they could see in the future a railroad connecting the Atlantic with the Pacific? Do you not suppose they saw that; and would you to-day, if you had the power under the law and the Constitution, take up those iron bonds between the East and the West, between the Atlantic and the Pacific, even if you could get back what Congress in its liberality appropriated in land for the establishment of rapid communication from the eastern seaboard to the Golden Gate?

When I look back upon the legislation of Congress for a few years I notice with pleasure the large appropriations which have been made for improving the navigation of our rivers and our harbors. I would not take back one vote that I have ever cast for such propositions. Those appropriations improve the water ways of the country. And yet to-day my friend the gentleman from Texas does not look with such a liberal view upon railroads and their interests as he has done, and I hope will continue to do, upon the appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors. I do not know, sir, but that this legislation was prompted originally by the river interests of the country. They are not willing to come within its provisions. We have tried that in the committee, and it has been tried upon this floor from time to time. Oh, no! You do not seek to regulate the interstate commerce that is carried on the rivers of the country. You do not require a steamboat-master or the owner of a steamboat to post up in his office and at the ports where the steamboat calls every five days a schedule of charges. Oh, no; let the railroad company do that, however expensive it may be, although it should add thousands of dollars to their expenses!

You do not go into the counting-house of a merchant or manufacturer and ask him to post up his prices or his charges a week before he changes them. You let the wholesale merchant trade and the retail merchant trade and regulate his prices as he may see fit. You do not require him to post up in his store a notice of what he will charge a week hence or five days hence, as is required of railroads in the provisions of the substitute offered by the gentleman from Texas. There are millions and millions of capital invested in merchandise and in manufacturing throughout the country, but you do not impose any such duty there. But you come upon the railroads which to-day give you comfort in carrying you and your families from your homes and back, and which have transported your merchandise and the products of your soil at almost no charge, if I may use that expression, the charge being so small. Oh, no! They are monopolies and we must legislate against them.

I do not propose to go into the details of the bill or to discuss the subject of pooling and the subject of rebate. No railroad company to-day wants to have a rebate that discriminates against any individual. My friend from Maryland [Mr. FINDLAY] quoted a case which lately occurred in his State. Some one man in the employ of some railroad might have used deceit; some dealer might have had his freight carried at a penny a pound or a dollar a ton less than some one else. It is a matter of contract. The remedy is at the common law, and always has been, and will continue to be, even though the strong iron-clad provisions of the substitute bill should prevail.

There has been a great deal said upon the subject of pooling. I only wish I understood those things practically. What I know of them I have learned from others who do understand them. I did not learn it from some chance man who comes from the city of New York, some man jealous of some railroad corporation, or some one who has capital invested in railroads, and who makes an individual complaint before a committee and asks the committee to pass an iron-clad bill such as would gratify the gentleman from Texas. I do not attach great weight to the action of any local board of trade that may come here and seek to represent that this legislation must be passed by Congress or that transporters will be destroyed. I take the voice of the aggregation of boards of trade when they meet in national convention, and I find there no approval of such ill-digested schemes as are embraced in the provisions of some of these bills.

There are, as I have said, several bills on this subject. There is a bill presented by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR], there are some bills in the Senate—the bill of Senator CULLOM and one or two other bills—that look to me as if they were measures prepared by statesmen, by men who wanted to be just, by men who wanted to subserve the interests of the people and at the same time not crush the just rights of capital. I approve the provisions of some of those bills; yet I am free to say that with the State legislation existing to-day on this subject I believe there is no need of legislation of the character proposed in the substitute. There can not be any great popular demand for such legislation. If there were, we would have heard it by petition and memorial.

I appeal to my fellow-members and ask them whether the people have been heard from to any extent in that way. I do not say that some petition on the subject may not have come here; but I undertake to state that there is no such public sentiment coming up from the people of this country to Congress as requires us to pass such a measure as the substitute bill of the gentleman from Texas. This country is too great, the people are too numerous and intelligent, to be misguided by what may be said. Our 55,000,000 people know their own wants; they understand what they require; they go on and transact their business. Although at one time in the western section of the State of Pennsylvania, about Pittsburgh, there were complaints of local charges on the main stem of the Pennsylvania Railroad, complaints that freight could be carried at a lower rate from points west of Pittsburgh to Philadelphia than from Pittsburgh to Philadelphia, yet to-day these have ceased, or if there are any they are so few that they have not been brought to the attention of Congress or the country.

I stand here in the interest of the people whom I represent. I stand here sharing in the interest which all members should feel in the success of the business enterprises of the country. I stand here to condemn unjust legislation—unjust because it touches incorporated companies only.

Let us deal justly by individuals and by corporations. Let us not as members of the Forty-eighth Congress pass a bill which when we find it upon the statute-book we shall regret having passed. I need only refer to the manner of rebate as proposed by the gentleman from Texas. By the system he proposes you will do absolute injustice to the shippers of freight. You bind the railroads so that they can not discriminate at all whether they shall take a load of perishable freight and leave a load of coal. You allow them no discretion. All freight must move on without discrimination, no matter what may be the character of the particular freight. I might refer to other instances of injustice. By such legislation you put chains upon the movements of the railroads of the country with their 121,000 miles. You embarrass capital—capital that went generously to the State represented in part by the chairman of the committee; capital that built 6,000 miles of railroad within that State; capital furnished by strangers, scarcely one hundred miles of road having been built within its borders by capital furnished by the people there.

Now look at the growth of the State; look at its railroad extension. Look at the extension of the railroad system into a sister republic (Mexico), millions of dollars having been contributed by American citizens to build railroads connecting the two countries. Such extension of railroad enterprise presents a grand prospect; and I propose to let these corporations alone yet awhile. The burdens they may have put upon the people are too slight to be compared with the good that has been done by the bravery and enterprise of men who put their capital into such enterprises and furnished us the means of transportation and passage from one end of the country to the other, North and South, and from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, obtained the floor.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pensylvania. Mr. Speaker, I believe I did not consume all my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. TOWNSHEND). The gentleman had fifteen minutes remaining, but he did not claim to hold the floor any longer.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I wish to yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROCKWELL].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair, not being aware that the gentleman desired to reserve any part of his time, has recognized the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER].

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Then I will reserve the residue of my time.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I believe it has come to be the settled judgment of thinking men in this country, and is conceded generally by railway owners and managers themselves, that the time has come when the General Government should assume the regulation of interstate traffic on our railways. The railroads of the country have grown to such proportions that States are admittedly no longer adequate to the needed regulation; and what ought to be done, and can not be done by the States separately, ought, if the constitutional power exists, to be done by the General Government.

That the constitutional power does exist to regulate interstate commerce on railways as well as on water ways will, I think, hardly be questioned. That the necessity of some regulation exists, and that the States are inadequate to provide the needed regulation, is manifest from the enormous extent of this traffic, affecting, as it does, the vast industrial and commercial interests of the whole country. Railways, at first constructed under charters obtained for the most part from the States as separate lines, have, by amalgamation and consolidation, grown into vast systems, embracing, some of them, half of the continent. State boundaries become to them but imaginary lines.

No doubt the public interest has been subserved, the cost of railway management greatly lessened, and the cost of carrying reduced by the consolidation of separate roads into systems; and it must, I think, be admitted that amalgamation has not brought with it the evils at first anticipated. A writer on this subject in the Fortnightly Review for July, 1875, says of English railways:

> The amalgamations which have been effected from time to time have in a large degree controlled the rates and fares, generally speaking, to the benefit of all concerned.

But while this is true, it is also true that the power of railroads over the trade, commerce, and productions of the country has been thereby vastly increased, and for this reason the necessity of regulation has increased.

It has, I know, been a favorite theory among railway operators that regulation should be left to competition alone. But competition has not proved sufficient. It is a saying of Stephenson's that "where combination is possible competition is impossible."

The report of the parliamentary committee of 1872 contains this entry:

> In looking back to the history of parliamentary inquiry and legislation from 1840 to 1872, it is evident that the predominant idea in the mind of the public has been that competition, which is so powerful a regulator of most commercial affairs, would also suffice to regulate railways; while, nevertheless, by a slow and gradual process of experiment, one form of competition after another has proved to be inadequate.

And the writer above quoted says:

> It was expected that competition would regulate railways, but instead of this the railways regulate competition.

Competition, then, has ceased to be an all-sufficient regulator of everything. Sometimes competition is little less than a war of one interest, one road, upon another. As an escape from the disastrous consequences of competition, the tendency in almost everything seems to be to combinations. Especially is this true of railways, making their proper regulation as common carriers the more necessary. Admitting, then, that regulation of interstate railway traffic is necessary and that Federal regulation alone is adequate, the first question that arises is, what is the object of regulation or what is to be secured by regulation?

Here we come at once upon common-law principles. The object of regulation is manifestly to secure to the public equal rights and equal facilities for traffic.

In the "suggested regulations" of the parliamentary committee of 1872 the following were laid down as the object of railway regulations:

1. Reasonable rates.
2. Reasonable facilities and equal facilities to all.
3. Security to the public against unjust discrimination and undue preference.

Or, as it may be stated, the public is entitled to regulations to prevent unjust discriminations, to compel reasonable facilities, and to enforce reasonable rates and carriage within reasonable time—"due and reasonable facility in the interest of the public."

But, first of all, the object of railway regulation should be to prevent discrimination and secure equality to shippers. Do this effectively and little else will remain to be done. Favoritism, unjust discrimination, has hurt more than all other wrongs connected with railway traffic. This is the root of the evil. Prevent unjust discrimination, secure equal advantages to all, and you will have accomplished the chief end of regulation.

The British railway commission, according to a recent decision of the court of queen's bench, has power to deal only with questions of "undue preference," "or the withholding of reasonable facilities." Railroads must be compelled to show due regard to the wants of the public.

The next question is, how can the needed regulation be best provided for?

Here gentlemen differ. Two different modes are before us, one contained in the committee bill, and one in the proposed substitute known as the Reagan substitute.

One plan is to enact laws, specify what may or shall and what shall not be done, fix penalties, and send the parties aggrieved to the courts for their remedy. The other, the committee bill, proposes only general regulations and a commission to investigate and report, but relying on the courts in the end for relief.

All prudent men will agree, I think, that it is better at the outset in a matter of such importance not to go far enough than to go too far and incur reaction. Fortunately we are not without some experience to guide us in a matter so important. Railways have been in operation half a century; a thousand questions have arisen, and as many laws enacted in this country and in England as remedies for as many evils. In 1873 England, after a parliamentary inquiry, passed a law establishing a commission. Up to that time it is said that there had been passed 3,000 acts, most of which were dead letters on the statute-books. It would seem as though the prediction of Sidney Smith had been realized: "If Parliament," he said, "get out of temper with these metallic ways they will visit them with laws of iron and burst upon them with the high pressure of despotism." But even laws of iron alone did little good.

There is scarcely a State in the Union that has not pages of laws relating to railway traffic which the courts are open to enforce. But the plain truth is nobody enforces them. It is too costly and tardy as a remedy and falls too heavily on single persons.

A witness testifying before the parliamentary commission of 1872 says, "Whether the railway companies are compellable or not I do not know, but nobody compels them."

I am inclined myself to agree with a writer who says, "No trading interest, large or small, ought to be exposed to the risk of forcing from railway companies by legal process what ought to be granted without such trouble and expense"—that is, the responsibility of enforcing regulations, preventing discriminations, and compelling railways to furnish proper facilities, and to treat all under like circumstances alike ought not to be left entirely to those who are injured.

The assumption of control by the General Government, if no other means are provided for enforcing prescribed regulations than a right to go into the State or United States courts—which for the most part now exists under State laws—will, in my opinion, fall far short of the end it is desired to reach.

In 1873 an act passed the British Parliament providing for a railway commission; but I will read first from the act cap. xxxi, 17 and 18 Vict., passed in 1854, for the better regulation of the traffic on railways and canals:

Every railway company, canal company, and railway and canal company shall, according to their respective powers, afford all reasonable facilities for the receiving and forwarding and delivering of traffic upon and from the several railways and canals belonging to or worked by such companies, respectively, and for the return of carriages, trucks, boats, and other vehicles, and no such company shall make or give any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to or in favor of any particular person or company, or any particular description of traffic in any respect whatsoever; nor shall any such company subject any particular person or company, or any particular description of traffic, to any undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage in any respect whatsoever.

Then, as a remedy, section 3 of this same act (1854) provides:

It shall be lawful for any company or person complaining against any such companies or company of anything done, or of any omission made in violation or contravention of this act, to apply in a summary way by motion or summons—

To any court or judge—

and it shall be lawful for such court or judge to hear and determine the matter of such complaint. * * * And if it be made to appear to such court or judge on such hearing, or on the report of any such person, that anything has been done or omission made in violation or contravention of this act by such company or companies, it shall be lawful for such court or judge to issue a writ of injunction or interdict restraining such company or companies from further continuing such violation or contravention of this act, and enjoining obedience to the same; and in case of disobedience of any such writ of injunction or interdict it shall be lawful for such court or judge to order that a writ or writs of attachment or any other process of such court incident or applicable to writs of injunction or interdict shall issue against one or more of the directors of any company, or against any owner, lessee, contractor, or other person failing to obey such writ of injunction or interdict, &c.

I read this for the purpose of showing what powers are given to the railway commission subsequently created by the act of 1873, which gives the same powers to the commission. For after experimenting with laws innumerable, which were never enforced, for regulating traffic upon their railways, the Parliament of Great Britain passed an act providing for a railway commission. The powers of the commission, as prescribed in the act of 1873, are as follows:

Any person complaining of anything done or of any omission made in violation or contravention of section 2 of the railway and canal traffic act of 1854—

That is a part of the section which I have just read—

or of section 16 of the regulations of railways act, 1868, or of this act, or of any enactment amending or applying the said enactments respectively, may apply to the commissioners, and upon the certificate of the board of trade alleging any such violation or contravention, any person appointed by the board of trade in that behalf may in like manner apply to the commissioners.

Then follow the powers of the commission:

And for the purpose of enabling the commissioners to hear and determine the matter of any such complaint, they shall have and may exercise all the jurisdiction conferred by section 3 of the railway and canal traffic act of 1854.

This is the section I have in part read, which prescribes the powers given by the act of 1854 to the courts.

The same powers are by this act conferred upon the commissioners. That is, the powers which under the act of 1854 were given to the courts by this act are given to the commissioners, for the act goes on to say:

The commissioners shall have all the jurisdiction conferred on the several courts and judges empowered to hear and determine complaints under that act; and may make orders of like nature with the writs and orders authorized to be issued and made by the said courts and judges; and the said courts and judges shall, except for the purpose of enforcing any decision or order of the commissioners, cease to exercise the jurisdiction conferred on them by that section.

That is, they constitute a separate court, which is designated a commission, and to that court or commission is given full power to enforce the regulations prescribed in the act of 1854, and make it the duty of the commission to see that the regulations therein prescribed are carried out by the railroad companies.

In its report of 1882 the commission says:

The number and variety of cases which have been before the railway commission, and upon which they have given just decisions, is proof of the value of the tribunal.

A writer in the Fortnightly Review says:

The act of appointing the railway commissioners and the valuable work which has already been done may be taken as an indication that this act is more workable and more calculated to settle differences between the railways and the public and between the railway companies themselves than all previous legislation on the subject.

The British commission has power to adjudicate between railway companies as well as between railway companies and the public. The powers of this commission, it will be seen, are quite different from the powers of the commission provided for in the committee bill now before us.

I believe a few regulations—a few fundamental principles such as have been many times laid down—with a commission of men of ability and integrity, who would do justice alike to the railroads and the public, and with power adequate to their work, would best accomplish the desired object. I believe, too, that the public interest and that of the railroads in the long run, instead of being adverse, go together.

The tendency in modern civilization is to specialization, and I believe to secure proper regulation of railway traffic a court with jurisdiction over all questions arising out of railway transportation is necessary, and I would include in its powers the power to adjudicate between railways as well as between the railways and the public, with the right, of course, of appeal to higher courts.

How far regulations—and now I come to the substitute of the gentleman from Texas—should specify or assume to specifically control rates is not easy to determine; but I do not see how we can do better than leave the question of reasonableness of rates, as we must questions of discrimination, to be judged by the court to be established for that purpose.

As to the interference with rates, Mr. Walker, one of the witnesses before the British commission, says:

All the witnesses have been falling back upon some natural rate that companies ought to charge, as if there were any means of getting at such a rate.

Lord Salisbury said that witnesses before committees have "an idea that when trade is bad the companies should take the loss, and when the trade is good the public take the advantage." What rates are reasonable or unreasonable can only be determined by the circumstances existing at the time. Rates must necessarily depend largely upon circumstances. The rule, however, laid down by the gentleman from Texas in his bill, namely, that no higher rate should be charged for a shorter than for a longer haul—the shorter being included always as a part of the longer—is in general a sound one, but not without exceptions.

The gentleman from Massachusetts gave some illustrations, but whether they would justify a departure from the rule or not I will not stop here to inquire. But a better illustration of an exception would be, I think, such a case as I have known to arise. Say two hundred miles from market is a coal deposit of good quality, and twenty-five miles farther away on the same road is another deposit not so good. If no lower rate can be allowed on the poorer coal than on the better grade the owner might be unable to work his mines at all, while lower rates to him might not hurt the owner of the better grade of coal. Nevertheless the interests of capital invested all over the country is so great, and the power of railroads is so limitless to break down in one place and build up in another, that, although a commission would have power to allow exceptions, the rule is a most important one as a general principle.

For instance, capital becomes invested in certain localities in manufacturing industries. If it is in the power of railways to grant without limitation lower rates of freight for a longer than for a shorter distance, they may make profitless the capital invested in one place while they induce the investment of capital in another, thus working great injustice to large industrial interests and affecting the property interests of whole towns. Regulations would be ineffective that did not embrace provisions which would protect the public interests in these respects, and there must be the power lodged somewhere to enforce regulations. The whole question then, Mr. Speaker, is this: Shall Congress prescribe regulations and leave the individual to go into the court to get his remedy, or is it better to organize a commission whose duty it shall be to see that just regulations are carried out?

I believe that a commission with power to adjudicate all questions arising out of interstate commerce on railways, both between the railways themselves and the railways and the public, and to enforce its decisions, orders, and decrees, ought to go hand and hand with the assumption of control over railway traffic. For whatever regulations are prescribed they will not enforce themselves, nor will they be enforced, except perhaps spasmodically, if left to the parties aggrieved to seek their remedy through the courts.

Our experience has been the same as the experience of England, and it will not, in my opinion, help the matter to have the right to go into the courts proceed from laws of Congress instead of from State Legislatures. The object of the laws in either case is to secure equal facilities and equal rates under like circumstances to all. Experience, both in this country and in England, as far as it goes, shows that this end can most certainly be attained through a commission with power to judge and enforce equity. Not an iron rule inflexibly applied, but justice promptly enforced is what is needed.

Mr. ROCKWELL. Mr. Speaker, the manufacturing interest of the nation is the basis of its prosperity. Enact the principle of the second section of the Reagan substitute without the qualifying clause annexed to section 3 in the committee's bill, and you cripple the industries in every interior town in the United States. Railroads must be allowed to make certain just discriminations in favor of industries in interior towns, or the industries must be given up. Distant from markets, they can not compete with like business nearer the market without discrimination in their favor. Other elements than a blind theory of uniform rates enter into this matter. No cast-iron law should prevent railroads from benefiting their own and the business of interior towns alike by proper discriminations. It is far enough to go to say that the rates should be "reasonable" and alike "under similar circumstances." Given a manufacturing district among the hills where water-power is abundant, and until the industries get upon their feet they must be encouraged for the good of the district and as feeders for the railroad; and if when more firmly established the distance from market is found to be great, they must still ask for and receive discrimination, or oftentimes the business be abandoned.

It may be said that manufacturing must be carried on near the market or the seaboard; if so, then you must abandon the idea of ever developing the interior. The primal design of a railroad is the development of the country. That development not only aids the railroad by building up business along its line, but aids the whole country as well. Thriving villages all through the land make the country prosperous, and we should not tie up the railroads in the matter of proper freight discriminations; else we retard development. Diversified business is the nation's hope. To scatter the industries throughout our territory is a far better policy than to mass them. The railroads should have greater freedom in this matter than the second section of the Reagan substitute gives, not alone for their own interest, but for the public good.

The committee's bill provides a commission to be known as "the commission of the interstate commerce of the United States," and it is charged with the duty of carrying into effect the proposed act. In addition to the remedies by suit, any person aggrieved, with certain proper approval, can petition the commission in writing, who may examine the matter and may give notice to the railroad to desist from the violation of the law. If the railroad neglect or refuse to conform to the decision of the commission after notice, then the United States district attorney for the district in which the act complained of occurred shall apply by petition in the name of the party aggrieved to the circuit court of the United States for such district. If the court, after hearing, finds that the company has violated any of the provisions of the law, an injunction shall be issued, requiring the company to desist from such violation, and the court is given full power to enforce injunctions, orders, and decrees.

The advantage of a commission is obvious. It has the power to ascertain and report upon all questions of fact arising under the law. An independent body of men is created, whose suggestions will have weight and whose recommendations will be alike beneficial to the railroads and the public. It furnishes a place where information may be obtained and where the public interest may be conserved and protected. The necessity of such a commission becomes more apparent when we consider the many State lines our railroads cross and the immense business, yearly increasing, that they transact. A commission furnishes information, safeguards, recommendations, and, above all, it may suggest changes of law which shall bring to the public at large the results derived in individual cases.

The design of a national law is to regulate, not to cripple, the railroads, not to hamper their business and interrupt competition; nor delay the development of the country, but to secure reasonable charges for transportation under like circumstances, and to give an adequate and speedy remedy to any citizen who may be wronged by the action of the roads. Anything further than this, aside from the establishment of a commission with the power of suggestion and recommendation and the granting of reasonable rates and remedies, will only interfere with the business of the roads without benefit to the public, and will but hinder a progress based upon free action which can adjust itself to the wants of business.

The first step toward a national law should be as general as possible, broad in its view, free from perplexing detail.

The difficulty with the Reagan substitute bill is that it prevents proper and just discriminations under similar circumstances. In section 7 it gives triple damages, instead of actual damages with full costs and expenses, as provided by section 6 of the committee's bill, and it leaves out altogether the idea of a commission. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I support the committee's bill.

FORT HALL INDIAN RESERVATION.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, with inclosures, relative to the compensation due Indians upon the Fort Hall reservation, Idaho, for right of way taken by the Utah and Northern Railway Company; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. SUMNER, of Wisconsin, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. WELLER, indefinitely, on account of illness.

To Mr. KING, for the remainder of this week.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5461) to establish a board of commissioners of interstate commerce and to regulate such commerce.

Mr. RICE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Texas in opening this discussion did not overrate the importance of the questions which it involves. One hundred and twenty-five thousand miles of railroad tracks lie like a net-work upon the surface of the country. Scarcely a line is wholly separate and distinct from the rest. They touch and interlace at a thousand connecting points—most numerous where population is densest and civilization most active. They stretch out over unsettled territory to open the way for immigration and make connection with new points of commerce or production. They represent nearly eight billions of money, including not only the contributions of the capitalist, but the savings of the middle and laboring classes, filtered through savings banks and other trust institutions into these vast reservoirs of investment. Many billion dollars' worth of commerce, a large portion of the entire wealth of the country, annually moves over them—wealth in healthy, productive activity. There is no person in the land who is not interested in whatever affects this vast internal commerce. Its movements are the pulsations of our national life.

These questions are delicate as well as important. The nervous system of the human frame is not more sensitive than the railroad system of the country. A storm, a drought, sunshine, frost, a panic, or a boom in business, all are noted by this unfailing barometer. A shock at a single point is felt to every extremity. A change of rates on the Erie Canal on freight to be transshipped to the South forces a corresponding change on every line from Saint Louis to Atlanta or Savannah. A change upon any one of the trunk lines of this country or of Canada forces an immediate readjustment on all the rest. The hand that uses the scalpel upon a system so vital, so intricate, so delicate, surely ought not to be rough or inexpert.

Before legislating for the regulation of railroads it is well to inquire how extreme is the necessity for such legislation. It is quite easy, as my colleague [Mr. LONG] has well said, to criticise railroad management, but it is altogether a different thing to decide whether that criticism is just or unjust. There are inequalities and inequities in all kinds of business. Everywhere the cunning outwit the simple, and the strong crowd the weak to the wall. The wise man succeeds where the foolish man fails, and industry and brains build colossal fortunes out of dry goods or pork as well as out of railroads. I do not question that there have been many instances of injustice and wrongdoing in railroad management, but I do not believe there are less in proportion in any other business of importance and complications.

I beg gentlemen who declaim eloquently about the oppression of the people by these monopolies, and recommend the application of what they call "heroic treatment" to curb their power and reform their practices, to consider what railroads have done for the public service unaided by Congressional wisdom and unrestricted by Congressional legislation.

English railroads average three times as many passengers to the mile as ours; their gross receipts are three times as great per mile. They are operated in a compact, thickly-settled country, teeming with business; yet our roads are operated for about the same per cent. of the gross receipts and charge but little more than half the rates. Our railroad service is already the cheapest in the world. This does not indicate an alarming degree of thriftlessness or extortion on the part of those who manage it.

We may be further relieved of apprehension by the undeniable fact that the Eastern and Western railroads are constantly reducing their already low rates, and that the average freight rate on the Eastern roads is now less than 1 cent per ton per mile and but little more than 2 cents per mile per passenger. We should be very confident of our own freedom from prejudice, accuracy of information, and correctness of judgment before we radically interfere with the details of a management which has afforded such results as these.

CENTRALISM.

We hear a great deal of talk nowadays about the growing tendency of this Government toward centralism. I doubt if there was ever a bill before Congress making a longer stride in the direction of centralism or involving a more absolute and far-reaching exercise of the national authority than the so-called Reagan bill. Certainly we can no longer question that this is a nation when Congress assumes jurisdiction over every ton of freight that crosses by rail one State line into another and attempts to regulate the charges of State roads confined within the State which chartered them.

I do not wish to controvert the arguments by which the power of Congress in this respect has been maintained, but I suggest that the possession of power by no means necessitates or makes advisable its active and intrusive exercise. The earth is surrounded and kept in place by an atmosphere of forces the very existence of which renders their patent and sensible interposition unnecessary if not dangerous. Admitting the existence of this national authority even to the extreme claimed by the learned gentleman from Texas, is it wise and practical to employ it in the regulation of the minute details of railroad management, rather than to leave them to the operation of the same laws by which other business matters are controlled, trusting to the existence and supervision of this supreme central power to be actively exercised only in extreme and exceptional cases? The committee in their bill have adopted the latter view. The Czar of all the Russias terrorizes his vast domain by a power scarcely more arbitrary and despotic than would be exercised by the Congress of the United States should it adopt the substitute moved by the gentleman from Texas.

POWER OF CONGRESS.

Still, admitting the power of Congress, whence does it come and how far does it extend? The fact that railroad corporations are chartered gives to the States which charter them no special power over them not reserved in the charter. We find corporations chartered or under general law engaged in almost every branch of business. Nor does the fact that the State exercises its power of eminent domain in behalf of railroad corporations add to its authority over them. A thousand manufacturing establishments all over the country depend upon the exercise of the same power for their water rights. The special power of the State over railroads is from the fact that they are public carriers, and of the United States that they are public carriers of United States commerce.

Now, it is plain, and even the gentleman from Texas, with all his tendencies to centralism, admits it, that Congress can not make regulations for railroad business done solely within a State. The New York Central can oppress the millers of Rochester and destroy the cities and towns upon its line, upon which it depends for its local business; the Pennsylvania Central can wholly disregard the wishes and even the rights of the oil producers of the western section of the State, can buy up the State Legislature, and cause riots which United States troops may be required to quell; but Congress can do nothing to remedy or alleviate the difficulties, because these railroads are operating solely within the States and under State laws.

But is it quite certain that Congress can interfere with the rates and charges of these great roads even as to interstate commerce? They are not obliged to make any contracts operative beyond their own States. What if they see fit to haul freight and make rates only within those States—the one to and from Buffalo, the other Pittsburgh? How can the gentleman reach them with the national arm and force them under the provisions of his bill? It is certain that all water freights from the West to Buffalo and thence by rail to the coast would be absolutely exempt from its provisions; and, if so, would not this give an advantage to the New York Central over its rivals which would enable it to defy all competition? In view of all these doubts and difficulties it would seem to be wise to feel our way somewhat cautiously and perhaps listen a little to expert advice before rashly attempting what we may not be able to accomplish.

HISTORY OF THE REAGAN BILL.

I have observed since being a member of Congress the progress and history of the Reagan bill. Mr. HOPKINS, of Pennsylvania, rightly claims its real paternity. He introduced in the Forty-fourth Congress a bill which seems to have been the germ of this. Mr. REAGAN introduced the same bill in the Forty-fifth Congress, and it was referred to his committee. A little later, January 21, 1878, Mr. Watson, of Pennsylvania, introduced a bill on the same subject, which was referred to the same committee; this bill slumbered in committee until May 2. On that day Mr. REAGAN rose to a personal explanation, and caused to be read extracts from the Pittsburgh Gazette, violently and most unjustly criticising him for holding the bill so long in his committee. On the same day he reported from the committee the bill introduced by Mr. Watson, which has since borne the name of the gentleman from Texas, although the bantling is his only by adoption.

This bill, introduced as above, with slight verbal differences, had its origin in the Legislature of Pennsylvania, and was the outgrowth of a fierce railroad competition for the transportation of petroleum. In debate upon it in this House the gentleman from Texas said it had been drafted with great care by a learned and expert railroad lawyer, and disclosing its origin and purpose, but disregarding his own better knowledge of law, repeatedly spoke of the necessity of preventing greater charges for freight from Pittsburgh to Philadelphia than from Chicago to Philadelphia. The learned and expert lawyer who drew the bill had paid more attention to the woes of oil producers than to the rules of language, and after considerable debate the chairman of the committee withdrew it for the purpose of grammatical revision. This accomplished, he again introduced it very nearly in the form in which it is now before the House.

And thus this bill, born of local passion and strife, discarded in the Legislature of the State where it had its origin, adopted by the gentleman from Texas and corrected and improved by his skillful hand, has worked its way into the national Congress, and seeks sway over the whole country. It would cramp the commerce of the nation into the straight-jacket designed for the petroleum traffic of Pennsylvania.

PROVISIONS OF THE REAGAN BILL.

The chairman of the committee has declared the purpose of his bill to be to establish four great principles:

First. That there shall be no discrimination in regard to freights.

Second. That there shall be no rebates or drawbacks.

Third. That there shall be no pooling of rates.

Fourth. That more shall not be charged for a short distance than for a long distance on the same haul.

It also provides that railroad companies shall post and keep posted, in all their depots, schedules of all rates and charges from the place where the schedules are posted to every other place to which freight can go thence, which schedule must remain in force until at least five days after others are posted in their place. The eighth section of the bill provides substantially that any director or officer of any railroad company violating any one of its many onerous provisions shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be fined not less than $1,000. The next step may well be to keep a director tied to the cow-catcher of every locomotive that draws a passenger train.

DISCRIMINATIONS AS TO FREIGHTS.

The first section of the bill is intended to provide against discriminations in regard to freight. If it merely prohibited unjust discrimination growing out of corruption or favoritism or any other cause, this section would be deserving of support. But it forbids, arbitrarily and absolutely, all discriminations in regard to freights.

But all discriminations in freights are not unjust or improper; they are sometimes really necessary and conducive to the interest of the very persons against whom at first thought they seem to press. A railroad must first pay the current expenses of its operation. If its business fails to do that for any considerable time it must stop. But when the gross receipts are equal to the regular and permanent expenses the business may be largely increased without a proportionate additional outlay. The locomotive that draws ten cars can draw twenty just as cheaply. Hence it is an object to find freight for the ten additional cars. The business that filled the first ten may well submit to the addition of the second ten at a less rate, because the greater proportion of every dollar paid by them will add to the net income of the road, and thus tend directly to the reduction of its own original rates.

A certain section produces ice for the city market, and can afford to pay $2 a ton to move it to the market. The same section produces iron, which can pay $1 a ton and no more. The ice dealer is not injured in paying $2, while the iron dealer sends his freight by the same train for $1. On the contrary, it is quite possible that the railroad is enabled to carry the ice for $2 a ton instead of $3 by the addition to its net income derived from carrying the iron for $1.

A certain district produces oil under the same conditions with another district, excepting that it is a thousand instead of five hundred miles from the common market. The railroad carries oil from the farther district for $10 a car-load, and charges $20 for all other freight from the same place. But it is quite possible that if the oil were not carried at low rates to compete with that nearer the market, but were left in the earth, that place would have no railroad at all, or only at most onerous rates.

Again, it is contrary to the laws of trade that the shipper who regularly loads a hundred cars a week with freight should pay the same rates as he who now and then loads but one. In every other business the large dealer, the wholesaler, has an advantage over the small dealer or the retailer. These illustrations are sufficient to suggest the practical difficulties and wrongs even of an arbitrary prohibition of all discriminations in regard to freight. It is sufficient and better to provide, as does the committee's bill, by a wise supervision against any which are corrupt or personal.

THE REAGAN BILL CREATES DISCRIMINATIONS.

But this bill claiming to prevent discriminations is the source and creator of them to an extent never before existing in this or any other country. It discriminates in favor of every railroad carrier who confines his operations to a single State; in favor of every one who can receive at the terminus of his road freight brought thus far by water; in favor of the carrier by water everywhere; and in favor of the carrier by a foreign road competing for freight with ours. The Dominion of Canada would not find it long difficult to complete its Pacific road when it can compete with our transcontinental lines hampered by these provisions as to rates and schedules, and the stockholders in those now existing competing with ours for east and west freight would soon rejoice in long-waited-for dividends. Nor can I understand why the framer of this bill has exempted water freights from its provisions. The committee bill has done the same. My colleague says it is because the difficulties of including water freight were insuperable, but it seems to me the difficulties of excepting it are greater. Interstate commerce moves on the water equally as on the rail. Why hamper the one class and leave the other free? And this in a bill professedly intended to prevent discriminations!

REBATES AND DRAWBACKS.

The second section of the bill prohibits absolutely and unqualifiedly all rebates and drawbacks. But these may sometimes be allowed without harm to anybody. A shipper contracts with a railroad carrier to carry all his freight at the lowest current rates. He finds that a rival shipper by another road is underselling him in the distant market owing to lower secret freights than he has paid. Is there any reason why he should not rely upon his contract with his road to rebate to him the late-discovered difference?

A railroad contracts with a shipper that if his shipments reach a certain amount in a certain time he shall have a reduced rate. It is not certain whether or not he will comply with the condition. He pays full rates until he has shipped the stipulated amount and then receives his drawback. Who is wronged by it?

Western producers pay one rate on freight which stops in New York and a less on that which is transshipped to Liverpool. It is all shipped mingled in bulk. It is not known until the freight reaches New York, perhaps not until some time after, how much will remain there and how much or what will be transshipped. No one is harmed by allowing the rebate on that which primarily paid New York rates but is subsequently shipped to Liverpool. In this respect, as in discriminations, unqualified prohibition is unwise, while all the evils complained of would be obviated by a wise supervision, as provided by the bill of the committee.

POOLING.

The third section of the bill prohibits pooling. This was not contained in the original bill, but has been added to meet an evil since discovered. The word "pooling" suggests evil practices. It is an admirable catchword by which to stimulate unenlightened prejudice. But when we understand the practice the word is here used to signify, we shall find that the harm is chiefly in the word rather than in the practice. Pooling is simply an attempt by the managers of competing roads to secure by an agreement among themselves stability of rates, and, so far as may be, the advantages of consolidation of systems of roads serving areas too vast and various for the perfect application of that principle.

It is a popular delusion into which the supporters of this bill have fallen that the public interests are promoted by a constant and active competition as to freights. Really such competition frequently causes sudden and extreme fluctuations in prices, which do good to nobody, but harm to many. The most violent railroad wars ultimately result either in ruining one or both of the competing roads, or in an agreement by which they make up, and more, by higher rates the losses they have incurred by the lower.

These effects of unregulated competition were early experienced in England. The stronger roads bankrupted the weaker by their longer endurance, only to find in them fiercer and more reckless competition after the hope of dividends had passed. To avoid these results, soon found to be inevitable, railroad policy tended toward consolidation or amalgamation, which is pooling in principle. It was claimed that parallel roads or a system of roads could be operated together more economically and efficiently than separately. Railroads sought legislative authority to amalgamate; the unenlightened popular feeling was hot against this policy as it is here against pooling. It was declared to be in the interest of the railroads against the public. Under it a powerful road would absorb another, until, like Aaron's rod, it had swallowed all the rest. It would thus become a monopoly absorbing wealth and power, and ruinous to the public interests.

A parliamentary commission was appointed, composed of the ablest and most judicious statesmen of the kingdom, who should thoroughly investigate the subject. Their report settled the question in favor of the railroad policy and against the popular apprehension. Its wisdom has not since been questioned in England. The report says:

> English legislation for a long time discouraged amalgamation; but amalgamations have been effected with directly opposite results to those anticipated.

In support of this statement it cites the case of the Northeastern Railroad Company, as follows:

> The Northeastern is a striking illustration. That railway, or system of railways, is composed of thirty-seven lines, several of which formerly competed with each other. Before their amalgamation they had, generally speaking, high rates and low dividends; the system is now the most complete monopoly in the United Kingdom. From the Tyne to the Humber, with one local exception, it has the country to itself, and it has the lowest rates and the highest dividends of any large English railway.

It is possible that an examination into the workings of the practice of pooling, as provided by the bill of the committee, instead of its peremptory and unqualified prohibition as provided in the Reagan bill, would result in discovering some merit in it—perhaps even to giving it some of the credit of the great reduction of freights during the first few years on the roads practicing it wholly or in part.

The policy of consolidation or amalgamation has already made great progress in this country. First, State lines consolidated. Gradually the process was extended beyond State lines, until few great systems were established contending for the carrying trade of the country. These consolidations have promoted efficiency, convenience, and economy. Rates have been lowered by them and travel rendered more expeditious and convenient. At first the rivalry between them was intense; their wars were titanic, they depleted their own treasuries for the sinews of war, and then plundered the business of the country to replenish them. They were compared to the robber barons, who built their castles on the cliffs overhanging the public ways and plundered the traveler that they might war on each other.

But we have got into a more enlightened age than that of the robber barons. Public opinion called a halt, and common sense and English experience suggested a better way. Covering too vast an area and involving too various interests for consolidation into a single system, they sought to attain similar results by a federation between different systems. This plan has been in operation for seven or eight years under as able and honest management as was ever brought to the administration of vast and complicated business interests. The idea of a peace congress for the settlement of national difficulties has been anticipated and realized by this plan for railroad management. Differences between them are referred to an able board of arbitrators, whose decisions, worth no legal power, are accepted as binding by all parties. The policy means peace rather than war, unity rather than competition. It has worked out great results for good, both for the railroads and for the public. Instead of being prohibited, it should be encouraged. Re-enforced by legislative recognition and watched by Government supervision, it will ultimately furnish the true solution of the railroad problem. Federation in America, like amalgamation in England, will result in lower rates to the shipper and higher dividends to the stockholder.

LOWER RATES FOR LONGER DISTANCES.

The substance of the fourth section of the Reagan bill is condensed by the gentleman from Texas into a statement that "no more shall be charged for a shorter than for a longer distance on the same haul."

No railroad practice has caused greater outcry than that of charging more for a shorter than a longer distance. Its injustice seems obvious even to superficial observation. How can it be right for a road to charge less for carrying a barrel of flour a thousand miles than for another five hundred miles on the same line? On this point the supporters of the Reagan bill have concentrated their forces and thrown up their strongest fortifications. The gentleman from Texas has declared that there shall be "no discrimination against interterminal points." He lives at Palestine, two hundred miles inside from Galveston, and complains that the railroad charges more for freight from Saint Louis to Palestine than from Saint Louis to Galveston.

Mr. REAGAN. If the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RICE] will allow me, I desire to remark that if I said at any time that I did not allow any discriminations I did not say what was in the bill or what I meant to say. I have repeated over and over again that I do allow all the discriminations which difference of distance gives.

Mr. RICE. I am trying to show that your bill does not allow them

Mr. REAGAN. All right.

Mr. RICE. I am perfectly aware of what the gentleman claims.

The gentleman from Illinois, Mr. Sparks, supporting this bill in the Forty-sixth Congress, echoed the declaration and complaint. He lives at Carlyle, forty-seven miles east from Saint Louis, and yet the railroad charges 88 cents for carrying a barrel of flour from Saint Louis to Baltimore and a dollar from Carlyle to Baltimore. Here is discrimination with a vengeance, which no one with half an eye can fail to see. And yet probably these charges are just and fair, and to reverse them and charge the same or less for the shorter distance would be unjust and unfair. Galveston fronts on the sea. Commerce comes to her not only by steam on the rail, but by steam and sail on the water from every part of the world. Nature, not the railroad company, has discriminated in favor of Galveston. The railroad must bring to her freight as cheap as it comes by water or not bring it at all. Palestine is an interior town, enjoying the great honor of being the residence of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, but I doubt if it would enjoy the added advantage of a railroad were it not for the freight which passes through it en route to and from Galveston.

I have not been able to find Carlyle on any map. I doubt not it is a respectable town in Southern Illinois. The gentleman from Illinois said that it is a way station on the Ohio and Mississippi Railroad, forty-seven miles east from East Saint Louis. But Saint Louis is not a way station on a single line of road. She is the proud mistress of the Mississippi and the Missouri, and has five great railroads pointing east. Nature has discriminated against Carlyle in favor of Saint Louis.

Saint Louis gathers in the commerce from an imperial domain and distributes it to its various points of destination. She has all the facilities for doing this on a large scale and economically. Extensive grounds, full corps of experienced employés, elevators, cattle-yards, all the improved appliances of railroading. Carlyle has not these, and in the nature of things never will have them. The ingenuity of the gentleman from Illinois can not devise legislation which will make her the commercial equal of Saint Louis, or make it just that the railroad shall gather up her scattered and irregular car-loads of freight slowly and inconveniently, and transport them to Baltimore for the same price as from Saint Louis, although the distance were several times forty-seven miles less.

The gentleman from Texas says that he does not mean to take away but to limit this power of discrimination as to places; that he allows them (the railroads) all the margins of the differences of distance, and provides that they shall not charge more for the shorter than the longer distance, while there is nothing in the bill to prevent them from charging as much. What does the gentleman mean by this rule? Where does the distance begin to run and where does it end? Does the distance begin at the western terminus of railroads on the Pacific, or at some middle point, at Kansas City, or Saint Louis, or Chicago? Are the grain freights to be reckoned from Bismarck or Saint Paul or Chicago? By what rule are these questions to be settled?

Mr. REAGAN. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will allow me I will answer that question. The bill defines explicitly where they are to be. All the road operated by one company is one haul; any railroad and all the road, controlled by it constitutes one haul.

Mr. RICE. There is no question but one corporation controls the road from Saint Louis to New York.

Mr. REAGAN. If that be so, that is one haul.

Mr. RICE. Then your bill provides there shall be no more charged for hauling to any point between San Francisco and New York than is charged——

Mr. REAGAN. There is no one road from San Francisco to New York.

Mr. RICE. But the entire line from San Francisco to New York is controlled by the same management.

Mr. REAGAN. The provision of the bill would require from each road, each separate road, that the charge should be no more for a longer than for a shorter distance.

Mr. RICE. That is not what the bill says. The provision applies to each road or each line of roads controlled by the same company. Now the same management, without a doubt, controls the line from Saint Louis to New York.

Mr. REAGAN. If the gentleman will allow me, what he says is against his own argument, because it would show freights can be taken as cheap from Saint Louis to New York as from any intermediate points.

Mr. RICE. But your position prevents any discrimination of freight between the terminal and interterminal points; that is, between the entire haul from Saint Louis to New York and shorter hauls, excepting that the rates shall not be greater anywhere than from Saint Louis to New York.

Mr. REAGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. RICE. That is, you take a barrel of flour and carry it from Saint Louis to New York. You take another barrel of flour from Carlyle, forty-seven miles on this side of Saint Louis. Say one is a 2,500-mile haul and the other 2,453 miles. And yet, with all the inconveniences of stopping to take up the flour at a way station, you would not allow the company to charge more for that barrel of flour for a haul forty-seven miles less than for a barrel of flour carried from Saint Louis, with five competing roads and with all the advantages of grounds, elevators, force, and all the vast amount of freight taken from there.

Is it intended that freight may be charged as much from Buffalo to New York as from San Francisco to New York? If so, why not charge more from Chicago than from Buffalo and more from Denver than from Chicago? If this is allowed, more is charged from Chicago than from San Francisco, and the rule is broken; if not, the rule is simply ridiculous and would be laughed at in any country debating society. But there is another difficulty in the way. All the lines from San Francisco or Chicago to New York are not single lines or under a single management. The freight that is paid for a car-load of corn from Kansas to New York may be distributed among possibly twenty railroads. Each receives its share prorated according to agreed rule. The effect of this rule, then, would be to prohibit any single line from taking less for its share of the long freight than it takes for its local freight. The car-load of grain from Kansas or Iowa must pay just as much from the point where it strikes the New York Central as the car-load of grain, if not of any merchandise, taken at that point pays to the terminus.

Is it possible that the advocates of this bill believe that the produce of the West, the beef of Texas and the grain of Iowa, can pay the local rates through every State and still be sold in Liverpool in competition with that grown on the Black Sea and the Mediterranean? It is the sale of that vast production in the markets of Europe that has changed the balance of trade in our favor, and built up the imperial commonwealths of the West and Northwest. It is an advantage to the railroads to carry it at such rates as will sell it in Europe, because they add the amounts so earned to their gross receipts, and by so doing are able to decrease their local rates, not forced to increase them, as is argued, to make up their losses.

If the rule in the Reagan bill should be enforced, many of the railroads of the Northwest would suspend operation, the grain would rot on the prairies, and the cattle of Texas would multiply and die on their native plains in the untamed freedom of nature.

I scarcely believe that gentlemen desire this result, but it is clear as a mathematical demonstration that such is the end toward which they are laboring.

THE REAGAN BILL DESTROYS COMPETITION AND CREATES MONOPOLIES.

The gentleman from Texas seeks to prevent the people from being deprived "of the advantages of competition in freight charges and the rates of transportation on railroads."

No device for depriving them of these advantages could be conceived more admirably adapted to the purpose than his bill. Let us suppose three cities severally situated at the angles of a triangle; a railroad is built between the cities at the base angles. By and by another finds its way around through the city at the apex angle. That city alone has not business enough to support it, but it competes with the first railroad between the cities at the base. This affords them the advantages of competition which the gentleman seeks to promote; but the distance around is longer than on the base line, and the freight must be carried by the longer road at as low or even a less rate than is charged by the shorter.

This it can afford to do if it can charge the same local rates for interterminal points as are charged by its competitor, but this bill forces the scaling down of these also, and the second road would be ruined and the people lose the advantages of competition. There are twenty different possible routes by which freight may be moved between Atlanta and Saint Louis, but one line is shorter than all the rest, and shorter than the longest by more than a thousand miles. Atlanta is growing rapidly from the advantages of her position. This bill would deprive her of the advantages of competition between twenty routes to Saint Louis and place her at the mercy of one.

Mr. REAGAN. I regret to interrupt the gentleman so frequently, and hope he will pardon me. But there is nothing in the bill on which to predicate such a hypothesis as he has now stated; there is nothing to compare freights by competing roads; only they shall not pool freights. In the case the gentleman puts each road makes its charges, and all it has to do is not to discriminate for one as against another. As between the different roads there is nothing about comparing their rates with each other.

Mr. RICE. Will the gentleman allow me a moment? I desire we shall meet each other exactly. Here is a road between two cities two hundred miles long. Here is another road going another route between the same termini three hundred miles long. Now this second road can only carry freight between the terminal points as cheaply as the other does.

Mr. REAGAN. There is nothing in the bill requiring that.

Mr. RICE. It can not compete with the other road and carry the freight if it charges higher rates.

Mr. REAGAN. What I want to say is that any basis for the gentleman's hypothesis does not exist in the bill. It only provides that rates on each road shall not be discriminative.

Mr. RICE. Can the longer road carry the freight except at the same rate as the shorter road with any chance of competition?

Mr. REAGAN. In relation to that, I have gone all the time upon the theory that it was not right to make one set of persons pay for the freight of another.

Mr. RICE. That is just what I am arguing, that your bill destroys this competition—this opportunity for competition. I think we understand each other now.

But this is not the only way by which it contrives to deprive the people of the advantages of competition. The provision requiring the posting up of schedules in all the depots giving the rates to every place to which freight can go from that place, and keeping them in force in every particular for five days after notice of a change, under penalty of a fine of $1,000 upon every director or officer of any railroad violating the provision, would of itself strike a death-blow at competition, and force a combination of all competing roads. The managers of these roads are no longer robber barons, but practical and able business men of these United States. It would be practically impossible for them to do business, each watching for the chance to get five days' advantage of every other in a change of rates, and the result would inevitably be a pool or combination, not voluntary and elastic as now, but arbitrary and forced together by the iron links of law.

The gentleman from Texas is actuated by the highest purposes, and is honestly and ably striving to work out the public good by the measure of which he is the leading and acknowledged champion, but he is walking in a path which has been trodden before and never with success. Other governments have attempted to control by legislation the details of railroad management and have abandoned the effort in obedience to the very interests they sought to promote. The government of a free and civilized people must not govern too much. It may watch and develop, but it must not hamper and check by minute interference. The internal commerce of this nation is its life. Through many and various channels it ebbs and flows, diverse yet ever intermingling, "distinct as the billows, yet one as the sea." The gentleman from Texas will find any attempt to fetter or to curb it, to check or divert its natural currents, to be as impotent as the act of the Eastern despot when he flung his chains on the swelling waves of the Hellespont.

THE COMMITTEE'S BILL.

The bill of the committee follows in the main experienced advice and successful precedents. It declares certain general principles everywhere recognized as applicable to common carriers. It provides remedies for the violation of those principles and creates over the whole a supervisory commission to represent the Government, and, at its expense and with its authority, protect the people from these abuses of which they have too often with good reason complained.

This bill is based upon the principles and largely copied from the provisions of laws which have been in successful operation in England, in Massachusetts, and in some other of the States of the Union for several years past.

In 1873 a board of railway commissioners was established in England, with large powers of supervision and control over the railways of the kingdom. It was given larger powers than are provided in this bill or than are believed necessary in this country. Its workings have been satisfactory. Its experience proves the efficacy of single decisions to settle classes of similar cases, and goes far to dispose of the objection that a commission can not manage all the business to which it would be necessarily called to attend. Its reports show that it was called upon to decide during the first year of its organization, in 1875, six cases; in 1876, seven cases; in 1877, nineteen cases; in 1878, twenty-four cases.

These decisions were sufficient to settle all the disputes which were brought before it, and certainly show a light docket for a tribunal over 16,000 miles of railway, representing three billions of investment.

In 1869 a board of railroad commissioners was established in Massachusetts, whose powers, as in the bill now under consideration, were mainly only to supervise, advise, and report to the Legislature. No railroad corporation has yet been found in the State which has dared to face an adverse recommendation of that commission made in a legislative report. The people of a city where several roads center and have their several depots imagine that it would be better that all should join in a union depot; the railroads object; the commissioners concur in the opinion of the people, and the corporations leave their old plants and put themselves down at the common junction.

The most powerful railroad corporation in the State maintained for many years its depot in the city of Boston at a point where its trains incommoded the public ways. It had been there for fifty years and had created the very travel which complained of its obstructions. It was reluctant to incur the expense and inconvenience of removal. The commissioners examined the matter and informally suggested the advisability of a removal. The suggestion was unheeded. A formal hearing was then had, and a report prepared showing the reasons why the company should remove from its old depot and build a new one. No further action was necessary. The company began building operations at once, and the massive walls of a new depot have arisen in a spot where the public travel will not be incommoded. A short time since the grain-dealers of the State found themselves undersold by a competitor whom they suspected received special favors from the same corporation above referred to. They complained to the commissioners; an examination was had; the suspicions were confirmed; a report was published stating the facts, and I do not believe any more favors will be shown to favored dealers by railroads in future. The instrumentalities by which the great problem of railroad management, and the proper relations between them and the public they serve, are to be worked out are—

First. By federation among themselves, agreeing when they can, and when they can not submitting their differences to a board of arbitration.

Second. By the establishment of State boards of commissioners upon a common plan and in frequent communication with one another.

Third. By the establishment of a national board of commissioners, supervising the whole field, watching, suggesting, reporting, occupying to the public the same position which the agents agreed upon in the plan of federation occupy to the railroads.

I am aware that this plan does not adopt the "heroic treatment" so ardently advocated by some gentlemen and formulated in the Reagan bill, but I think it provides a remedy more quiet, more healthy, and far more efficient. It fixes the public eye upon these mighty agents of commerce and informs the public mind how they are discharging their vast and responsible duties. It lets "the bright sunshine of publicity" into every railroad office in the land, and creates a public opinion mightier than law, more potent to reform than fines or imprisonments, to which railroads as well as the earnest gentleman from Kansas and myself must yield. Before it, enlightened and stimulated by intelligent and authoritative information, monopolies, no matter how strong, must yield, and wrong, no matter how intrenched, give place to right.

Mr. BARKSDALE obtained the floor.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield for that motion?

Mr. BARKSDALE. I do.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. GREENLEAF, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the case of Isaac F. Quinby, applying for a pension, no adverse report having been made thereon.

REPORT OF COMMISSION ON SIGNAL SERVICE, ETC.

Mr. LOWRY. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table for present consideration joint resolution (S. R. 98) extending the time fixed for the joint commission appointed under the sundry civil act approved July 7, 1884, to submit their report. The time fixed by the existing law for making the report will expire next Monday, and the extension proposed by this resolution is necessary.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the joint commission appointed under the act of Congress approved July 7, 1884, to consider the present organization of the Signal Service, Geological Survey, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and the Hydrographic Office of the Navy Department, with the view to secure greater efficiency and economy of administration of the public service in said bureaus, shall report on the first Monday in January, A. D. 1885, or as soon thereafter as practicable, in lieu of the third Monday in December, 1884, as required by said act.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was taken from the Speaker's table, read three times, and passed.

Mr. LOWRY moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC PROPERTY AT BANGOR, ME.

Mr. BOUTELLE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 7668) for the protection of the public building and property at Bangor, in the State of Maine; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

The motion of Mr. OATES that the House adjourn was then agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BARBOUR: Papers relating to the claim of James G. Field, administrator of Edmund Backers—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. BARKSDALE: Papers relating to the claim of Milton S. Haire—to the same committee.

By Mr. T. M. BROWNE: Petition of 108 citizens and ex-Union soldiers of Delaware County, Indiana, praying for the passage of the Mexican war pension bill and amendments—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CALDWELL: Papers relating to the claim of Ann Hanlon, "superioress" of St. Cecilia Academy, Davidson County, Tennessee—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. CANNON: Petition of James Lucas and others, praying for the passage of the Mexican pension bill—to the Select Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay.

By Mr. CLAY: Petition of the pages of the House, for an appropriation to pay them salary due under resolution adopted unanimously by the House July 7, 1884—to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. CLEMENTS: Papers relating to the claim of George W. F. Lamkin—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. S. S. COX: Petition of ship brokers, masters, and seamen, &c., for the repeal of part of the Dingley law—to the Select Committee on American Ship-building and Ship-owning Interests.

Also, petition of Thomas W. Robertson and 572 others, employés of the custom-house service of New York city, asking for an appropriation to reimburse them for 10 per cent. retained salary for the period of ten months from December, 1875, to October, 1876—to the Committee on Appropriations.

Also, petition of the chairman and executive committee of the American Industrial League; of merchants, brokers of New York and Boston, and of 1,350 workers on clocks, in favor of amending the tariff on foreign clocks and wraps of wool—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. R. T. DAVIS: Memorial of citizens of New Bedford, on Indian affairs—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. DEUSTER: Petition of John Rising and others, asking a pension for Christian Hable—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DINGLEY: Petition of Frederick Robie and 900 officers and soldiers of Maine regiments in the war, that a pension may be granted to Mrs. Sarah S. Sampson—to the same committee.

By Mr. DOCKERY: Petition of citizens of Daviess County, Missouri, asking the passage of the Mexican war pension bill—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. DUNN: Petition of citizens of Phillips County, Arkansas, in favor of a national bankrupt act—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. GEORGE: A bill for the improvement of certain rivers and harbors on the Pacific coast—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Also, petition of merchants and salmon-packers of Oregon, asking for full drawback on imported goods manufactured and exported—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. GOFF: Petition of Wheeling Iron and Nail Company, and M. Reiley, Augustus Pollock, and others, requesting the passage of a bankrupt law—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. D. B. HENDERSON: Petition of Miss Kate Monroe, of Dubuque, Iowa, praying for pensions to be granted to the destitute children of the soldiers of 1812—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. HILL: Petition of J. T. Templeton and 100 others, citizens of Swanton, Ohio, asking for the passage of the Mexican pension bill and amendments—to the same committee.

By Mr. HOLMAN: Petition of J. H. Woolford, Ison Ross, T. J. Humphreys, and 17 others, citizens of Madison, Ind., in behalf of a just and equitable system of bankruptcy—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. HORR: Petition of ex-Union soldiers, for the equalization of bounties—to the Select Committee on Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay.

By Mr. KLEINER: Petition of David H. Eells, a soldier of the Seminole war, for a pension—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. LEWIS: Petition of Lucius J. Seals, for reference of his claim to Court of Claims to correct errors in decision of late Southern Claims Commission—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. LOVERING: Petition of General Landes Post, No. 5, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Massachusetts, for publication in Official Records of the War of the Rebellion of photographic illustrations—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MAYBURY: Petition for the release of the reversionary rights of the Government of the United States to a certain block in the city of Detroit, State of Michigan—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. MILLIKEN: Petition of members of the National Home for Disabled Soldiers, at Togus, Me.; also of members of the Grand Army of the Republic, for the passage of the Mexican pension bill and Senate amendments—severally to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. MURRAY: Petitions of William J. McPherson, Samuel Will, James Young, and William Crumley, for pensions—severally to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the petition of Andrew J. Konkle, late major Seventh Regiment Ohio Light Artillery, for arrears of pension—to the same committee.

By Mr. O'FERRALL: Petition of Gabriel H. Hill, late lieutenant, &c., United States Army, for removal of disabilities, &c.—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. CHARLES O'NEILL: An act for the improvement of the harbor of Philadelphia—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. POLAND: Petition of Emily L. Alvord, widow of the late Paymaster-General Benjamin Alvord, for a pension—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. PRICE: Petition of A. W. Hubbard and 50 others, favoring the passage of the Mexican pension bill as amended—to the same committee.

By Mr. RICE: Petition of P. A. Beaman and others, Princeton, Mass., for the abolition of internal excise duties—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of Charles Devens Post, No. 27, G. A. R., Department of Massachusetts, for publication in Official Records of the War of the Rebellion of photographic illustrations—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. RIGGS: Papers relating to the pension claim (H. R. 7422) of Alexander Hall—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, papers relative to H. R. 3155 for the relief of James T. Dodson—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. RYAN: Petition of citizens of Kansas, for the passage of the Mexican pension bill and amendments—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SINGLETON: Papers relating to the claim of William B. Sims—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. H. Y. SMITH: Petition of Mary J. Dickson, for a pension, &c.—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SPOONER: Petition of Music Teachers' National Association and 1,419 others, citizens of several States, for the passage of the Dorsheimer bill, or similar bill, for an international copyright law—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SPRINGER: Memorial of Lorenzo Durham, for the passage of a bill for his relief—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, memorial of Benjamin F. Fox, praying for the passage of a bill to confer jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear and determine his claim—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. STEVENS: Petitions of citizens of Lockport, N. Y., asking for the passage of the bill granting pensions to soldiers in the war with Mexico as amended by the Senate—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, petition of Josiah Scott, to be placed on the pension-rolls—to the same committee.

By Mr. CHARLES STEWART: Bill for continuing the work of harbor improvement at Sabine Pass and Blue Buck Bar, Texas; also, bill for continuing improvement of Buffalo Bayou, Texas—severally to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. TOWNSHEND: Petition of 52 citizens of Ohio, praying for the passage of the Mexican pension bill—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. VANCE: Statement giving names of clerks employed at night copying names of pensioners from old to new rolls, &c.—to the Committee on Appropriations.

Also, letters of honorable Third Auditor, relative to extra labor of clerks in his office in April, May, June, and July, 1883—to the same committee.

By Mr. A. J. WARNER: Petition of W. A. Adair, M. D., and others, citizens of Athens County, Ohio, praying that the bill pensioning Samuel D. Stiles may be passed—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. E. B. WINANS: Petition of W. E. Hamilton, J. P. Tremfer, and 75 other soldiers of Clinton County, Michigan, praying for the speedy passage of the Mexican pension bill—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. YAPLE: Petition of Samuel B. Corbus, and others, citizens of Saint Louis, Mich., for the passage of the Mexican pension bill with amendments—to the same committee.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 9, 1884.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs relative to the failure of the Utah and Northern Railway Company to compensate the Indians upon the Fort Hall reservation, in Idaho, for the right of way and lands taken and used for the purposes of its road constructed through that reservation; which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 289) authorizing the Superintendent of the Census to continue the work on the Tenth Census was read twice by its title, and referred to the Select Committee to make provision for taking the Tenth Census and ascertaining the results thereof.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Petitions and memorials are now in order.

Mr. HALE. Before proceeding to the first order I ask to take up the naval appropriation bill so as to make a motion upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 4716) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, which is pending between the two Houses on amendments of the Senate, be now taken up for consideration. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The bill is before the Senate. The last action of the two Houses will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, July 1, 1884.

Resolved, That the House further insist upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4716) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, and ask a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That Mr. RANDALL, Mr. HOLMAN, and Mr. CALKINS be the managers of said conference on the part of the House.

IN SENATE, July 2, 1884.

Resolved, That the Senate further insist upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 4716) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the further conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That Mr. HALE, Mr. LOGAN, and Mr. BECK be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It appears from the Journal of the Senate that on the 7th of July the Senate conferees reported that the conference committee had been unable to agree. The bill is now before the Senate for its action.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate further insist upon its amendments and that a new conference be appointed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate further insist upon its amendments to the bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and ask for a further conference thereon with the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to; and by unanimous consent the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Messrs. HALE, LOGAN, and BECK were appointed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MILLER, of California, presented a petition on behalf of the manufacturers and canners of fruits, &c., on the Pacific coast, who use imported materials in the manufacture of articles for export, praying that section 3019 of the Revised Statutes be so amended as to allow a drawback on articles wholly manufactured of imported materials equal in amount to the duties paid on such materials; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I present a petition of the Grand Lodge of Good Templars of California, officially signed, representing 18,873 members, praying for a constitutional amendment to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors for drinking purposes. I do not know to what committee the petition should be referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is under the impression that this subject has hitherto been under the consideration of the Committee on Education and Labor, and if there be no objection this petition will be referred to that committee.

Mr. SABIN presented a petition of the Good Templars of Minnesota, officially signed, representing 4,516 members, praying for a constitutional amendment to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating beverages; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. MANDERSON presented a memorial of citizens of Nebraska, Utah, and Wyoming, remonstrating against the proposed governmental control of the telegraph; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. DAWES presented the petition of Mary A. Livermore and L. B. Barrett, president and secretary of the Massachusetts Women's Christian Temperance Union, with an aggregate membership of 10,000 women, praying for a constitutional amendment prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. FRYE presented a petition of the board of managers of the National Temperance Society, officially signed, praying for the passage of the pending bill to provide for a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. MITCHELL. I present a memorial of the National Window Glass Workers' Association of Pittsburgh, Pa., urging the passage of the bill to prevent importation of foreign labor under contract. I do not know whether the bill is in the committee or before the Senate.

Mr. MILLER, of California. The bill is on the Calendar, and the petition ought to lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be laid on the table, if there be no objection.

Mr. MITCHELL. I also present a similar memorial from the Knights of Labor of Pennsylvania, which I move lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL presented a petition of the Women's Temperance Union of Pennsylvania, officially signed, praying for a constitutional amendment to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating beverages; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. BLAIR presented a petition of the board of managers of the National Temperance Society, officially signed, praying for the prohibition of the liquor traffic in the District of Columbia and the Territories and for increased penalties for the illegal sale of intoxicating liquors to Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented the petition of Mrs. Ann Atkinson, granddaughter of George Mason, of Virginia, praying for an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. LOGAN presented the petition of Rhoden Mitchell, of North Carolina, praying compensation for services rendered by him as laborer under the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2375) to authorize the increase of the capital stock of the Commercial National Bank of Chicago, reported it without amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 2422) for the erection of a statue to the memory of General La Fayette; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2423) for the relief of Wilbur F. Hinman; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2424) for the relief of Benjamin F. Scribner and John W. Beaman; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MILLER, of California, introduced a bill (S. 2425) to amend section 3019 of the Revised Statutes, relating to drawback of duties on imported materials when manufactured and exported; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HAWLEY introduced a bill (S. 2426) to empower the President to reappoint not more than two persons as first lieutenants in the Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CAMDEN introduced a bill (S. 2427) granting a pension to William Richardson; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GARLAND introduced a bill (S. 2428) granting a pension to Margaret B. Harwood; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. LOGAN introduced a bill (S. 2429) for the relief of Moses M. Bane; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. LAPHAM introduced a bill (S. 2430) to amend section 2805 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, so as to allow oaths to be administered by notaries public in the district of New York; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. HOAR, it was Ordered, That the petition of Enoch Spencer be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

GALVESTON HARBOR IMPROVEMENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. "Concurrent or other resolutions" are in order.

Mr. COKE. I move that the Senate at 2 o'clock on Monday, the 15th instant, take up and consider the bill (S. 1652) to provide for the improvement of the channel between Galveston Harbor and the Gulf of Mexico.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator to give notice that he will move to take up the bill at that time.

Mr. COKE. I make the motion now, if in order, to make the bill a special order for 2 o'clock on Monday, the 15th of December.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas asks unanimous consent—it requiring unanimous consent at this time—to take up, for the purpose of moving that it be made a special order at a future time, the bill (S. 1652) to provide for the improvement of the channel between Galveston Harbor and the Gulf of Mexico. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill for that purpose?

Mr. HARRISON. I gave notice last week that I should to-day call up for consideration the bill for the admission of the Territory of Dakota as a State. I therefore object to the consideration of the Senator's bill now, as it is brought forward in a shape to antagonize the bill of which I gave earlier notice.

Mr. COKE. I will state——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. COKE. This is a very important bill. I desire to appoint some time at which it shall be taken up and considered, and if I had the right of way for it on the Calendar I should be very accommodating in yielding to other measures.

Mr. HARRISON. I shall of course interpose no objection to the Senator naming some time when he will address the Senate upon the bill, but under the circumstances I can hardly consent to its being taken up now, unless the Senator intends to take it up and then postpone it to a particular day.

Mr. COKE. I simply ask that it be taken up now for the purpose of fixing the 15th day of this month, at 2 o'clock, as the time when it shall be considered.

Mr. HARRISON. To that, of course, I have no objection.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MCMILLAN. I do not desire that the bill shall be made a special order for any time so early in the session as the date suggested by the Senator from Texas. The report of the majority of the committee was laid upon the tables of Senators yesterday morning, and it is desirable that the minority of the Committee on Commerce shall have the privilege of looking at that report. Perhaps there may be some views of the minority submitted to the Senate if it should seem advisable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the duty of the Chair to repeat that debate on the request of the Senator from Texas is not in order. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MCMILLAN. Therefore I must object for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. MCMILLAN. If the Senator——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. "Concurrent or other resolutions" are in order.

RICHARD HAWLEY & SONS.

Mr. COCKRELL. At the request of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER], and as a matter of courtesy which affords me a great deal of pleasure, I move to reconsider the vote taken yesterday upon the bill (S. 1170) for the relief of Richard Hawley & Sons, by which the Senate refused to order the engrossment and third reading of the bill. I desire to enter the motion in order that the Senator from Michigan may have an opportunity of presenting certain statistics and data in regard to it. I want the motion entered, and then I desire it to lie over until it is the pleasure of the Senator from Michigan to call it up. As a matter of course I do not in making this motion change my view at all in regard to the bill, nor shall I vote for the motion to reconsider when it comes before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the motion to reconsider made by the Senator from Missouri will be entered.

Mr. CONGER. I suppose while that motion is pending the bill will be restored to its place upon the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be restored to its proper place upon the Calendar under a motion to reconsider. The Chair is not advised at this moment where it will come in under the rule.

If there be no "concurrent or other resolutions" that order is closed, and the Chair lays before the Senate the Calendar under the eighth rule.

FORFEITURE OF OREGON LAND GRANT.

Mr. SLATER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 181) to declare forfeiture of certain lands granted to aid in the construction of a railroad in Oregon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order on a motion of this kind under the rules.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire simply to repeat that there was notice given of another order——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the Senator from Indiana making remarks upon this subject?

Mr. HARRISON. I hope the motion will be voted down.

The question being put, it was declared that the noes appeared to prevail.

Mr. SLATER. I must call for the yeas and nays on agreeing to my motion. It is a very important matter.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and having been taken, the result was announced—yeas 29, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—29.

Bayard,	Colquitt,	Lamar,	Vance,
Beck,	Dolph,	McPherson,	Van Wyck,
Brown,	Garland,	Maxey,	Vest,
Butler,	Groome,	Morgan,	Walker,

Fair,	Jackson,	Miller of N. Y.,	Voorhees.
Farley,	Jones of Florida,	Palmer,
George,	Jones of Nevada,	Plumb,
Gibson,	Kenna,	Saulsbury,

So the motion was not agreed to.

ADMISSION OF DAKOTA.

Mr. HARRISON. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1682) to enable the people of that part of the Territory of Dakota south of the forty-sixth parallel of north latitude to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of the State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes.

The question being put, there were, on a division—ayes 33, noes 22.

Mr. VEST. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and having been taken, resulted—yeas 34, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—34.

Aldrich,	Edmunds,	Logan,	Sabin,
Allison,	Frye,	McMillan,	Sawyer,
Blair,	Hale,	Manderson,	Sewell,
Cameron of Pa.,	Harrison,	Miller of Cal.,	Sheffield,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hawley,	Mitchell,	Sherman,

Fair,	Harris,	Lamar,	Voorhees.
Farley,	Jackson,	Mahone,
George,	Jones of Florida,	Miller of N. Y.
Gibson,	Jones of Nevada,	Palmer,

So the motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and it will be read at length.

Mr. SHERMAN. As what is called the Dakota bill is now taken up, I suggest that by unanimous consent we proceed with the Calendar until 2 o'clock, the usual time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pending the consideration of the bill now before the Senate, the Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the Calendar be proceeded with under Rule VIII until 2 o'clock, without displacing the order now before the Senate. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The first case on the Calendar under Rule VIII is Order of Business 325, being Senate bill 1742

ALBERT T. STREAM.

The bill (S. 1742) to authorize Albert T. Stream, keeper of life-saving station at Shoalwater Bay, Washington Territory, to accept a medal awarded to him by the British Government was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is there a report in that case?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a report.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read, please.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. MILLER, of California, March 6, 1884:

The British bark Lammerlaw, bound from Australia to Portland, Oreg., with a cargo of coal, stranded on the North Breaker, at the entrance of Shoalwater Bay, Washington Territory, at about 5 o'clock on the morning of October 30, 1881. A heavy southwest gale was blowing at the time, and the sea was very rough and swept over the vessel as soon as she stranded, so that the crew were forced, for the most part, to take to the rigging to save their lives. The point at which the vessel stranded was about nine miles from the shore. The facts, as stated in the official report of the affair to the Treasury Department, show that Albert T. Stream, keeper of the life-saving station at Shoalwater Bay, being without a crew, collected such volunteers as he could, and in the midst of the greatest perils and at the imminent risk of his life rowed out to the vessel and rescued the entire crew, comprising some fifteen persons. He was first apprised of the stranding of the bark at about 8.30 a. m. of the 30th of October, but, notwithstanding all of his efforts to secure the necessary assistance, it was not until the evening of the 31st that he succeeded in getting all of the crew off the wreck. During all of this time the storm raged without abatement, and shortly after the rescue was effected the bark sank, leaving nothing but her spars to mark the spot where she lay. The rescued seamen saved nothing but the clothing on their persons. The bark went to pieces and the cargo was entirely lost.

In recognition of the humanity and noble heroism displayed by Mr. Stream on this occasion the British Government has tendered him a medal, and the same is now in the hands of the Secretary of State, who has recommended that the Congress shall take the necessary action to enable Mr. Stream to accept the reward which he so manfully won.

The committee therefore report herewith a bill to authorize Mr. Stream to accept this medal, and recommend its passage by the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WIDOW OF GENERAL MOORE.

The joint resolution (S. R. 37) allowing the widow of General Jesse H. Moore, late consul at Callao, Peru, one year's salary was announced as next in order.

Mr. SHERMAN. There being an adverse report in that case, I ask that it may go over.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is an adverse report. I object to its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This resolution was adversely reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations. It is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COCKRELL. I object to its consideration.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. MILLER, of California. We may as well dispose of it, and I move——

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly; I withdraw my objection if a motion is made to indefinitely postpone the measure.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California moves that the joint resolution be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution:

A bill (S. 1309) to provide statuary and historical tablets for the Saratoga monument; and

A joint resolution (S. R. 98) extending the time fixed for the joint commission appointed under the sundry civil act approved July 7, 1884, to submit their report.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 5707) to authorize the increase of the capital stock of the First National Bank of Larned, Kans., not to exceed $250,000; and

A bill (H. R. 6865) to amend section 2805 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, so as to allow oaths to be administered by notaries public.

FORFEITURE OF OREGON LAND GRANT.

Mr. DOLPH. The Senate undoubtedly refused to take up Senate bill No. 428 on the motion of my colleague, for the reason that a majority of the Senate had determined to take up the bill of which notice was given by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON], but Senate bill 428 evidently will come up soon. I now present, if in order, and if not I ask unanimous consent to present, an amendment to be printed to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon presents an amendment to Senate bill 428 which he intends to offer when the bill shall be under consideration. If there be no objection the amendment will be received and printed.

STEPHEN N. SMITH.

The bill (S. 180) for the relief of Stephen N. Smith was announced as regularly in order on the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that bill pass over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is objected to and goes over.

FORT WORTH AND DENVER CITY RAILWAY.

The bill (S. 1502) to grant a right of way to the Fort Worth and Denver City Railway Company through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. HARRISON. I believe I will interpose an objection to that bill. We can not consider it under the five-minute rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is objected to and goes over.

COLUMBIA AND COLVILLE RESERVATIONS INDIANS.

The bill (S. 1010) to accept and ratify an agreement between the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and Chief Moses and other Indians of the Columbia and Colville reservations, in Washington Territory, and to make the necessary appropriations for carrying the same into effect, was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill was reported by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] from the Committee on Indian Affairs on the 6th of March, 1884. It does not appear from the Calendar that the bill has been read the second time, but the filing on the bill shows that it has been. The Chair thinks that the filing is the correct entry. The bill will be read at length.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to have that bill passed over for the present. I think its substance was inserted in the Indian appropriation bill of last year.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. DAWES. I am not certain as to the fact I have stated, but such is my impression.

C. S. MOSS.

The bill (S. 493) for the relief of C. S. Moss was announced as next in order.

Mr. HARRIS. Let that be informally passed over if there be no objection. There is an adverse report, I see, and the bill was introduced by me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed over, retaining its place at the head of the Calendar under Rule VIII. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

TEXAS PACIFIC RAILROAD GRANT.

The bill (H. R. 3933) to declare a forfeiture of lands granted to the Texas Pacific Railroad Company, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. MORGAN. That is, of course, a very important bill and there are a majority and a minority report upon it. The minority report in this case brings up a question that was considered by the Senate just before the conclusion of the last session upon the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad land forfeiture bill, and the Senate passed an amendment which I had the honor to offer referring some questions which arose in the case, and arise in this also, to the courts for adjudication. That bill went to the House of Representatives and the House refused to concur in the amendment of the Senate and asked a conference. The conferees have been appointed on the part of both bodies. The conference in that case will determine the question as to whether the Houses can come together upon the amendment that I offered to the other bill and which I shall, of course, offer to this. I ask the Senate to postpone the consideration of this bill for one week from to-day and make it the special order for 2 o'clock, because I believe by that time the conference committee can ascertain what the temper of the two Houses is upon this legal proposition, and we can then proceed with this bill with some degree of satisfaction and intelligence.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the Chair will entertain the motion to postpone before the reading of the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. Why not let it be laid aside informally?

Mr. MORGAN. I thought as the measure was one of such great importance Senators would like to know the time it was coming up and prepare themselves, and so I ask that it be postponed to a day certain.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the question being taken on the postponement of the bill and that it be made the special order before the bill is read. The Senator from Alabama moves that this bill be postponed until Tuesday next at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, and be made the special order for that time.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Chair whether that would interfere with the unfinished business of the day before?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It would not.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I see no objection to it.

The motion was agreed to, two-thirds of the Senators present voting in favor thereof.

THE VETO POWER.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask the consent of the Senate that Order of Business 500, being Senate joint resolution No. 18, be set down to be taken up on Wednesday (to-morrow) week, the day following that set for the bill suggested by the Senator from Alabama. It is a joint resolution proposing an amendment to article 1, section 7, clause 2, of the Constitution of the United States, in relation to the veto power. It is a matter of very great importance and I should like to have it brought before the Senate as early as possible.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent that Order of Business 500, being the joint resolution (S. R. 18) proposing an amendment to article 1, section 7, clause 2, of the Constitution of the United States, in relation to the veto power, be now taken up with a view of moving that it be made the special order for a week from to-morrow. Is there objection to its being now considered? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Illinois moves that this resolution be postponed until a week from to-morrow (Wednesday) at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, and be made the special order for that time. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

The motion was agreed to, two-thirds of the Senators present voting in favor thereof.

CHEROKEE RESERVATION IN ARKANSAS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1574) to provide for the sale of the Cherokee reservation in the State of Arkansas.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, in section 3, line 17, after the word "laws," to insert "or their applications under the homestead laws;" so as to read:

Provided, That all such parties shall file their declaratory statements under the pre-emption laws, or their applications under the homestead laws, within three months from date of receipt by the local land officers of instructions under this act from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and make proof and payment as in other cases.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COLUMBIA AND COLVILLE RESERVATIONS INDIANS.

Mr. DAWES. I find on consulting the last Indian appropriation bill that I was correct in reference to Order of Business 331, that it has become a law in the Indian appropriation bill, and therefore with the consent of the Senate I ask that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that Order of Business 331, being the bill (S. 1010) to accept and ratify an agreement between the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and Chief Moses and other Indians of the Columbia and Colville reservations, in Washington Territory, and to make the necessary appropriations for carrying the same into effect, be now considered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that this bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

RIGHTS IN LAND GRANTS.

The bill (S. 1445) to provide for the settlement of the rights of the States and of the corporations and persons interested in any grant of lands in aid of railroads and canals which shall be declared forfeited by act of Congress was announced as next in order.

Mr. MORGAN. That bill involves the same question as the bill I referred to a few moments ago, and which was made the special order for this day week. I ask the Senate informally to pass over this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without losing its place. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

RETURN OF REGISTERED LETTERS AND MONEY-ORDERS.

The bill (S. 1018) to amend sections 3929 and 4041 of the Revised Statutes, authorizing the Postmaster-General to prohibit the delivery of registered letters and the payment of money-orders, and providing for the return of the same, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill proposes to amend section 3929 of the Revised Statutes by striking out the word "fraudulent," in the second line of the section; so as to make it read:

The Postmaster-General may, upon evidence satisfactory to him that any person is engaged in conducting any lottery, gift enterprise, or scheme for the distribution of money, or of any real or personal property, by lot, chance, or drawing of any kind, or in conducting any other scheme or device for obtaining money through the mails by means of false or fraudulent pretenses, representations, or promises, instruct postmasters at any post-offices at which registered letters arrive directed to any such person to return all such registered letters to the postmasters at the offices at which they were originally mailed, with the word "fraudulent" plainly written or stamped upon the outside of such letters; and all such letters so returned to such postmasters shall be by them returned to the writers thereof, under such regulations as the Postmaster-General may prescribe. But nothing contained in this title shall be so construed as to authorize any postmaster or other person to open any letter not addressed to himself.

The bill further proposes to amend section 4041 of the Revised Statutes by striking out the word "fraudulent," in the second line; so as to make the section read:

The Postmaster-General may, upon evidence satisfactory to him that any person is engaged in conducting any lottery, gift enterprise, or scheme for the distribution of money, or of any real or personal property, by lot, chance, or drawing of any kind, or in conducting any other scheme or device for obtaining money through the mails by means of false or fraudulent pretenses, representations, or promises, forbid the payment, by any postmaster, to any such person, of any postal money-order drawn to his order or in his favor, and may provide by regulations for the return to the remitter of the sums named in such money-orders. But this shall not authorize any person to open any letter not addressed to himself.

Mr. HOAR. I heard the bill read, I believe, very imperfectly, but it strikes me that it is a very remarkable form of bill to leave to a post-office official to judge, without trial or any other method of procedure, without responsibility, whether a person is engaged in an unlawful business, and on that judgment to deny him all privileges of the mail whatever, whether they relate to that unlawful business or not. That seems to be the effect of the bill as I read it. I should like to ask the Senator who reported it to state what it is.

Mr. JACKSON. I will state to the Senator from Massachusetts that the whole purport of the bill is to amend sections 3929 and 4041 of the Revised Statutes by simply striking out the work "fraudulent." It does not modify or amend the existing law in any respect except to strike out the word "fraudulent."

Section 3894 of the Revised Statutes contains the word "illegal" in reference to lotteries, and by an act passed in July, 1876, that word "illegal" was stricken out of section 3894. The purpose of this bill is to harmonize the other two sections with that section 3894 simply by striking out the word "fraudulent" in relation to lotteries. It does not change the existing law in other respects.

Mr. HOAR. I am in favor, as I suppose all Senators are, of the purpose of the bill; and if it has been carefully considered by my honorable friend from Tennessee, who looks with great care into such matters I know, I shall not undertake on an imperfect hearing to criticise its provisions further.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. HAWLEY. I listened to the reading of the bill, not being familiar with its provisions, and not having heard of it before, and it strikes me that it is open to a criticism in this respect: that it amends an old statute; it provides for striking out a word from an existing statute, so that a certain section of the statutes shall read as follows, &c. It is better usually, it strikes me, to enact the section completely and then say that section so and so is repealed. It avoids confusion in the law.

Mr. JACKSON. That is just what this bill does; it is exactly in that form.

Mr. HAWLEY. I heard it read to this effect, I thought, that the word "fraudulent" is stricken out of sections so and so, so that the said sections shall read as follows.

Mr. JACKSON. Read as follows with that objectionable word stricken out.

Mr. HAWLEY. Does the bill repeal the old section?

Mr. JACKSON. Yes, sir. It says the law shall be as follows with that word stricken out.

Mr. HAWLEY. I make another inquiry. Is there provision made in this for pending prosecutions?

Mr. JACKSON. No, sir.

Mr. GARLAND. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Tennessee to a point in the bill that I have not had time to examine and in which there may be nothing. It appears to be a penal statute, and there is no reservation as to offenses already committed. I think it would be better for the Senator from Tennessee to insert an amendment that offenses already committed under the existing law shall not be included in the provisions of this bill.

Mr. JACKSON. There will be no objection to that sort of an amendment if the Senator from Arkansas will propose it.

Mr. GARLAND. I will draw one in a moment.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to ask the Senator from Tennessee whether it is the purpose of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads in reporting the second section of this bill to prevent the payment of money-orders drawn in favor of a person merely because he may be engaged in an unlawful business, or whether it is the intention of the committee that the money-order shall have some connection with the carrying on of that business? I will read that second section as it is reported here, and I presume I have the right print:

The Postmaster-General may, upon evidence satisfactory to him that any person is engaged in conducting any lottery, gift enterprise, or scheme for the distribution of money, or of any real or personal property, by lot, chance or drawing of any kind, or in conducting any other scheme or device for obtaining money through the mails by means of false or fraudulent pretenses, representations, or promises, instruct postmasters at any post-offices at which registered letters arrive directed to any such person to return all such registered letters to the postmasters at the offices at which they were originally mailed, with the word "fraudulent" plainly written or stamped upon the outside of such letters; and all such letters so returned to such postmasters shall be by them returned to the writers thereof, under such regulations as the Postmaster-General may prescribe. But nothing contained in this title shall be so construed as to authorize any postmaster or other person to open any letter not addressed to himself.

That does not appear to relate, of course, to the registered letters as the first section of the bill does, but as I understand the second section of this bill it defines a certain character of persons, classifies them by the sort of business they are engaged in. If a man "is engaged in conducting any lottery, gift enterprise, or scheme for the distribution of money, or of any real or personal property, by lot, chance, or drawing of any kind, or in conducting any other scheme or device for obtaining money through the mails by means of false or fraudulent pretenses, representations, or promises," then the postmaster to whom this money-order may be presented for payment must, under this statute, refuse its payment, because the man is engaged in that class of business. If he is found to be raffling off a piece of church property, for instance, such as a cake, or some contribution to a benevolent purpose, and sends out through the post-office here letters of that sort, or if a person sends to one engaged in a benevolent enterprise, trying to build a church by a raffle or distribution of property, a postal order to make payment of a contribution he sees proper to give to the object, it is the duty of the postmaster, because the party is engaged in a business of this sort, to stop the payment and return the money-order and all letters of that kind.

I doubt very much our right thus to interfere with business between people and to assign to a man a character because he is engaged in a certain line of business which prevents him from receiving money or sending money by a postal order for the burial of his wife, or child, or to pay for a doctor's bill, or anything like that. This statute is too broad entirely, too radical, according to my understanding of it, if I am correct about it. I appeal to the Senator from Tennessee in charge of the bill to explain to the Senate whether it is not the meaning of this section necessarily that a person who is conducting the character of business that is mentioned in this statute is liable to have his money-orders refused payment, it makes no difference what the consideration of the orders may be or what the purpose which is intended to be accomplished by them.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, as I have already stated to the Senate, the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads simply propose to harmonize three sections of the Revised Statutes. In other respects these sections are already harmonized. Section 3894 originally used the word "illegal" as applied to lotteries. That was stricken out by an act passed the 5th of July, 1876. Now it is proposed to strike out simply the word "fraudulent" in the two other sections, 3929 and 4041. We are not legislating on the general subject of lotteries except so far as to harmonize these three sections of the statutes. My own construction of the statutes, and I think it is that of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, is that they relate only to letters and circulars in and about the business of lotteries, and not concerning any other enterprise or business of the parties.

Mr. GARLAND. On examining the two sections of the statutes to which this bill refers I find that there is nothing specially relating to the point I suggested before, and therefore I have no amendment to offer to the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CAPTURED AND ABANDONED PROPERTY SUITS.

The bill (S. 64) to authorize suits in the Court of Claims in certain cases therein mentioned was announced as next in order.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. That bill is adversely reported. It may as well go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Perhaps it can be got off the Calendar.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Very well; I withdraw any objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the right of action in the Court of Claims under the provisions of the captured and abandoned property acts be, and the same is hereby, revived and extended for two years from and after the passage of this act, including all cases of seizures under the said acts, or under color thereof, either before or after June 30, 1865, whether adjudicated by the Secretary of the Treasury or not, and without regard to any statute of limitations.

Mr. GARLAND. The Senator who reported the bill [Mr. MCMILLAN] is not in his seat, but it came from the Committee on the Judiciary with an adverse report. I believe the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] is particularly interested in it and introduced the bill. I move, however, in accordance with the report of the committee, that it be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. BROWN. On that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the indefinite postponement of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

SUITS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES.

The bill (S. 1577) to provide for the bringing of suits by citizens of the United States against the Government thereof in certain cases was announced as next in order.

Mr. GARLAND. That is a bill I reported of considerable importance, which can not be disposed of under the five-minute rule. I ask that it be passed over without losing its place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas asks that this bill be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

JOHN B. READ.

The joint resolution (S. R. 67) in relation to the claim made by Dr. John B. Read against the United States for the alleged use of projectiles claimed as the invention of said Read, and by him alleged to have been used pursuant to a contract or arrangement made between him and the War Department, and for which no compensation has been made, was announced as next in order.

Mr. CONGER. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on Military Affairs report the resolution with an amendment, which will first be read.

The amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, in line 11, after the word "implied," to insert "whether he consented to the use of said projectiles by the confederate government against the United States, and whether his invention was used by the United States;" so as to make the clause of the joint resolution read:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to organize a board of officers, of not less than three in number, selecting the same from the ordnance and artillery arms of the United States service, who shall examine all the facts relative to the said claim of Dr. J. B. Read, and ascertain whether the United States have made any use of any invention of the said Read in projectiles; whether the same, if so used, were used under any contract, express or implied; whether he consented to the use of said projectiles by the confederate government against the United States, and whether his invention was used by the United States; to what extent, if any, his invention was so used, and whether such use was valuable to the United States, and if so, what sum, if any, under the circumstances of the use, the United States ought in justice to pay for the same; and that such board do make their report thereon with all convenient speed to the Secretary of War, to be by him transmitted to Congress for its action in the premises; and that such report be accompanied by a statement of all the proofs submitted to and considered by them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the report is called for. It will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. HAMPTON March 11, 1884:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred S. R. 67, "in relation to the claim made by Dr. John B. Read against the United States for the alleged use of projectiles claimed as the invention of said Read, and by him alleged to have been used pursuant to a contract or arrangement made between him and the War Department, and for which no compensation has been made," have considered the same, and beg leave to report the resolution amended, and in that form they recommend its passage.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT.

In line 11, after the word "implied," insert the following words: "Whether he consented to the use of said projectiles by the confederate government against the United States, and whether his invention was used by the United States."

Mr. HAMPTON. Mr. President, a joint resolution has come from the House of Representatives precisely similar to the one before the Senate. I move to substitute the House resolution for that of the Senate.

Mr. CONGER. I suppose the first question is that of consideration. If there be no further reports on that subject than have been read, no further information, I object to the consideration of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SEWELL in the chair). The consideration of the joint resolution being objected to, it goes over.

Mr. CONGER. I find there is no report at all accompanying the House resolution.

Mr. HAMPTON. I did not hear what was the motion of the Senator from Michigan.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator objected to the consideration of the joint resolution, and it goes over.

Mr. HAMPTON. I hope the Senator will consent that it shall not lose its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the joint resolution will retain its place on the Calendar.

Mr. CONGER. The resolution which the Senator offered as a substitute for this comes up a little further along in the regular order, and if the Senator offers that as a substitute for this we shall reach that as soon as we should this if it remains in its place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution goes over.

SHOSHONES, BANNOCKS, AND SHEEPEATERS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1008) to accept and ratify the agreement submitted by the Shoshones, Bannocks, and Sheepeaters of the Fort Hall and Lemhi reservations, in Idaho, May 14, 1880, for the sale of a portion of their lands in said Territory, and for other purposes, and make the necessary appropriations for carrying out the same.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment, to insert as an additional section:

SEC. 4. That this act shall take effect only when the President of the United States shall have had presented to him satisfactory evidence that the agreement herein set forth has been accepted in conformity with the eleventh article of the treaty of July 3, 1868, with the Shoshones and Bannocks, and he shall have made proclamation thereof.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the bill go over without prejudice, without its losing its place on the Calendar. There is no report with the bill, and I should like to examine it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the bill will go over at the request of the Senator from Michigan, retaining its place on the Calendar.

GEORGE W. BAUSMAN.

The bill (S. 283) to increase the pension of George W. Bausman was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is adversely reported, and unless there is a desire to move its indefinite postponement I object to its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri object to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. I simply call the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] to it. I suppose he will move its indefinite postponement.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not desire to have the bill indefinitely postponed.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then I object to its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. PLUMB subsequently said: When the bill (S. 283) to increase the pension of George W. Bausman was called I stated that I did not desire to have it indefinitely postponed. I have examined the report since that time, and it discloses one fact which makes it proper that the bill should be indefinitely postponed. Therefore, for the purpose of ridding the Calendar, I ask unanimous consent that that action be now taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill indicated by the Senator from Kansas? The Chair hears none.

Mr. PLUMB. I move to indefinitely postpone the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

FRENCH SPOLIATION CLAIMS.

The bill (S. 1820) to provide for the ascertainment of claims of American citizens for spoliations committed by the French prior to the 31st day of July, 1801, was announced as next in order.

Mr. HOAR. That bill passed the Senate last winter (if I may be permitted to make a brief statement before it is read) unanimously with the exception of one Senator's vote, I believe. It will take, however, some time to read the report if it is required. We have but twenty-five minutes now before 2 o'clock, and I think perhaps it would be more convenient to the Senate to have the bill go over, retaining its place on the Calendar, so that the Senate may deal with it hereafter. If it were objected to, I should deem it my duty to move to take it up.

Mr. MORGAN. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that we proceed with its consideration to-day, and if it is not finished by 2 o'clock to-day it can go over.

Mr. HOAR. Very well; I only want to do what is most convenient in the order of business.

The bill was read, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PETER DELLA TERRE.

The bill (S. 294) for the relief of Frank Della Terre and Susan Della Terre, heirs of Peter Della Terre, deceased, was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is there a report accompanying the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a report by the Committee on Claims, but the amendment will first be read, and then the report of the committee.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Claims was, in line 7, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifty" and insert "ten;" so as to make the bill read:

That out of any money in the Treasury of the United States the Secretary pay to Frank Della Terre and Susan F. Della Terre, heirs of the late district attorney of the northern district of California, Peter Della Terre, deceased, the sum of $10,000, in full consideration for extraordinary services rendered by said Peter Della Terre, during the years 1857, 1858, and 1859, in defending the title of the United States to public property in the State of California and recovery of 19,148 square miles of territory, valued at $150,000,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read if the Senator from Missouri desires it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do most certainly, unless the bill is abandoned.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the report submitted by Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Claims, March 12, 1884, but before concluding was interrupted by

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived the Chair lays before the Senate the regular order for this time, being the bill (S. 1682) to enable the people of that part of the Territory of Dakota south of the forty-sixth parallel of north latitude to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of the State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes.

PRINTING OF INTERSTATE COMMERCE BILL.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask the Senator from Indiana to yield until I make a motion that an additional number of copies of the bill (S. 2112) to establish a commission to regulate interstate commerce, and for other purposes, which was made the special order for next Thursday, be printed. There seem to be no copies of the bill for use by the Senate. I ask that the usual number of additional copies be printed.

Mr. GARLAND. Was there a report accompanying the bill?

Mr. CULLOM. No, sir; there was no report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Illinois to print the usual number of additional copies of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

LABOR CONTRACTS.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask also the indulgence of the Senator from Indiana to say, in connection with the statement of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] in reference to the special order for Thursday being the interstate-commerce bill, that there is also a special order, made at the last session, for the same time, to wit, Order of Business 863 on the Calendar, being the bill (H. R. 2550) to prohibit the importation and migration of foreigners and aliens under contract or agreement to perform labor in the United States, its Territories, and the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands from the Chief Clerk that the bill was not made a special order; there was merely a postponement until the day named.

Mr. BLAIR. The bill was postponed until that time, and I shall ask at that time for its consideration.

ADMISSION OF DAKOTA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1682) to enable the people of that part of the Territory of Dakota south of the forty-sixth parallel of north latitude to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of the State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask that the bill be read for the consideration and action of the Senate upon the committee amendments, which are only two or three in number, and also for some formal amendments in reference to dates which I shall propose as the reading progresses. I shall then ask to address the Senate on the general subject of the bill, and it will then be open to any amendment that any Senator may choose to offer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be so read.

Mr. GARLAND. I suggest to the Senator to have the report read first, or does he prefer to have the report read after the bill has been read?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of a bill usually precedes the reading of the report accompanying it.

Mr. GARLAND. That is the general custom, but in this instance I thought a different course might be pursued. Let it be done, however, just as the Senator from Indiana prefers.

Mr. HARRISON. I will state to the Senator from Arkansas that I shall in the course of my remarks present nearly all the facts mentioned in the report.

Mr. GARLAND. Very well.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill, and read to line 19 of section 3.

Mr. HARRISON. There is a misprint or a mistake there. There are five commissioners provided for; and in line 19 "two" should be "three," being a majority of the five. I move to strike out "two" and insert "three;" so as to read:

That said apportionment shall be made by the governor, the chief justice, the associate justice for the first judicial district, the associate justice for the fourth judicial district, and the surveyor-general of the Territory of Dakota, or any three of them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the correction will be made.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill at line 19 of section 3, as follows:

And the governor shall, by proclamation, order an election of the delegates aforesaid to be held on the 4th day of November, 1884.

Mr. HARRISON. This bill was reported at the last session of Congress and contemplated that the proceedings for the admission of the State should be at once started. Therefore the 4th day of November, the day of the general Representatives election, was named here. That day having now passed, I propose, in line 21, that "November" shall be stricken out and the word "June" inserted; and in line 22, that the word "four" be stricken out and the word "five" inserted; so as to read:

To be held on the 4th day of June, 1885.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the amendment stated will be made. The Chair hears none.

The Secretary concluded the reading of section 3 of the bill.

Mr. HARRISON. In section 4, line 3, I move to strike out "December" and insert "August," and to strike out "four" and insert "five" after the word "eighty;" so as to read:

That the delegates to the convention thus elected shall meet at the city of Yankton on the second Tuesday of August, 1885, and, after organization, shall declare on behalf of the people of said proposed State that they adopt the Constitution of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be made by unanimous consent if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to the end of section 8.

Mr. HARRISON. In section 8, line 7, after the word "eighty," I move to strike out "6" and insert "7;" so as to read, "on or before the 1st day of January, 1887," as this proceeding, if the bill should pass, would not bring the State into the Union until late next fall; it could not be done by the 1st day of January, 1886.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be made by unanimous consent, if there be no objection.

The Secretary resumed, and continued the reading of the bill to line 14 of section 14.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first amendment of the Committee on Territories will be reported.

The SECRETARY. In section 14, line 11, the committee report to strike out "North Dakota" and insert "Lincoln;" so as to read, "Territory of Lincoln."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana wish to take a vote on the amendments of the committee now or to let them go over until after the reading of the bill is concluded?

Mr. HARRISON. I propose that we shall act on the committee amendments as we go along.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Territories just reported.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Territories was, in section 14, line 15, after the word "of," to insert "Lincoln."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Territories was, in section 16, line 5, after the word "of," to insert "Lincoln;" in line 11, after the word "of," to strike out "North Dakota" and insert "Lincoln;" and in line 21, after the word "of," to insert "Lincoln."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 17, line 2, after the word "of," to insert "Lincoln."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and concluded.

Mr. HARRISON. I am told in regard to the bill now under consideration that the supply which was ordered to be printed has been exhausted and there are no more copies in the document-room. It may be that some Senators will desire to examine the bill in the progress of any debate which may ensue upon it, and before proceeding to make my remarks upon the bill I move that there be a reprint of the usual number of copies of the bill with the amendments as adopted. Let it be printed as amended.

Mr. ALLISON. Let the amendments which have been made be put in Italics.

Mr. HARRISON. I would say to the Senator that the amendments are entirely informal. They only relate to some dates and to the name of that part of the Territory which is left with a Territorial organization. But I have no objection that the reprint shall show the amendments which have been adopted. That would be practically to reprint the bill as it first stood, with one or two minor exceptions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Indiana, to reprint the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be reprinted as amended. Does the Senator from Indiana desire to have the amendments in Italics?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, sir; the amendments may be printed in Italics.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be the course pursued.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, it perhaps ought to be assumed, when a bill has been read at length as this has been, that the Senate is sufficiently possessed of the details of the bill to make unnecessary any further statement of its contents. I think, however, that this presumption is, in our ordinary experience here, perhaps a little violent. Therefore, with the hope that it may reach some of those who have not gathered from the reading of the bill its tenor and effect, I shall proceed to make a brief statement of what the bill is and what it proposes to do.

The bill proposes to divide the existing Territory of Dakota upon the forty-sixth parallel of north latitude, being very nearly an equal division of the Territory. It proposes to organize into a State that portion of the Territory lying south of the forty-sixth parallel, to continue for that portion of the Territory north of that parallel the present Territorial government, and to transfer to it the officers of the present Territory of Dakota. It gives to that part of Dakota which retains a Territorial organization the name of Lincoln. As to the State, it provides for a constitutional convention, and that the constitution framed by it shall be submitted to a popular vote. If the constitution is adopted, and is conformable to the requirements of the bill, which are those generally found in these enabling acts, the President is then required to make proclamation of that fact, and the State is to be thereupon admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the other States.

As to the land grants which are contained in the bill, they are substantially those which have been found, almost without exception, in all of the bills admitting the organized Territories of the country into the Union of the States. They are grants chiefly for school purposes. There are one or two smaller grants to the State for the purpose of erecting public buildings, and one grant which has been already made by Congress to the Territory as a Territory is revived and vested in the new State.

The movement for the admission of a new member into the sisterhood of States should originate with the people to be affected by it.

Such a movement should not have its initiative or its impetus outside of people of the State to be constituted. I do not need to say that this discussion, if it is kept up on the plane to which it belongs, can not degenerate into a partisan discussion; that we can not divide upon it on party lines; because to consider the application of this people for admission to the Union in its relations to the successes or reverses of a political party is to consider it from a level altogether below that of statesmanship.

The movement for the admission of South Dakota into the Union had the origin that I have indicated as the proper origin. It originated in Dakota. The desire of that people for admission into the Union has been brought to the attention of Congress repeatedly in the last four or five years by resolutions and memorials from the Legislature of the Territory, by the expression of popular conventions in the Territory, organized without reference to party, and by the repeated declarations and resolutions of the political conventions of both parties from year to year.

The Legislature of Dakota as early as 1870 memorialized Congress for the division of the Territory, using this language:

Your memorialists would further represent in evidence of this our petition, that while the said new Territory is remote from the main line of travel in Southern Dakota, and is separated therefrom by a broad extent of unoccupied and wild country, yet the Northern Pacific and Saint Paul and Pacific Railroads will traverse the entire length of the proposed new Territory, giving it direct and easy communication with Minnesota and other States, by means of which several thousand people have already settled in the valley of the Red River of the North and other portions of the proposed new Territory, in which are established towns at a distance of fifteen hundred miles by the nearest traveled route from the capital and courts of Dakota.

This memorial and request for a division of the Territory, for the organization of the northern part into a separate Territory, was repeated by the Legislature at the session of 1872–'73, at the session of 1874–'75, and at other sessions since.

In 1882 a popular convention was assembled to consider the question of the admission of Southern Dakota as a State, the proceedings of which were submitted to the Committee on Territories of the Senate. The convention assembled at Canton on the 21st day of June, 1882, and among the resolutions adopted by it was the following:

Resolved, That it is the sense of this convention, and we believe it to be the general wish of the people of this Territory south of the forty-sixth parallel of north latitude, that the north boundary of the State of Dakota be the forty-sixth parallel, the other boundaries remaining as they now are.

This convention was very largely attended, representatives being present from some twenty or twenty-five organized counties of South Dakota.

The Legislature of Dakota in 1883 passed a bill providing for a constitutional convention to be assembled in South Dakota for the purpose of preparing and submitting to Congress a constitution for the government of that people as a State in connection with an application for admission. This bill passed the council of the Territory, which under the law is composed of twelve members, by a vote of 11 yeas and 1 nay. It passed the house, which under the law was composed of twenty-four members, by 22 affirmative votes to 2 negative votes. The bill, however, did not receive the approval of the governor of the Territory, and failed for want of his signature.

But notwithstanding this, upon a popular call a convention composed of representatives from the counties south of the forty-sixth parallel assembled at Huron in June, 1883, framed a constitution, and at the last session of Congress presented it, with a memorial asking admission upon the basis of that constitution. In the Forty-seventh Congress there was also presented a memorial which was brought in person to the Senate by a large and influential delegation of citizens of Northern Dakota, asking a division of the Territory upon the forty-sixth parallel. They did not, of course, assume to express an opinion as to whether this division should be accomplished by the admission of the southern part of the Territory as a State or by a simple division of the Territory into two organized Territories. They were, however, most emphatic and earnest in their representations to the committee and to the Senate that whether the southern part of the Territory was accepted as a State or compelled to continue under a Territorial form of government, the interests of the people would be subserved by a division of the Territory on the forty-sixth parallel.

As I have already said, the political conventions of both parties in the Territory have perhaps almost every year placed in their platforms a resolution in favor of division and in some cases for the admission of South Dakota as a State. It is a happy thought that political conventions representing opposing parties could find in Dakota in this subject a union of sentiment. In the report of the governor of Dakota recently submitted there is a reference made to the subject of division and to the sentiment of the Territory upon that subject. Governor Pierce says:

The sentiment in favor of division is practically unanimous; but very few in either section of the Territory oppose it. Whether this desire is wise or unwise is not a question it seems necessary to discuss; whether it will disappear under the effect of a closer acquaintance and relationship, engendered and promoted by the various lines of railway north and south now being built or surveyed, is a probability or contingency that can be estimated by others as well as myself; but it seems to be a rule that latitudinal and not longitudinal lines are the cementing and binding ones; that communities lying east and west of each other become by the laws of trade and commerce more closely allied and more readily assimilated than those lying north and south. In any event there scarcely seems an existing necessity for holding together in Territorial or Statehood two widely separated regions, both largely populated, both immense in area, and both sincerely desirous of division.

I ought, perhaps, to say that at the last session of Congress, from a committee of gentlemen who appeared before the Committee on Territories, all of whom I believe, or almost all of whom, were from the city of Bismarck, in North Dakota, the committee heard the first suggestions of any opposition to the division of Dakota into two political organizations. It was quite apparent to me at that time that the existing conflict between the two sections of the Territories over the question of capital location had much to do with the feeble protest which was lifted by these gentlemen against the division of the Territory. I do not believe that upon the evidence it can be questioned that 90 per cent. or more of the entire population of Dakota are desirous of a division of the Territory. I have been assured, as the committee has been, by men whose opportunity for knowing the sentiment of Dakota is very perfect, that the proposition to admit the whole Territory as a single State would not be accepted by her population.

Mr. President, in considering the question of the admission of Dakota it seems to me that three things must be found to be present in order to entitle this State to admission: First, the area of the State must be sufficiently large to give a guarantee that it will be able to maintain a ratio of growth compared with the other States which would reasonably preserve the equality of States; second, it should have sufficient population to justify its organization into a separate political community; and third, this population should be well disposed toward the institutions of our country, intelligent, and loyal. There should not be found to exist in the Territory by the popular consent any institution that was out of line with the civilization of the country.

The whole Territory of Dakota as now organized contains an area of 149,100 square miles. Divided on the forty-sixth parallel, North Dakota would contain 72,100 square miles and South Dakota 77,000 square miles. Only the States of California, Nevada, Colorado, Oregon, Kansas, Texas, and Minnesota would have a greater area than the proposed State of Dakota. It is nearly 28,000 square miles larger than the Empire State of New York. It is 20,000 square miles larger than the great State of Illinois. It is 7,500 square miles larger than the State of Missouri. It is 10,500 square miles larger than the combined area of the six New England States.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that this brief comparison of the area of the proposed State with that of some of the existing States justifies the statement that no objection can be taken to the admission of Dakota upon the ground that there is not sufficient area for the settlement and support of an enormous population. But after all it is not a question of square miles, I agree. It is rather a question of the producing capacity of the Territory proposed to be constituted into a State; it is a question of its ability to sustain a population. Now, judged by this standard Dakota is entitled to admission. In 1860 the improved land in farms in the whole Territory of Dakota was 2,115 acres; in 1870 it had increased to 42,645 acres; in 1880 to 1,150,413 acres. In 1870 the number of farms in Dakota was 1,720; in 1880 it was 17,439, an increase of 913 per cent. in that decade. The value of farms and farm improvements in 1880 was $22,400,000. Dakota produced, according to the statistics of the census of 1880, on 265,298 acres of land, 2,830,289 bushels of wheat. I find by a comparison that Texas, on 373,612 acres of land, produced in that year 2,567,760 bushels of wheat, or nearly 300,000 less than was produced in Dakota. Dakota produced in 1880 over 2,000,000 bushels of corn. An examination of the returns by counties shows that of these 2,000,000 bushels of corn South Dakota produced 1,975,881 bushels, and of wheat 1,092,616 bushels. From the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for 1882 I have taken the following statistics:

Table showing the product of crops in Dakota, &c., for 1882.

The preliminary estimate of the Commissioner of Agriculture of the crop of 1883 in Dakota is as follows:

Number of acres in wheat, 1,008,000; average product per acre, 16 bushels; a total product of wheat of 16,128,000 bushels. Only twelve States in the estimate for that year are given a higher production than the Territory of Dakota. I notice in the report of the governor, just submitted, an estimate of the crop of 1884. He says:

The wheat crop for 1884 is variously estimated at from 20,000,000 to 25,000,000 bushels; flax, 3,000,000 bushels; corn, 2,500,000 bushels; barley, 2,000,000 bushels; oats, 10,000,000 bushels.

It seems from a report made by Mr. Charles B. Lamborn, of the land department of the Northern Pacific Railroad, which is given in a note to the governor's report, having been received after this estimate had been made, that the estimate of the governor is far below the truth. Mr. Lamborn's estimate is as follows:

It is probable—

He says—

that the estimate of 10,000,000 bushels for the wheat production of Southern Dakota is also too low, and you will, therefore, see that the estimate of 30,000,000 bushels of wheat for Dakota for 1884 would be a safe and conservative estimate.

Mr. President, in view of such facts can any one question that within the limits of the proposed State there is a soil capacity not only sufficient to maintain an enormous population within the State, but to furnish, as it already does, a large surplus for export?

In dealing with an agricultural country we are not assuming any of those risks as to population which are assumed when a State which is given largely to mining and which is devoid of agricultural land is admitted to the Union. Our experience with the great agricultural States in the West, which have come through a Territorial organization to Statehood, whether in that timbered region in which my own State was situated or in the prairie region west of it, is that in the productiveness of the soil there is a guarantee that the State will continue to increase in population.

I do not know whether there will be any one here in the assumed interest of the citizens of Dakota to suggest that the burdens of a State government would be oppressive to its people. If such a suggestion should be made by any one, the author of it would find it difficult to produce any commission from the Territory to make that objection. The people themselves feel that they are able to take upon themselves the burdens of a State government; and when we look at the property assessment for taxation in the Territory for the present year, which has just been returned, I think no one will doubt it.

The whole Territory in 1883 had an assessment for taxation of $69,154,609. In 1884 the assessment was $84,054,583, a gain of nearly $15,000,000 in one year in the total assessment of the whole Territory, of which $12,000,000 was in Southern Dakota. In 1880 the following States had a smaller valuation than Dakota has at the present time. I am contrasting now the present condition of Dakota with the condition of some of the States as returned in 1880: Delaware, as I have said, had a total valuation of $59,951,000; Florida, of $30,938,000; Colorado, $74,471,000; Nevada, $29,291,000; and Oregon, $52,522,000. We find, then, that in 1880 five of the States of the Union, one of them at least an original State, and others that have been long enjoying the benefits of a full participation in our Government, had not then for the support of their State government a valuation equal to that presented by Dakota this year. Of this assessment of $84,054,583 Southern Dakota had $44,594,000, or more than Florida or Nevada.

In 1883 the Territory of Dakota paid in the way of postal revenues in excess of all expenses for conducting the post-office service in that Territory $21,000. She paid of internal-revenue tax $86,875. The Territory of Dakota is now defraying practically all the expenses of her government, except the salaries of her executive and judicial and legislative officers. As to all taxes of a local character for school purposes, for roads, for police, for the various municipal purposes, Dakota is already paying these without aid from the General Government; so that, in passing from a Territorial condition into one of Statehood, the additional expense which would be laid upon her property would be comparatively small.

The next question which I think proper to consider is the one of population. I have looked with some interest to see whether in the admission of new States in the past Congress had established any rule as to population. The conclusion at which I have arrived, and the conclusion expressed by some of the leading Senators in the past debates which have taken place in the Senate on this question, is that no rule as to population has been established or adhered to by Congress.

It has been frequently suggested, it was suggested in the Committee of Territories in the Forty-seventh Congress, that a population equal to the unit of representation in the House of Representatives was essential, and in the bill for the admission of Dakota, reported in the Forty-seventh Congress, to meet this view an amendment was adopted by the committee providing for the taking of a census, and that if the result of that census should disclose a less population than the existing ratio of representation in the House of Representatives all further proceedings under the bill should at once cease. I do not think it will be found that any Senator has ever insisted that we should require of a Territory seeking admission to the Union a greater population than the ratio of representation in the House of Representatives.

The committee were furnished by Mr. BRENTS, the Delegate from Washington Territory, in an argument he made before them for the admission of that Territory, with a table which he had compiled, showing the date of admission, the representative ratio by the previous census, and the population by the previous and by the following censuses of the different States that have been admitted to the Union. It seems from this table that of the twenty States which passed through a Territorial form of organization to Statehood but six of them possessed by the previous census a population equal to the unit of representation in the House of Representatives. I find by looking at the table that no State admitted since Missouri in 1821 possessed this ratio by the census preceding its admission—not a single one.

If we were searching for a rule, then, we should say that it rested entirely in the discretion and good judgment of Congress, and that it had not been judged at all essential that the State should be shown to possess at the time of its admission a population equal to the unit of representation in the House.

The report which was submitted by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] in the Forty-seventh Congress in connection with the bill which was then reported for the admission of Southern Dakota seems to concede that the requirement can not go beyond a present population equal to the unit of representation in the House. That Senator in his report said:

While no other provision is found in the Constitution as to the admission of new States than that before quoted, and no law or rule binds or limits the action of Congress, it would be a manifest violation of the spirit and intendment of the Constitution to admit a State into the Union without at least the population requisite under the existing law of apportionment for a Representative in the lower House of Congress.

Mr. President, while the precedents are not that way, while they do not support the proposition of the Senator from Missouri, yet if that is to be the rule applied in the case of Dakota, I think it is an exceedingly easy task to demonstrate that Southern Dakota now has a population largely in excess of 151,000, the present basis of representation in the House of Representatives. There was a bill—I am not sure whether it came to the Senate or not; the report was laid upon our desks—a bill of the House of Representatives the object of which was to establish a rule. That bill provided that no State should be admitted into the Union unless it had a population equal to the existing ratio. It was favorably reported from the Committee on Territories in the House during this Congress, and I am not sure as to what its present status is.

It would be exceedingly unfair in the case of any one of these Western Territories, and especially in the case of Dakota, to judge her population by a census taken five years ago. All of the conditions of emigration have changed. The emigrant who is seeking a home in the West does not now use as his vehicle a pack-train, a Conestoga wagon, or even a broad-horn. The great bulk of the people who have gone into Dakota have gone upon the steam-car, many of them within sight of the home which they were to take up under the homestead laws of the United States. The steam-car, and even the palace Pullman car, is now the medium for transporting our enterprising people to their homes in the West, whereas in the case of the State of Indiana it was thirty years after the admission of that State into the Union before a single mile of railroad was built in its territory. The Ohio River and some of its tributary streams were the channels of emigration. Travel was slow, toilsome, perilous. But now the emigrant reaches his home in Dakota or in Montana surrounded by all those appliances of luxury in traveling which we enjoy here in passing from the capital to the great commercial metropolis.

Therefore it is, as we shall see, that the ratio of emigration and settlement in these new States outstrips almost beyond description the settlements of the earlier States in the West. Looking at some of the statistics upon this question, I find by the Railroad Manual of 1883 that Dakota had eleven railroads and nearly 2,500 miles of completed railway. Many of our States were thirty or forty years without a mile of railway within their borders; but here is this young Territory, organized, I believe, in 1860, still outside of the sisterhood of States, with nearly 2,500 miles of completed railway within her borders.

The population of Dakota at the last census was 135,177. The returns by counties, which I have had carefully analyzed, show that in Southern Dakota there was then a population of about 100,000; rather more than less. The Senator from Missouri, in his report, speaks of this population as embracing the Indians in South Dakota. In this he is entirely mistaken. The census report is of the white and colored population of the Territory, and does not include the Indians.

I desire to call attention to the ratio of increase in the Territory of Dakota. From 1860 to 1870, in that decade, the ratio of increase was 193.1 per cent. From 1870 to 1880 the increase of population in Dakota was 853 per cent., or more than 85 per cent. a year. It was more than twice as much as that of any other State or Territory. Now, if the ratio since has been only 40 per cent., if it has been less than one-half of the ratio between 1870 and 1880, it would show a present population in Southern Dakota of over 300,000. That would be 200 per cent. for the five years, and would show a population, as I have said, of over 300,000 in Southern Dakota—twice the number required for a Representative in Congress; and I pause to say that I have no doubt after a careful examination of the statistics that Southern Dakota now upon a fair census would show a population entitling her to two members in the House of Representatives. If the increase of population, instead of being 40 per cent., less than one-half of the increase in the preceding decade, was only the absurd sum of 10 per cent.; if we assume that, having increased between 1870 and 1880 853 per cent., the increase of population for the five years succeeding has only been 10 per cent. a year, it would be 50 per cent. for the five years that have intervened, and having a population of 100,000 then, Southern Dakota would have now, if we allow her only 10 per cent. of an annual increase, more population than is required to give a member in the House of Representatives.

Let us look next as a basis of calculation to the vote of the Territory. In 1880 Dakota cast 28,426 votes; in 1884 she cast 86,000—an increase of 57,574 voters in the four years. If we look to some of the other States of the Union and to their vote as returned by the census of 1880, I think we shall feel that objections to the admission of Dakota coming from other States having such a voting population as I shall mention presently, contrasted with that of Dakota, are not well supported in justice and fairness.

In Delaware in 1880 the total vote was 29,333; in Louisiana it was 97,201, only 10,000 more than the Territory of Dakota, and yet upon that aggregate vote the State of Louisiana had six members in the House of Representatives. Will Louisiana, through her Representatives upon this floor, in view of a contrast like that, feel that it is preserving an equality between the citizens of this country for that State upon a vote only 10,000 greater than the vote just cast by the Territory of Dakota to have six members in the House of Representatives, and Dakota be denied a hearing there at all except by a Delegate who can not vote upon any question affecting the public interest?

Mr. JONAS. I should like to ask the Senator from Indiana if the basis of representation in the Congress of the United States is the vote as cast by the States?

Mr. HARRISON. Not at all; it is not the vote; it is population; though I think if you will study the statistics you will find that in some of the States the vote bears a very different ratio to the population.

Mr. JONAS. I will state that, if the Senator from Indiana will look at the census returns, he will find that Louisiana is entitled to the number of Representatives she has on the floor of the House of Representatives by population; and that she has the proper number of voters to correspond with her population. If in an election where there was no contest and a light vote the vote of Louisiana was but 98,000, as he says, it does not follow that Louisiana has not the number of legal voters which her population entitles her to according to the census. And her population according to the census entitles her to six members of Congress. Therefore I do not think the analogy is perfect.

Mr. HARRISON. The condition of the State of Louisiana was one of unusual felicity if in 1880 there was no political contest among her people. I had supposed that in a Presidential year all the States and all their people participated in the excitement and interest which is involved in the choice of a President; but, sir, I shall make another use of this presently. If 97,000 votes in Louisiana represent a population which entitles that State to six Representatives in the House, is it not probable that 86,000 votes in Dakota entitle that people to admission and to one Representative?

But I proceed. Mississippi in 1880 cast a total vote of 117,078; New Hampshire cast a vote of 86,363, nearly the same vote cast by the Territory of Dakota this year—only 300 more. Oregon cast only 40,816 votes in 1880; Vermont cast but 65,098 votes; West Virginia but 112,713 votes, and Rhode Island 29,235.

Mr. JONAS. I ask the Senator whether under the laws of the Territory of Dakota unnaturalized foreigners are not permitted to vote?

Mr. HARRISON. I think not.

Mr. JONAS. I think they are. I am not positively informed, but I think that is the case.

Mr. HARRISON. The laws of Dakota are liberal and her elections are free, I have no doubt, but I do not think that unnaturalized foreigners, that is, not those who have not declared their intention to become citizens, are allowed to vote. In my own State, as well as in many others, foreigners who have been resident one year in this country and have declared their intention to become citizens and have been six months resident in the State are voters. It is possible that some such provision has been adopted in Dakota.

Of these 86,000 voters two-thirds are in Southern Dakota. What is a fair basis upon which to calculate the number of inhabitants in Dakota if we have 86,000 voters there? Will any one contend that a ratio of four inhabitants to each voter is excessive? Will any one contend that as applied to the Territory of Dakota it is an unfair ratio? If there are four inhabitants to each voter it would show a population in Southern Dakota of 230,000.

But we have a basis upon which to arrive at a ratio in Dakota between the number of inhabitants and the number of voters. Take the basis of 1880, when the census furnishes us with the necessary statistics. The vote of Dakota in 1880 was 28,474; her population by the census of that year was 135,177, showing a ratio of 4.82 inhabitants to every voter. If that ratio, the ratio which prevailed in 1880, is maintained, we shall have in Southern Dakota about 250,000 population.

I call attention again in this connection to the report of Governor Pierce, of Dakota, upon this subject. He says:

That the growth of Dakota has been phenomenal everybody knows. So rapidly has the Territory filled up and developed that the census of 1880 gives no adequate idea of its present magnitude in population, wealth, and varied industries. The census returns may serve as a basis of comparison, however, for computing the present population.

Then he gives the estimate I have already given. He had not then the returns for this election when the report was made, and estimated the total vote at 83,500. The official returns, since complete except as to two or three counties and estimated as to them, show, as I have said, a vote of 86,000. The governor proceeds:

This number, on the ratio of 5 to 1, gives a population of 417,500—

In the whole Territory of Dakota—which is no doubt—

He says—

a very moderate estimate.

He proceeds:

A confirmation of these figures is found in the report of the Territorial superintendent of public instruction. The returns in his office show 80,000 children in the Territory of school age (7 to 20 years). Estimating 5 to 1 (the census of 1880 gave 8 to 1 between the ages of 5 and 17), and we have 400,000, or nearly the number of inhabitants gained from a computation based on the number of votes.

It should be remembered, however, that there are a number of unorganized counties in the Territory where the census of school children is not taken and where no votes are cast, but which contain all the way from 100 to 1,000 population. No account is taken either of non-voters, though the percentage is probably quite as large here as in the older States. When these facts are taken into consideration it is quite evident that 417,000 is much below the actual number. I have very little doubt that a complete census of the Territory would show a population of 450,000, but estimating it at only 400,000, and then Dakota has a greater number of inhabitants than was shown by the last census in either Colorado, Delaware, Florida, Nevada, New Hampshire, Oregon, Rhode Island, or Vermont, while it about equals Connecticut, Maine, Nebraska, and West Virginia.

Mr. President, as to the question of the ratio of inhabitants to voters, I have shown what it actually was in Dakota in 1880. Let us look now to some of the other States. In 1880 the total vote of Florida was was 51,618 and her population 269,493, or a ratio of 5.22 inhabitants to each voter. Let us look at Georgia. The vote of Georgia in 1880 was 155,651; her population was 1,542,180, or a ratio of 9.27 inhabitants to every vote cast in the State. The vote of Mississippi was 117,078; her population was 1,131,597, or a ratio of nearly ten inhabitants to every voter in the State. Let us look at Louisiana. Her total vote was 97,201; her population was 937,946, showing a ratio of 9.67 inhabitants to every voter in the State. Alabama in 1880 cast a vote of 151,507 while her population was 1,262,505, showing a ratio of inhabitants to voters of 8.46. Missouri's vote in 1880 was 397,221 with a population of 2,168,380, or a ratio of 5.45 inhabitants to each voter. The average of these six States is a little more than eight inhabitants to each voter.

Mr. President, I shall leave to others to declare if there are any exceptional or unusual conditions existing in any of these States whose votes and population I have given which disturb, in any degree, the proper average between the number of inhabitants and the votes cast at their election. I shall leave it to some of the Senators from those States to explain.

Minnesota and Nebraska, two comparatively new States, and both bordering upon Dakota, show a ratio of inhabitants to voters of $5\frac{17}{100}$.

I do not think, therefore, upon this hasty review of the ratio as I find it in some of the States south and north, that it is claiming too much to place the ratio in Dakota at five inhabitants to every voter.

If we take the number of votes cast in some of the States for members of Congress, I find that in Georgia the average vote in a Congressional district for every member of Congress in 1880 was 16,425; that in Mississippi it was 19,055; that in Louisiana it was 16,333; or an average in the four States of 17,578. If we take this Congressional vote to represent in each district 150,000 population, Dakota upon that basis would be entitled to nearly five members.

I have shown hastily the conditions as to population, area, and wealth which, according to precedent and, I think, according to reason and justice, entitle this Territory to admission into the Union. The people are intelligent and well disposed toward our institutions. I thought I had before me the statistics of illiteracy in Dakota. My recollection is that only three of the States and one of the Territories—Wyoming—show a less per cent. of illiteracy than is shown by the census in the Territory of Dakota; the per cent. in Dakota being something more than 3, perhaps 3.45 per cent., of the total population who can not write.

In one of the memorials which have been presented to Congress in behalf of the admission of the State the memorialists refer to the fact that under the beneficent land laws of the United States very many of the battered veterans of the Union Army have found homes in Dakota. The Western Territories seem to have some process of election, I have sometimes thought, for the selection of their citizens. When I look at the ratio of illiteracy in such States as Nebraska and Iowa and in the Territory of Dakota, I have sometimes been almost ready to conclude that the early settlers must have organized upon their borders committees of censorship and examination to exclude ignorance from their Territories. Certain it is that the ratio of illiteracy, which was once lowest in some of the Eastern States, now finds its lowest point in the new States and in the Territories.

The people of Southern Dakota have outgrown a Territorial organization. It is repressive and inadequate for their present needs. The judiciary system of the Territory proved to be so entirely inadequate, that the present Congress at the last session gave two additional judges to Dakota with the view of facilitating the disposition of the cases which encumber the dockets of the courts. I wrote during the last session to the chief-justice of the Territory once, as Senators will remember, a member of our own body, Mr. Edgerton, of Minnesota, upon this subject, and he addressed in turn the associate justices of the Territory for information as to their districts. I read a brief extract from the letter of Judge Palmer in response to an inquiry from Chief-Justice Edgerton. He says:

My district is composed of seventeen counties, in which are held nineteen terms of court, as fixed by law, each year. I assumed the duties of associate justice and judge of the fourth district on the 24th day of March, 1884. Since that time I have been holding court every week-day, excepting three days employed in traveling from court to court.

From this time my terms follow each other weekly till the close of the second week in July. Then commence again the first Tuesday in August, and continue without interruption (except supreme court in October) till July again. So much for the time.

As to the business, I need not say to you that it is a physical impossibility to perform it, to say nothing of the manner in which it must necessarily be done in the ceaseless rush from day to day and term to term.

To give an important question a quiet thought in library or chambers is out of the question, and as a necessary consequence the work is far from satisfactory to me and I shrink from considering what it must be to the profession.

Since I assumed the duties of my office I have usually opened court at 8 o'clock a. m., and in a large majority of the days it has not been adjourned earlier than 9 and often 10 and 11 p. m. You probably feel like asking me again "what I enlisted for."

I read this, and I might supplement it by reading from the answers of the other justices of the Territory, to show that the present judicial system provided under our laws is entirely inadequate to the settlement of the numerous and important questions of property and other more important questions involving life and liberty which come before the courts of that Territory. We have given them two more judges, and that is utterly inadequate. These people are still hampered and repressed by their Territorial organization and deprived of the power at their own expense to supply a judiciary which shall be acceptable to themselves and which shall promptly dispose of pending controversies.

We have found ourselves also under the necessity of legislating to increase the Territorial Legislature. Under our system of Territorial organization, framed for sparse and feeble communities, the council is composed of twelve members and the house of twenty-four. As applied to the great Territory of Dakota it was found to be an utterly inadequate representation, and the committees of this body having that matter in charge at the last session reported and Congress passed a law doubling the representation both in the council and house of representatives. I give these as instances to show that the present government, even as enlarged, is inadequate. We have patched the clothes, but they are still too tight.

I notice, Mr. President, that in the debate upon the Kansas bill the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. Sumner, alluded to a stipulation in the treaty with France by which the territory west of the Mississippi River was acquired as having some force in considering the question of the admission of Kansas. The stipulation contained in that treaty was that the territory should, as soon as might be conformably with the Constitution and institutions of the country, be admitted to the Union.

In the minority report submitted by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] in the Forty-seventh Congress I find this statement:

Nor is there any exceptional reason or necessity shown for the immediate admission of the new State into the Union. If the statements of the advocates and friends of the pending measure are to be received even with great allowance, the proposed State is now a Territorial elysium, and the people in the enjoyment of every possible blessing to be obtained from religion, education, or benign and just laws.

I conclude, Mr. President, that this was simply an ebullition of that facetiousness which in his lighter moments characterizes the Senator from Missouri. I take it that he would not seriously say that this community of two hundred and fifty or three hundred thousand American citizens, dwelling in the Territory of Dakota, have no need to have their political rights, or that they are now "in the enjoyment of every possible blessing to be obtained from religion, education, or benign and just laws."

Mr. President, I know too well the impulses of the Senator from Missouri. I know too well how highly he appreciates the full, complete equipment of American citizenship to think for one moment that he would regard it a light matter that 300,000 American citizens, as well entitled as he or I to the full enjoyment of the benefits of a national citizenship, should be deprived in any degree of the privileges of that citizenship beyond the time when the Territory in which they dwell has acquired the wealth and the population that fairly entitle them to admission to the Union.

Is it nothing, Mr. President, that the citizen of Dakota who is equally affected with the citizen of Missouri or Indiana by the laws which we enact here is absolutely without voice in their enactment? Is it nothing that in the choice of the Executive of this great nation the citizen of Dakota is as much disfranchised as the citizen of the District of Columbia? Is it nothing, sir, that when questions of tariff or revenue are to be affected by Congressional enactment or executive veto the inhabitants of a great Territory like this are absolutely deprived of all power to participate in the determination of those questions? Is it nothing, or is it a matter of joke or facetiousness, that this great population have no choice in the selection of the Executive who holds a first veto upon their legislation, while Congress reserves another to itself?

Is it nothing that in the case of the secretary of the Territory, who discharges the duties in many cases of auditor of a State, they have absolutely no voice in his selection? Is it nothing that the judges who are to preside when questions of property are to be settled between citizen and citizen, or when the higher questions of liberty and life are to be settled, are not of their own choice; that the people whose property and whose lives are to be adjudged in the courts have no choice and no influence in the selection of those who exercise these judicial functions?

Is it nothing, sir, or is it matter of joke or facetiousness, that the legislation of the Territory is absolutely in the control of Congress; that the representatives chosen by Missouri and by Indiana to sit in this Chamber, and by those and other States to sit in the House of Representatives, are the legislators who may frame if they please the laws of descent and of the alienation of property, who may frame if they please every criminal statute that is to affect that people?

No, Mr. President, I submit that when he turns his mind thoughtfully to the consideration of this question it will not be with the Senator from Missouri nor with any other Senator upon this floor a matter of joke or facetiousness. We do not need to show this to be an exceptional case. The man who desires to continue such a body of citizens in a condition of semi-citizenship and semi-vassalage should show why the exception should be made against them and why they should not be clothed with full citizenship.

As I said at the beginning, this question can not be approached from the low plane of party benefits or injuries. In the bill reported at the last session of Congress, in order to put this question entirely beyond any such influence, provision was made by which the admission of Dakota could not take place until after the Presidential election. That great issue has been determined and the executive control of this country has passed into the hands of the Democratic party. It must be four years more until Dakota, if she is admitted now, can have any participation in the electoral college. Will any man be so unjust as to suggest that she should stand for these four years more with her great population, her great resources, her intelligent people outside of the pale of the States?

Mr. President, I only intended in these opening remarks to set before the Senate, and if I could to get the attention of some of its thoughtful members, the statistics of the Territory of Dakota. I put my appeal to them now in her behalf upon the precedents and upon principles of equity and fair dealing. She has the requisite population, an ample area, abundant wealth, and a sure prospect of a growth that will speedily place her in advance of many of the older States. I shall probably not have anything further to say in the discussion of this bill unless the discussion should take a range wider than I have anticipated.

Mr. GARLAND. I wish to ask the Senator from Indiana a question. I did not care to interrupt him in the course of his remarks.

Mr. HARRISON. I am through, but I will answer any question I can.

Mr. GARLAND. On page 5 of the report there is an estimate of the population. I was once familiar with the matter, but I have not had occasion to renew my recollection of it. The report states that the present population is believed to be fully 350,000. Does that refer to the entire Dakota Territory, or only to the portion that is sought to be admitted as a State by the bill?

Mr. HARRISON. I think the estimate referred to there was of the whole Territory, perhaps 250,000 in the southern part and about 100,000 in the northern part: but the Senator must recollect when this report was made.

Mr. GARLAND. I understand that.

Mr. HARRISON. It was made in the absence of the statistics furnished by the recent vote of the Territory.

Mr. VEST obtained the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose the Senator from Missouri hardly desires to go on to-night. If he will give way I shall move an executive session.

Mr. VEST. With pleasure.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 9, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

BUSINESS OF POST-OFFICE COMMITTEE.

Mr. MONEY. I desire consent to offer a resolution for present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, subject to objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Wednesday, January 7, 1885, be set apart, after the reading of the Journal, for the consideration in the House as in Committee of the Whole of such bills as may be presented by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads; this order not to interfere with the consideration of general appropriation and revenue bills.

Mr. HOLMAN. I must object to this resolution unless the bills to be considered be designated, and unless exception be made in favor of reports from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MONEY. I am perfectly willing to designate the bills which the committee wish to consider on the day proposed, and am also willing to make the exception which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] indicates. The bills which the committee desire to consider are: one regulating contracts on star routes, to prevent speculative and ring bidding; one to regulate compensation of railroads for mail transportation upon a juster basis than the present; one to equalize postage on mail matter at the office of publication; and one to raise the weight of letters passing through the mails under a two-cent stamp from one-half ounce to an ounce. These are the bills which the committee has agreed to present if the House consents to designate a day for this business. The committee has not had a day in the House during the whole term of the present Congress.

Mr. HOLMAN. With the understanding that those measures alone are to be considered, and that exception is to be made in favor of business of the Committee on Public Lands—I do not see my colleague [Mr. COBB] now in the House——

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to have the agreement embraced in the resolution itself; and until that is done I object.

Mr. MONEY. I am willing to put it in. There may be other bills which the committee may desire the House to consider, but I am perfectly willing that they may be objected to at that time.

Mr. RANDALL. I think some of the bills named by the gentleman should be discussed in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The resolution provides for bringing them up in the House.

Mr. MONEY. As in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

Mr. MONEY. Does the gentleman object if the bills are named in the resolution?

Mr. RANDALL. Before withdrawing my objection I would like to read the resolution as proposed to be adopted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi can withdraw his resolution and offer it again after an agreement has been reached.

Mr. SINGLETON. I would have to object unless prior orders were excepted.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

DEFENSE OF NEW YORK HARBOR.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York, by unanimous consent, presented the following memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

This memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York respectfully represents:

That by the representations of the honored Chief of Engineers of the United States in his annual report this harbor and port is practically without defense against existing war vessels, and, therefore, liable to be placed at any moment at the mercy of any inimical nation to be destroyed by bombardment, or under an exaction of a ransom of many millions of dollars to buy off the threatened injury, it is not to be deemed that the United States Government will suffer its greatest port and city to be subjected even to the possibility of such injury or humiliation.

The chamber therefore respectfully prays that your honorable bodies will promptly appropriate a sum of money which will accord with the suggestions of the Chief of Engineers on this subject and serve to carry out his views on this matter.

And your memorialists will ever pray.

[SEAL.] JAS. M. BROWN, President.
GEORGE WILSON, Secretary.

MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. CHALMERS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 7669) to restore a republican form of government in the State of Mississippi; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

MISSISSIPPI WATER-POWER AND BOOM COMPANY.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, I move, by unanimous consent, to discharge the House Calendar and take up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 6764) to authorize the Mississippi Water-Power and Boom Company, of Brainard, Minn., to construct a dam across the Mississippi River.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read subject to objection.

The bill was read in extenso.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust before that question is determined the gentleman will make to the House some explanation of the provisions of the bill.

Mr. REAGAN. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. REAGAN. I demand the consideration of the special order, which has precedence over the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The special order is the unfinished business coming over from yesterday.

REPRINTING RESCINDED.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York, by unanimous consent, moved that the order made December 2 to reprint House report No. 1848 be rescinded.

The motion was agreed to.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE BILL.

The SPEAKER. The House resumes the consideration of the special order, which is the bill (H. R. 5461) to establish a board of commissioners of interstate commerce, and to regulate such commerce, on which the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BARKSDALE] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. BARKSDALE. Mr. Speaker, in the exercise of his constitutional functions to recommend to Congress such measures as he may deem necessary and expedient, the President, in his annual message of December 4, 1883, directed attention to the necessity of legislation to protect the public from acts of injustice and oppression committed by railroad corporations employed as the agents of commerce among the States. He used this strong and unequivocal language:

Complaints have lately been numerous and urgent that certain corporations, controlling in whole or in part the facilities for the interstate carriage of persons and merchandise over the great railroads of the country, have resorted in their dealings with the public to divers measures unjust and oppressive in their character.

In some instances the State governments have attacked and suppressed these evils, but in others they have been unable to afford adequate relief because of the jurisdictional limitations which are imposed upon them by the Federal Constitution.

The question how far the National Government may lawfully interfere in the premises, and what, if any, supervision or control it ought to exercise, is one which merits your careful consideration.

While we cannot fail to recognize the importance of the vast railway systems of the country and their great and beneficent influences upon the development of our material wealth, we should, on the other hand, remember that no individual and no corporation ought to be invested with absolute power over the interest of any other citizen or class of citizens. The right of these railway corporations to a fair and profitable return upon their investments, and to reasonable freedom in their regulations, must be recognized; but it seems only just that, so far as its constitutional authority will permit, Congress should protect the people at large in their interstate traffic against acts of injustice which the State governments are powerless to prevent.

The same recommendation is renewed in general terms by the President in his annual message of December 1, 1884.

It is proper to assume that the President did not act without due deliberation, and that he would not have called the attention of Congress to the subject in the earnest and vigorous language he has employed if the necessity for the legislation he proposes had not been urgent. The recommendation emanates from the executive head of the Government, and though he is the recognized chief of the political party to which he owes his elevation, the measure can not be considered from a partisan standpoint, to bias the minds and pervert the judgment of those whose duty it is to deal with it. It must be regarded from the higher plane of enlightened public policy unaffected by the narrow considerations of party. We have seen in the progress of the discussion that it is common ground upon which the North and the South, the East and the West, can meet; a domain into which the intolerant spirit of party and the still more illiberal spirit of sectionalism can not enter.

CONSTITUTIONAL POWER OF CONGRESS TO REGULATE INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The question first to be settled in providing the remedial legislation for the acts of oppression and injustice referred to by the President, is whether it is within the scope of the duties confided to Congress by the Constitution. I will address myself the more readily to this point in view of the thorough and elaborate examination which other members who have preceded me in the discussion have made of the details and practical effect of the pending bills. The language of the Constitution is so plain, and the weight of judicial authority in favor of the right of Congress to exercise whatever power is needed for the regulation of commerce among the States is so overwhelming, that no loop exists to hang a doubt upon. It is that "Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." It is a historical fact that the predominant motive which induced the States to meet in convention "to frame a more perfect union" than existed under the Confederation was to regulate commerce among them and to place it under the protection of a uniform law. During the Confederation the States, each for itself, could regulate commerce, and there was constant peril of a conflict of jurisdiction.

It is significant that in the resolution of Virginia urging the assembling of the convention this was the chief object mentioned. Therefore the real intent of the clause of the Constitution "to regulate commerce among the States" can not be questioned. The design of the framers of the instrument is its true interpreter.

The line of judicial authority in support of the power to do what the President has so wisely and well recommended is unbroken from the earlier days of the Government down to the present time. It would be a work of supererogation to cite the authorities in support of the proposition if the power of Congress to do what he has advised had not been denied by the accredited attorneys and representatives of the corporations which are proposed to be placed under the wholesome restraints of law. In his argument before the Committee on Commerce a learned attorney, who announced himself as the accredited representative of over 6,000 miles of railroad, with a capital of more than $100,000,000, denied that the question had ever been judicially decided. He said:

What I maintain is that there has been no case before the Supreme Court of the United States in which the issue has been plainly and distinctly marked as to what the power of Congress is.

Another representative of the corporations, in his argument before the committee, with apparent sincerity, insisted that the power of Congress to regulate commerce was restricted to the navigable waters. He said:

That commerce among the States is necessarily a thing that floats upon the navigable waters, those highways that have their sources in one State and their waters in another, and which are boundaries between the different States, and which, if we had not the different States, would have been regulated by treaties among the several States as independent sovereignties. Commerce is commerce continued upon waters that are not within States, but on water ways that are upon no State.

In a colloquy with the chairman of the committee he expressed himself in this emphatic language:

The CHAIRMAN. Is it your understanding that Congress has no power to regulate the commerce or passenger traffic over the railroads from State to State?
Mr. SELLERS. Yes, sir; they have none whatever.

If these positions be correct, the Government is a failure in one of the main objects of its creation. The Constitution is a dead letter—a nullity—in one of its essential provisions. The corporations annually transporting products valued at not less than $15,000,000,000 are without control; they are a law unto themselves, and have as large a charter to impose whatever burdens their cupidity may suggest upon the labor and business of the country as the winds to blow where they list. If they are hedged by the divinity ascribed to them by their devotees the figure of speech employed by a New England statesman now no more has been verified, that they are like the barons of the feudal ages in their rocky fastnesses, levying tribute upon all the wayfarers of business and pleasure and duty, with none to molest or to make them afraid.

Judge Redfield, in his excellent work on the law of railroads, has this to say in refutation of this monstrous doctrine:

Those who assume that Congress has no power to regulate the traffic on these extended lines of railway, reaching from one end of the Union to the other, must, if they would meet the question fairly, either say the extended lines of railway, amounting to many millions annually, probably ten times as much as the entire commerce of the country at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, is not commerce at all, or if it be is not subject to any regulation or control whatever; for it is certain the States have neither the power nor capacity to regulate to any purpose or with any efficiency the interstate traffic. It must then come under the control of Congress or be left to its own devices and impulses—an experiment never tried in any other country. (Redfield on Railways, 720-722.)

The power of Congress to regulate commerce between the States by whatever agents carried on was asserted by the highest judicial tribunal of the United States, speaking through its greatest authority, Chief-Justice Marshall, in the celebrated case of Gibbons vs. Ogden. The Legislature of New York had granted to certain parties the exclusive navigation of all the waters within the jurisdiction of the State, with boats moved by fire or steam, for a term of years. Thomas Gibbons undertook to employ boats on the waters to the use of which the monopoly had been granted. Ogden, the chief beneficiary, prayed an injunction to restrain him from navigating them. The courts of New York decided to perpetuate the injunction. The case was brought before the Supreme Court, and it reversed the decision, on the ground that the act was repugnant to the clause of the Constitution which authorizes Congress to regulate commerce, so far as the said act prohibits vessels licensed according to the laws of the United States for carrying on the coasting trade from navigating the said waters.

Chief-Justice Marshall, in delivering the opinion of the court, after declaring that "the genius and character of the whole Government seemed to be that its action is to be applied to all the external concerns which affect the States generally, but not to those which are completely within a particular State," said:

The power to regulate commerce among the States is "to prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed." This power, like others vested in Congress, is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations other than are prescribed in the Constitution. If, as has always been understood, the sovereignty of Congress, though limited to specified objects, is plenary as to those objects, the power over commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, is vested in Congress as absolutely as it would be in a single government, having in its constitution the same restrictions on the exercise of the power as are found in the Constitution of the United States. (Gibbons vs. Ogden, 9 Wheaton.)

The court declared further:

Where each government exercises the power of taxation, neither is exercising the power of the other; but when a State proceeds to regulate commerce with foreign nations, or among the several States, it is exercising the very power that is granted to Congress, and is doing the very thing which Congress is authorized to do.

Chief-Justice Story, in the case of New York vs. Miln (11 Peters, 156), citing the foregoing decision, said:

From that time to the present the question has been considered at rest. The power given to Congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States has been deemed exclusive, from the nature and object of the power, and the necessary implications growing out of it.

This decision pronounced by Chief-Justice Marshall sixty years ago is a monument to his memory more lasting than marble. It has been accepted by all his successors in his great office as the true interpretation of the Constitution. It has stood in all the vicissitudes through which the country has passed, like a guiding pharos in a stormy sea, lighting up the pathway of the mariner amid rocks and shoals and quicksands and whirlpools to a port of safety. Since it was promulgated the country has taken a vast stride in the march of events. The agencies for the transportation of products have been increased; the railroad and the telegraph era has been inaugurated. But the doctrine is applicable to every vehicle of interstate commerce, whatever it may be. The power was conferred for the wise and beneficent purpose of protecting the labor of the country from extortion; of producing harmony among the States; of cementing the bond of their union; and it is exercisable wherever and in whatever fashion the instrumentalities of interstate commerce exist.

Daniel Webster, to whose name has attached the title of the great expounder of the Constitution, in his argument in the same case, held that "the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the States was complete and entire, and to a certain extent necessarily exclusive." He asked: "What is to be regulated? Not the commerce of the several States respectively, but the commerce of the United States. Henceforth" (from and after the adoption of the Constitution), he said, "the commerce of the States was to be a unit, and the system by which it is to exist and be governed must necessarily be complete, entire, and uniform. Its character is to be described by the flag which waves over it—E Pluribus Unum." It was with reference to this masterly exposition of the Constitution that Justice Wayne, addressing its author, said:

The court felt the force and effect of your reasoning, and rendered a decision which has released every river and bayou, and lake and harbor, from the influence of monopoly.

Again, in the celebrated Passenger Cases (7 Howard), growing out of the acts of the New York and Massachusetts Legislatures authorizing the collection of toll from passengers arriving at ports within those States under the general denomination of health laws, the question of the power of Congress was raised. The tax was resisted on the ground that the statute was a regulation of commerce and therefore in conflict with the Constitution of the United States. The State courts affirmed the constitutionality of the law, and it was brought before the Supreme Court of the United States.

Justice McLean, in reversing the judgment of the State courts, cited the decision of Chief-Justice Marshall above quoted and numerous other decisions in support of the doctrine of the exclusive power of Congress to regulate commerce among the several States, and used this pointed language:

If these decisions are not to be taken as the established construction of the Constitution, I know of none which are not yet open to doubt.

And Justice Wayne adds:

Keeping then in mind what commerce is, and how far a nation may legally adjust her own commercial transactions with another State, we cannot be at a loss to determine from the subject-matter of the clause in the Constitution that the meaning of the terms used in it is to exclude the State from regulating commerce in any way, except their own internal trade, and to confide its regulation completely and entirely to Congress.

In the Passenger Cases, Norris vs. Boston, Chief-Justice Taney says:

It has always been admitted in the discussion upon article 8, section 3, of the Constitution that the power to regulate commerce includes navigation, and ship and crews, because they are the ordinary means of commercial intercourse.

In the same cases Justice Daniel said:

The power to regulate commerce includes the regulation of the vessel as well as the cargo, and the manner of using the vessel.

The celebrated case (13 Howard) of the State of Pennsylvania vs. The Wheeling Bridge Company, is directly in point. The bridge had been constructed under an act of the Virginia Legislature. The State of Pennsylvania undertook to enjoin the construction of the bridge, on the ground that it interfered with the free navigation of a navigable stream and inflicted a serious injury upon her citizens. Pending the trial of the case Congress passed an act declaring the bridge a lawful structure. The Supreme Court decided that the act of Congress was a legitimate exercise of the power conferred upon it to regulate commerce among the States. Justice McLean, in delivering the judgment of the court, said:

The regulation of commerce includes intercourse and navigation, and of course the power to determine what shall or shall not be deemed, in judgment of law, an obstruction to navigation.

Justice Daniel, in coinciding with the decision of the court, expressed himself in this strong language:

Congress have by statute undertaken to regulate the commerce upon the Ohio River, so far as the matters in this controversy are concerned. And who shall question their power to do this? Does it belong to this court under any article or clause of the Constitution or of any statute to assume such a superiority? * * * They have regulated this matter upon a scale by them conceived to be just and impartial with reference to that commerce which pursues the course of the river and to that which traverses its channel and is broadly diffused through the country. * * *

In what has been done by Congress I can have no doubt that they have acted wisely, justly, and strictly within their constitutional competency.

In Brown vs. State of Maryland the court held:

It is not therefore matter of surprise that the commercial grant of power should be as extensive as the mischief, and should comprehend all foreign commerce and all commerce among the States. (12 Peters, 446.)

And further the court said:

The question was considered in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, in which the power was declared to be complete in itself and to acknowledge no limitations.

Pierce, in his excellent work on the law of railroads, cites the following as a case in which Congress has exercised its power to regulate commerce carried on among the States by railroads:

The act of June 5, 1866, United States Revised Statutes, section 5258, authorizes every railroad company in the United States to carry passengers, troops, government supplies, mails, freight, and property on their way from any State to another State, and to connect with roads of other States so as to form continuous lines of transportation therein. (Pierce on Railroads, 471.)

The following act, regulating the transportation of live-stock on railroads, was passed March 3, 1873 (Revised Statutes, section 4386), and its constitutionality remains unchallenged:

No railroad company within the United States, whose road forms any part of a line of road over which cattle, sheep, swine, or other animals are conveyed from one State to another, or the owners or masters of steam, sailing, or other vessels carrying or transporting cattle, sheep, swine, or other animals from one State to another, shall confine in the same cars, boats, or vessels of any description for a longer period than twenty-eight consecutive hours, without unloading the same for rest, water, and feeding for a period of at least five consecutive hours, &c.

In the case of The Railroad Company vs. Maryland, Justice Bradley delivered the opinion of the court, which is a complete contradiction of the assumption of the railroad attorney before cited, that the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the States was restricted to the navigable waters. The court said:

No doubt commerce by water was principally in the minds of those who framed and adopted the Constitution, although both its language and spirit embrace commerce by land as well. (21 Wallace, 462.)

And here is another case still, directly in point against the same preposterous assumption, the case of the Pensacola Telegraph Company vs. Western Union Telegraph Company. Chief-Justice Waite, in delivering the opinion of the court, said:

Congress has power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States. The powers thus granted are not confined to the instrumentalities of commerce or the postal service known or used when the Constitution was adopted, but they keep pace with the progress of the country, and adapt themselves to new developments of time and circumstance; they extend from the horse with its rider to the stage coach, from the sailing vessel to the steamboat, from the coach and the steamboat to the railroa l, and from the railroad to the telegraph, &c. (6 Otto, 9.)

LEGISLATION IMPERATIVELY DEMANDED.

We have thus seen that the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the States, whatever may be its agency, unquestionably exists. If it has not been often exercised, it is, as has been well said, in consequence of the extreme sensitiveness of the States in reference to legislation affecting their interests, and especially of late in consequence of the persistent and unscrupulous efforts of corporations to prevent legislation. Nevertheless the power exists, and though it has been for the most part dormant, to borrow the metaphor of a learned counsel in the Passenger Cases, it has slumbered like electricity in the atmosphere, unseen and unfelt, until its forces are concentrated in the thunderbolt of the law. There is an avalanche of testimony invoking its vigorous exercise now.

There are 125,000 miles of railroad in the United States, representing a capital of $6,000,000,000. They penetrate every part of the country. They conduct a business which in one way and another is interwoven with every other interest of the country; and they are rapidly increasing in numbers, in resources, and in power. Their charges are not controlled by competition. It is a maxim of railroad corporations that when "combination is possible competition is impossible." And they have reduced the practice of combination to a science, thus placing every industry and every person who has business relations with them, of whatever kind, completely at their mercy. Twenty-four States of the Union have, to the extent of their capacity, provided legislation to protect the public against the extortions of these common carriers; but their jurisdiction is restricted to State lines. Most of the commerce of the country is interstate. Though State legislation is doing a great deal in protecting the public, it is powerless to correct the worst evils and accomplish the chief desideratum. The States acting separately can not establish a uniform system of regulation. That duty devolves upon Congress.

The question has been raised as to the extent to which State legislation can be carried. Lately there have been decisions by the supreme courts of two of the States directly opposite. The supreme court of Illinois holds that the State can regulate charges for transportation from points within to points without the State. The supreme court of Iowa has announced a different conclusion. These conflicting decisions show the necessity of a uniform system applicable to all the States. In Tennessee the United States district court has suspended the operation of the State law designed to regulate commerce within the State, on the ground that it overleaps State lines and is repugnant to the clause of the Constitution of the United States authorizing Congress to regulate interstate commerce. In Mississippi the operation of the act of the Legislature to carry into practical effect the doctrine of its right of supervision in the interest and for the protection of the people has been stayed by decisions of inferior State and United States courts. The necessity for general legislation is urgent and imperative. On this point I will again have recourse to the well-considered observations of Judge Redfield:

When it is considered that these corporations, possessing such vast capital, have engrossed almost the entire travel and traffic of the country, and that their powers and functions come in daily contact with the material interests of almost every citizen of this great empire, the importance of their being subjected to a wise and just supervision can not be overestimated. This can only be secured by wise and prudent legislation, and to be of much security to public interests it must be by general acts, as it is in many of the States and in England since 1845. (Redfield on United States Law of Railways, 53.)

THE ABUSES MOST IN VOGUE.

The practices most in vogue by the corporations which it is proposed to put under the restraints of law are pooling, unjust discrimination between different persons and different localities, rebates, and drawbacks—all in aid of overcharges and extortion.

Pooling is the most potent agent of extortions. It destroys competition and creates a centralized monopoly. It deprives the public of their right to transportation cheapened by competition, and compels them to pay whatever the monopoly demands. It is an agreement between the companies to fix the same prices, to force the public to pay them without regard to the cost of service, and to divide the profits among themselves. It is an odious combination, violative of public policy, and a conspiracy against public rights. Mr. Depew, the attorney of the New York Central Railroad Company, put it mildly in his argument before the Committee on Commerce when he said that "pooling seeks to secure to all the lines fair prices, and to prevent them from cutting each other's throats by bidding under." In plain language, pooling seeks to destroy competition, and while the corporations are sparing each other's throats they are cutting the throats of the public, from whom they derive their sustenance and support.

Not less contrary to public policy than pooling are discriminations between different shippers and between different localities.

ENGLISH SUPERVISION.

In England, whence we have derived the muniments of our freedom, monopolies of every kind have been dealt with as contrary to public policy; and it is a settled rule of English railway supervision not to permit a railway company to give "undue preference" to one class of shippers at the expense of others. The English books are full of decisions asserting this doctrine and putting down such abuses.

In the case of Diphwys Casson Slate Company vs. The Festinoig Railway Company, in which an application was made to compel the company to desist from giving "undue preference" to other shippers, it was held that the charge complained of was an "undue preference" within the meaning of the railway traffic act and must be discontinued. The company was required to pay the cost of the application (2 Neville & Macnamara, 81). Similar decisions were rendered in the cases of Woodger vs. The Great Eastern Railway Company; The Bellsdyke Coal Company and others vs. The North British Railway Company, and in numerous other cases, in which it was held that "undue preference for one class of shippers over others or for one locality over another, the cost of service being equal, was contrary to public policy and the law of England."

In Gaston vs. The Preston and Exeter Railway Company it was held that an agreement by a railway company to carry at a lower rate for certain individuals in consideration of their sending all their goods by the railway was not justifiable, such an agreement being against public policy. (2 Neville & Macnamara's Railway Cases, 76.)

But even in England, where the sphere of railroad operation is limited in comparison with the United States, it has been found necessary to agitate for additional restrictions for the protection of the public against the encroachments of the corporations. The following extract from the London Times, the great organ of British opinion, presents reasons for a more restrictive policy which are well worth the consideration of American lawmakers:

It is idle to contend that railways are in no need of the state interference, which they very naturally dislike. They are too powerful to be left without control to do just as they may please. From a small beginning they have risen to an importance and an influence too great by far to be left entirely in private hands. They have become an empire within the empire, or, more properly, a number of empires, competing, indeed, with one another, but bound together by common interests not necessarily coincident with the interest of the public and not seldom in antagonism with it. These corporations have portioned out the country among them. In its own district each claims to be supreme, and is capable in point of fact of exercising almost supreme powers. The tariff and train service of a great railway can be so arranged as to make or unmake a neighborhood, to favor a firm or to ruin it, to forbid an industry or to give it an undue advantage. Apart from the railway commission, there has been nothing to prevent the employment of railway influence for all these purposes, and it can hardly be contended that it is for the public good that so potent a force should exist without restraint. It is a matter of course that railway companies should take a different view, and should resent an interference which is imperatively called for in every interest but their own.

The time has come at which a more real superintendence is demanded. The railway commission must go on in an improved form and with more extensive powers than have as yet been intrusted to it. So only can a counter-influence be found to the greatest force that has arisen in modern times, which has long outgrown the restraints which were at first thought sufficient for it, and which bids fair to go on developing and increasing in the future without assignable bounds.

THE PREVALENCE OF ABUSES.

Probably there is no community in the United States where railroads exist that has not suffered from the abuses for which the pending bills will, to some extent, provide a remedy. When I assert that abuses injuriously affecting commerce, both State and interstate, in the State which I in part represent, I assert what every intelligent and observant citizen knows to be true. They are no more frequent nor more virulent in my State than in other States, and doubtless the same testimony can be borne by every Representative of States in which no remedial legislation has been provided. In seeking data for just and proper legislation from Mississippi I have obtained many examples of the manner in which the public are wronged by overcharges and discriminations.

POOL COMMISSIONER FINK'S EXPLANATION.

When Pool Commissioner Fink, who bears the reputation of being the ablest expert in railroad management in the United States, was delivering his argument before the committee against regulating interstate commerce, the following interrogatory and answer were propounded and given:

Mr. BARKSDALE. The cost of shipping a bale of cotton from Memphis to New Orleans, a distance of four hundred and fifty miles, is $1 a bale. The cost from Winona, Miss., a distance of two hundred and seventy-five miles, is $3.25. Now, I ask you if there is any just rule of transportation which would justify a discrimination like that?

Mr. FINK. That would depend a great deal upon the circumstances of the case. * * * Suppose, for example, you had built a road from Winona to New Orleans. Before that road was built what did it cost you to carry a bale of cotton to New Orleans? After you had put your money into this road have you not a right to charge at least a reasonable amount to reimburse you for the cost of carrying this bale, including the investment in that road? Suppose it cost you $3.25 to carry that bale of cotton from Winona to New Orleans, have not you a right to charge that? Would you be willing to do the work for less than cost? Now, if it cost $3.25, including interest on investment, that would be one of the conditions under which a charge of $3.25 would be perfectly justified. I do not, however, know the circumstances in the case you mention, and I would not like to express an opinion unless I knew them.

Mr. BARKSDALE. There are equal railroad facilities between the two points. What I ask is this: If the railroad can afford to transport cotton from Memphis to New Orleans for $1 a bale, the distance being four hundred and fifty miles between those two points, by what rule can it charge $3.25 a bale for the transportation of cotton from Winona to New Orleans, a distance of two hundred and seventy-five miles less, the facilities being precisely the same?

Mr. FINK. That I will try to explain to you.

Mr. TURNER. On the same rail route?

Mr. BARKSDALE. Yes; on the same rail route.

Mr. FINK. Let it be the same. You know the rate between Memphis and New Orleans on a bale of cotton is fixed by the steamboats. They take it for 75 cents, and sometimes 50 cents. The question for the railroad that wants to carry that cotton is to decide whether by taking it for $1 a bale, which is the highest the road can get, they can make a little profit out of it. If it costs that railroad 75 cents and it gets a dollar, that is an additional 25 cents profit per bale to the road. The road-bed is there, and the cars are there, and everything is ready to transport that bale of cotton to New Orleans. No new investment to do this work has to be made. Now, if the road could not get more than a dollar per bale from Winona to New Orleans, it would not pay sufficient interest on the investment, and perhaps not enough to pay the general expenses of the road, and in that case the road could not be operated at all. The road charges very little profit on the New Orleans cotton from Memphis. They charge nothing, perhaps, for the use or the investment in the road; but on the bale of cotton they carry from Winona to New Orleans they must charge for the use of the road, for the investment made in the road, because the road was built for the Winona, not for the Memphis, people. The latter could get along without the road. I can not determine whether or not the charge of $3.25 from Winona to New Orleans is justified; but the road is certainly justified in charging a great deal more than they charge on cotton from Memphis to New Orleans.

This was the confused and insufficient answer to a simple business proposition: If the railroad can afford to take cotton from Memphis to New Orleans, a distance of four hundred and fifty miles, for $1 a bale, how can it justify itself in charging $3.25 for two hundred and seventy-five miles? The real solution is that Memphis is a competing point and there is no pool to keep up freights. Winona is a non-competing point and there is no supervision to prevent the company from charging what the traffic will bear, and the answer resolves itself at last into the Rob Roy principle:

> That they should take who have the power,
> And they should keep who can.

RAILROADS ARE SERVANTS OF THE PEOPLE.

Mr. Fink in his argument before the committee in 1882 said that some of the railroad managers considered themselves autocrats in all that appertained to railroad matters; a significant declaration. Some of them have evidently forgotten, if they have ever learned, that railroads are servants of the people, and that they who build and operate them—in consideration of valuable franchises conferred—are charged with the duty of serving the public, for reasonable compensation, without discrimination, denial, or delay.

THE PENDING BILLS.

The bill reported by the committee prescribes that charges for transportation shall be reasonable. It prohibits discriminations between different persons and different localities under similar circumstances; also pooling, drawbacks, and rebates. It makes companies liable to persons injured by such unlawful acts for the actual damages, recoverable in any court of competent jurisdiction. It prescribes a fine of not exceeding $1,000 for every violation of the act, except that it shall not apply to the clause requiring that charges shall be reasonable. Where wrongs have been willfully committed the court is required to make allowance for cost for the benefit of the injured party at the expense of the company.

It provides for the appointment of a commission charged with the duty of hearing and investigating causes of complaint and instituting judicial proceedings if necessary.

The commission is required to examine the books and accounts of said companies at such times as may be deemed by them necessary; see that all United States laws relating to them are enforced; furnish such information to the several Departments of the Government, or the Government directors of any of said railroads, in regard to the tariffs of fares and freight, or the accounts of said railroads, as may be required of them or as they may deem expedient; make an annual report of their doings to Congress on or before the 1st day of January of each year; and otherwise endeavor to procure the data necessary to the gradual enactment of an intelligent system of national legislation regulating interstate railroad commerce.

It is also required to inquire into that method of railroad management or combination known as pooling, and state the result of their inquiry in their annual report, and whether, in their judgment, any, and if so what, legislation is expedient in relation thereto.

The bill has the double merit of providing remedial measures and appointing a commission armed with the power and authority and money of the Government to enforce them.

In some important particulars the substitute known as the Reagan bill is an improvement on the bill of the committee, notably the clauses which affix a penalty to unreasonable charges, which prohibit discriminations unconditionally, and which forbid a greater price for a shorter than a longer haul. I do not approve its omission of the commission feature.

THE VALUE AND USES OF A COMMISSION.

The plan of a commission has been thoroughly tested in England, and there is no voice in all the realm raised against it; and it has been tried successfully in a majority of the States of the Union.

The value and uses of a commission are conclusively presented in a letter of Hon. T. M. Cooley, the learned chief-justice of Michigan, from which the following extracts are taken:

Few things are more evident to the casual observer than the jealousy with which the railroad interest is regarded by the general public. Some of the reasons for this are as obvious as the fact. The enormous wealth which that interest represents, the rapidity of its growth, the vast numbers and the great ability it summons to its service, and its immense probabilities for evil as well as for good, can not fail most powerfully to affect the imagination, and to cause no little apprehension for the future even in the most thoughtful and well-balanced minds. The fact, too, that the managers of great lines or systems of competing roads are found agreeing upon rates, and perhaps upon apportionment of business, and thus apparently putting an end to competition, has the appearance of organizing those who should be competitors with one or more great monopolies, with which the public is compelled to deal on their own terms; and these terms will prima facie be taken to be unreasonable and offensive, for the reason that they are dictated exclusively by one of the parties concerned, irrespective of concurring will in the other. The railway interest being thus personified as a monopoly, all individual interests, as they come in conflict with it, seem to be placed at great disadvantage; none of them receives and disburses such vast sums of money; none of them has so many desirable places at its disposal; none of them without loss to itself can grant so many favors; none of them has so many means of affecting duly or unduly the legislation of the country. So great a power is certain to be more or less abused, and when it is wielded, as sometimes it will be, by men who are arrogant, overbearing, and reckless of the rights of others, the public are more likely to regard the abuse as naturally and inevitably pertaining to a system than as exceptional.

* * * * * * *

The facts above stated indicate what seems to me the chief need of a railroad commission. The railroad interests and the public stand in apparent antagonism, which frequently and needlessly becomes real antagonism. But they ought to be in harmony and mutual prosperity. The more prosperous the railroads are the better are they able to perform the services for which they are created. To deny them reasonable compensation, to cripple or hamper them by needless and vexatious legislation, to load them down with unreasonable burdens will appear as impolitic from the standpoint of public interest as it would be for an employer to put his servant on short allowance, or to compel him to carry weight at his labor. If, on the other hand, as is not uncommonly believed, the railroad managers sometimes invite unfriendly treatment by assuming a mastery where their just position is one of agency, by disregard of law, by extortion, and by favoritism, the impolicy of conduct on their part is equally plain and equally mischievous.

The first and most important duty of a railroad commissioner will be to stand as a friendly umpire between the public on the one hand and the railroad interest serving it on the other. He should be given power to examine into all the details of railroad work, to investigate local complaints of unfair charges or discriminations, of unreasonable management of trains, or of delays, of obstruction of highways, and the innumerable annoyances and dangers of which the public has, or thinks it has, occasion to complain; to examine the condition of the road, the safety of bridges and other structures; whether proper regulations of police are established and enforced as a protection against calamities; and it should be his duty to bring to the attention of the railroad managers, in an authoritative way, any neglect, omission, or misconduct in which the public would be concerned. He should prepare himself to give authoritative and reliable information as a basis for public judgment on railroad affairs, and his impartial position and standing should be such that his information will be accepted without any of the suspicion which is so likely to accompany that which is furnished by the railroad companies themselves.

It can not admit of doubt that a competent and suitable commission, occupying this position, could be of incalculable advantage, not only to the public but to the railroad interest.

A STEP IN THE RIGHT DIRECTION.

Perfection is not claimed for either of these bills, but either is a long step in the right direction. It must be remembered that no product of human hands or of human brain is perfect. None but Infinite Power and Wisdom can look upon his work and say, It is finished.

LET THE CONSTITUTION BE ENFORCED—THE RIGHTS OF THE PEOPLE BE MAINTAINED.

It has been said that there are irreconcilable differences between the corporations and the enormous capital they represent on the one hand and the American public on the other—the latter, for self-protection, claiming their right of control by legitimate legislation within constitutional limits; the former denying and defying such control. In the House of Representatives, on the 16th of December, 1869, the late President James A. Garfield, then a member of this body, submitted a report containing this striking language:

I am persuaded that the next great question to be confronted will be that of corporations and their relation to the interests of the people and to national life. The fear is now entertained by many of our best men that the national and State Legislatures of the Union, in creating these vast corporations, have evoked a spirit which may escape and defy their control, and which may wield a power greater than Legislatures themselves. The rapidity with which railroad corporations have consolidated during the past year is not the least manifestation of this power.

In the light of present surroundings, these words, uttered fifteen years ago, read like prophecy. If there is an "irrepressible conflict" between these tremendous forces—I trust there is not—whatever else shall fail, let the Constitution be enforced, let the rights of the people be maintained.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, obtained the floor.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of making a privileged motion.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to go on with my remarks on the special order, which is the interstate commerce bill.

Mr. KEIFER Yesterday I gave notice that to-day I would call up for consideration the Military Academy appropriation bill which I then reported from the Committee on Appropriations. In accordance with that notice I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering that bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. But I raise the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that I can not be taken off the floor and be deprived of my right to proceed with the discussion on the special order without my consent. I was recognized by the Chair and am ready to proceed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Ohio that a motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union is not in order until the morning hour has either been occupied or dispensed with.

Mr. KEIFER. I will make that motion, then, that the morning hour be dispensed with and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the Military Academy appropriation bill. It was the understanding that this special order should not interfere with the appropriation bills.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. But I make the point, Mr. Speaker, that I was recognized by the Chair to continue this debate and can not be taken off the floor without my consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The point I raise is this: That I can not be taken off the floor or deprived of my right after once having been recognized by the Chair.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose did the gentleman rise?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. To discuss the question before the House.

Mr. CHACE. The interstate commerce bill.

Mr. KEIFER. But the gentleman had not entered upon the discussion.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. But I received the recognition of the Chair, and was about to proceed when interrupted by the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The motion made by the gentleman from Ohio is not in order until after the morning hour has either been occupied under the rules of the House or dispensed with. The gentleman from Ohio, therefore, rises for the purpose of making another motion, which is not privileged as against the consideration of the special order.

Mr. KEIFER. But I understand this special order was made not to interfere with the appropriation bills, and that being so, my right to make the motion to proceed to the consideration of one of the appropriation bills should not be cut off.

The SPEAKER. The special order made by the House in regard to the interstate-commerce bill is subject to the consideration of appropriation and revenue bills, but this difficulty arises in the administration of the rules: that it is not in order under the rules of the House to move to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union until after the morning hour has been occupied or dispensed with.

Mr. KEIFER. To that I agree.

The SPEAKER. Whereas under the special order made by the House it is in order to call up the interstate-commerce bill before the morning hour. It was called up this morning before the morning hour was occupied or dispensed with, and the House is now considering it.

Mr. KEIFER. I agree to that; but while that is all true, the reservation in the special order that it should not interfere with appropriation or revenue bills would not be operative under such circumstances.

The SPEAKER. That is the difficulty the Chair has.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. This does not come out of my time, I suppose?

The SPEAKER. It does not.

Mr. KEIFER. This special order is for the consideration of the interstate commerce bill in the House. Although it may be brought up before themorning hour, yet by the very terms of the special order, that it shall not interfere with revenue and appropriation bills, as I am informed, presents this question to the Speaker: That if an appropriation bill is called up and the House is ready to proceed, it is not to be interfered with. While it is true, as stated by the Speaker, that the morning hour must be occupied or dispensed with before the motion to go into Committee is in order, yet under the circumstances, when the motion is submitted to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of taking up an appropriation bill, a case is presented where the Speaker should entertain that motion to dispense with the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman, in order to get at what he properly considers a privileged motion—that is, a motion privileged at a particular time—is compelled to make an intervening motion which is not privileged, to wit, the motion to dispense with the morning hour, which is not a privileged motion as against the special order heretofore made by the House. The Chair has stated already that there is some difficulty in administering the rule and the special order together, on account of the fact that the order of the House fixing the consideration of the interstate-commerce bill did not provide that it should be taken up after the morning hour or at any particular time during the day, and it was taken up after the reading of the Journal and before the morning hour had been occupied or dispensed with. It is now under consideration, and the gentleman from Illinois is entitled to the floor.

Mr. KEIFER. But whenever taken up under the special order the consideration was to be without interfering with appropriation or revenue bills.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, there is no disposition on the part of the Committee on Commerce to interfere improperly with appropriation or revenue bills, but we do protest upon an effort to take us off the floor when the special order is under consideration and I have been recognized to proceed with the debate. Satisfactory and proper arrangements can be made with the Committee on Commerce in the proper way and at the proper time, but it is not proper nor satisfactory in the way in which the gentleman now proposes to take me off the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized as occupying the floor. The Chair thinks he has no discretion whatever in the matter.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the railway problem, or the question affecting that interest, industry, or institution, which has the carrying of our overland traffic, which is capitalized for nearly four times the amount of our national debt, and whose receipts annually exceed those of the United States by more than twice, is a subject that I enter upon with much trepidation and with a feeling of genuine uneasiness.

This very question has been discussed and legislated upon for scores of years by the legislative bodies of foreign countries relating to their several systems with not altogether satisfactory results; our Congress has given the subject much thought and discussion, and more than two thirds of the States have passed and repealed and subsequently passed other laws for its regulation, and yet the problem has not been satisfactorily solved.

The rights of the public and the duties of the management of the great system have not been sufficiently marked out and established to altogether allay the jealousy and sometimes bitterness with which each interest looks upon the other, or sufficiently to create that harmony and mutuality of interest which ought to prevail for the welfare of all.

Such observations, however, as I submit at this time are those toward which my judgment is inclined from the brief study which a member of this House can give to so important a topic and such experience as my duties in life have given me upon the subject.

The attempt to solve the question or to regulate interstate commerce, the through-railway traffic of this country, by arbitrary rules or by iron-bound and inflexible penal statutory provisions, as suggested in the substitute offered by Judge REAGAN, does not commend itself to me at this time as a wise thing to do, and I fear that it might, should it become a law, create more new evils than it proposes to correct.

For myself I would be content if at this session we could secure the passage of an act creating a commission, with advisory and visitation powers something like the commissions of New York and Massachusetts, the commission to report to the next Congress what legislation a careful and thorough study of the subject seemed to demand, and to leave the question right there until a full, exhaustive, and intelligent investigation was had and the report of the commission received thereon. But the committee has in its wisdom thought best to report the bill now before the House, which in the main meets my views, although I would have personally preferred simply a commission as a first step; for notwithstanding the arraignment given the committee for its conservatism by our friend from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON], I am still of the belief that if there is any one question toward which we should move with extreme care and caution, it is the prescribing a rule of conduct for the government of the managers of the great railway systems of this country in the transportation of our supplies; and that is just what we are attempting to do.

The question is a too-important one for careless or ignorant handling, no matter how honest the motive, and this Congress should do no more as a first move than is absolutely demanded to correct existing evils and secure intelligent inquiry as to evils alleged to exist for future legislation.

I have no doubt in my mind that the power is vested in Congress to regulate interstate commerce, and possibly confine its action to that commerce carried upon the railroads alone, but the immense interest involved, the 125,000 miles of railroad, its great original cost—something like seven billions of money—with its employment of 250,000 of our people, the gigantic commerce carried, with all of its ramifications and peculiar conditions, all of which will be affected more or less by any law we may enact, the position this vast interest occupies as a vital factor in our national prosperity admonishes me to use such influence as I may possess to see that such power as Congress may have shall be exercised with great care. This from the firm conviction "that to exercise that power unwisely would derange the entire export trade of the country and destroy the agricultural and commercial interests of every Western State."

I believe that it is time for Congress to consider the subject, and am in favor of intelligent legislation. I stand as no apologist for the great wrongs which railway management has committed. I would visit with condign punishment scoundrelism in this as in any other business. I would demand that railways should not be permitted to unjustly ruin individuals or to wipe out of existence prosperous towns, the building up one section to the ruin of another, the gobbling up of whole sections of the country, and the stealing of eligible sites and locations, as is currently reported and generally believed is done; but I would first ascertain definitely what the evil to be corrected is, how best to cure it without creating new evils, and then apply the remedy.

Much of the discrimination and hardship complained of has already been relieved by the roads themselves in the absence of any national law, and complaints have become fewer, with increased intelligence on the part of the management, in the light of the steady, gradual, but regular reduction of the rates of transportation made by the railways themselves. The more intelligent the management the fewer will be the complaints. There is now but little complaint made to Congress by the producer or the consumer; few, if any, petitions come from them, but such as we have come mainly from the middlemen in commerce.

The several States have accomplished much by legislation to prevent unjust discrimination on local traffic, and the people and the management of railways, by reason of the discussion and agitation of the subject in the Legislatures, by reports of the State boards of commissioners, and by educating themselves on the subject, are beginning to understand that their interests are mutual, and that a reasonable, uniform, and regular rate for the transportation of supplies, that gives security and stability to business, is more to be desired than a fluctuating rate caused by railroad wars or by other abnormal conditions, which frequently is an unreasonable rate to either one or the other.

The management understand that the people demand honest and intelligent management of these properties; that railroad wars must cease; that the public shall be honestly and faithfully served; that the public has a right to know whether the charges it pays are reasonable and whether the service is properly performed. It does not expect rates lower than the cost of carriage, for it knows eventually it will have the difference to pay; but reasonable, uniform, and stable rates are demanded by the business interests of the country. The management recognize this fact as much as Congress does, and much improvement in this direction has taken place in the last few years.

Massachusetts, New York, and other States have established railway commissions, with advisory and visitation powers only, which have done much to establish friendly relations between the roads and the people, and these commissions are commended by the most zealous advocates for railway regulation who appeared before our committee last session. The favorable reports received, and the experience had, would seem to justify Congress in moving in the same direction. Mr. L. E. Chittenden, a prominent and conspicuous figure for several years in the advocacy of national railway legislation, spoke in strong terms of commendation of the New York commission.

Mr. Simon Sterne, representing the New York Board of Trade and Transportation, who appeared before the committee, urged the creation of a national commission. Mr. Andrew J. White, of New York, representing the commercial interests of New York, urged the creation of a commission, and read before the committee a resolution passed by the special committee of the Chamber of Commerce recommending a commission. Mr. J. G. Shepard, of New York, representing the farmers of the State of New York, also recommended a commission.

The English Government totally abandoned all confidence in the operation of the law of competition in relation to railways, and appointed in 1873, after the trial for many years of other experiments, a royal commission; and of this commission Mr. Chittenden says, in reply to a question from Mr. Seymour, of the committee, relating to a violation of the law, as follows:

Mr. SEYMOUR. Is there a penalty provided for the breach of that law?

Mr. CHITTENDEN. Only the ordinary penalty in England; but that is quite sufficient. Of course in England in any case of undue preference the citizen may apply to the railway commission, and the railway commission enjoins its continuance.

In this connection, and in support of a commission, I wish to read a paragraph from the report of the railroad commission of the State of Iowa. I read from their report for the year 1883, on pages 34 and 35:

There is at times a feeling that the through rates are too high, and again that they are too low; that Congress should interfere to protect the stockholder, guard the public against fluctuations, and should regulate railway transportation so as to prevent the extremes being reached. Whether the through commerce would be the gainer by the interference of Congress is a serious question, and one that it is not safe to assume affirmatively without investigation. While Congress has the power under constitutional authority to regulate commerce among the States, there certainly is a particular for argument whether this was intended to empower that body to fix the rates of common carriers.

The Supreme Court of the United States has held that States may do this—that is, regulate rates—

and it is no unwarranted assumption to claim that the court would hold that Congress had the same power. To exercise it unwisely might derange the entire export trade of the country and destroy the agricultural and commercial prosperity of the central States in the interest of those nearer the seaboard.

Now, on the subject of a commission the report goes on to say:

We are inclined to the opinion that a commission created somewhat after the form of the State commissions, whose business it should be to investigate the whole subject of transportation by rail, might be of great service and be the means of furnishing Congress information that could not be readily acquired elsewhere. In our judgment, until this is done legislation that attempts to do more will probably affect injuriously our internal commerce.

That is, as I have said, an extract from the report of the Iowa railroad commissioners. I wish now in this connection to read two or three paragraphs from the report of the United States Commissioner of Railroads for 1883. I read from page 19:

Any law not based upon full information might work great injustice to the companies and be inadequate to the proper protection of the people. Experience has shown that unreasonable laws cannot be enforced, and in many instances have worked such great embarrassment to transportation as to become inoperative by common consent. Many such laws, hastily enacted, have been quickly repealed. I therefore respectfully renew my former recommendation, that a commission be appointed to take into consideration the whole subject and report to Congress the facts necessary for intelligent and efficient action upon the subject.

It will be noticed that I have quoted from no one who appeared before the committee in the interest of any railroad.

From these recommendations and authorities and in the light of what has already been accomplished in the experience of others, I am constrained to believe that a railroad commission with limited powers is the step for us to take first.

The argument that has been advanced and will be heard again, that we have not the men who could honestly protect the interest of the public, I care not to reply to. I have a better opinion of humanity than that; I have more confidence in my people; I have more confidence in my associates here upon this floor; I have more confidence in the public men of this country, than to believe that three men could not be selected, or five, or five hundred, who would execute a trust of this character honorably and with great fidelity.

There are many other reasons I might give for my belief in a commission, but I wish to point out some of the objections I have to this substitute and wherein as I believe a commission would be better without charging it with the execution of such laws.

No one can doubt that thousands of instances would arise where the application of the iron-bound, inflexible laws of penalties and prohibitions, as provided for in the Reagan substitute, would bring embarrassment and hardship upon the very service we hope to improve, and in my opinion they would be fatal to the execution of the provisions of the substitute should the bill become a law, for it is well established that unreasonable laws can not be enforced.

REBATES.

The Reagan substitute prohibits rebates. On principle I would be in favor of that provision, but we had many an illustration where freight carried to a certain point failing to find market for the property, the same might be carried to some other point, and certain rebate would be allowed, that the property might compete with like property shipped from a different point. It seemed to be in the interest of the miner and in the interest of the consumer, and appeared fair and equitable, and injured no one. The illustration given by Governor LONG of the rebate allowed to the exporter of staves is another case in point, and thousands of illustrations could be given where the rebate was in the interest of every known law of trade; and yet a rebate of 2 cents on a bushel of grain given to one house handling that article in Chicago, and denied to another, would build up one house and destroy the other. Bankruptcy and failure, prosperity and wealth, would come and go at the instance of the railway management. In the one case a genuine benefit was gained and no one injured; in the other, ruin and bankruptcy. The committee have not prohibited rebates in their bill, but provide that all shall be treated alike. A commission would probably soon regulate this.

POOLS.

The next point to which I would call attention is to that provision in the substitute which prohibits the management of different lines to arrange for a division of freight at competing points, sometimes called pooling. This provision, like most of the others, appears plausible and would seem to be in the interest of the people; upon its face it would indicate that it would encourage competition; and yet many and long-continued bitter and wasteful wars were fought and millions of money squandered before this method of adjusting differences was adopted.

At first such an arrangement was not well understood, and was proclaimed against by the people, but it is now urged with much force by both the carriers and shippers that it has given greater uniformity and stability to rates; that in no instance is it resorted to for the purpose of raising rates, but on the contrary has actually reduced them, and secured greater efficiency to the service.

When there is strong competition a railroad will usually do one of two things: it will either secure its fair share of the traffic, or it will engage in a relentless warfare, ruinous to itself and demoralizing to all legitimate business affected by it.

The Iowa commission speak of it, on page 43, as follows:

> In the pooling, whichever form is followed, it is claimed that the facilities for the transaction of business are more reliable and that a saving in the cost of conducting and managing the business is effected. We understand that experience shows that whether railway companies allow business to take its natural channels or compete strongly for it the result in percentage to each is about the same. Whatever the effect of pooling may be in the future, one thing is certain, that with all the pools, combinations, and consolidations that have been formed in the past twenty years the result has been a gradual reduction of rates from the great grain and stock raising regions to the ultimate market.

The English board of commissioners, with Gladstone as arbitrator, allowed roads reaching a central point to make a division of traffic.

The royal commission of England in 1872, composed of the then leading statesmen of England, concluded their report with the statement of the conclusions to which the commission had come: "That past amalgamations had not brought with them the evils which were anticipated; that competition, however, between railways exists only to a limited extent and can not be maintained by legislation."

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] in his speech quoted the remark of Stephenson, frequently used when this topic is discussed, "that where combination was possible competition is impossible." Now, what business wants is reasonable and stable rates, and competition in railroad traffic does not secure it. Albert Fink in his argument, speaking on this subject, said that were Stephenson alive to-day he would, in speaking on the same subject, say "that where competition is possible combination is necessary," and gives as a reason "that without combination between competing carriers it is impossible to carry out the intent and spirit of the common law, which requires 'that there shall be like charges for like service.' "

The committee's bill requires this matter to be considered fully by the commissioners and report made thereon. The Reagan substitute prohibits it without any discretion. The experience in the States and in England does not warrant us in prohibiting railroads to arrange for a division of freights at competing points. It does not appear to be against public policy as administered; and I am free to admit that I would prefer to wait the report of a competent commission before with one stroke I would strike down the one great remedy adopted by the railroads themselves to prevent relentless railroad warfare.

SCHEDULES.

The provision in the substitute requiring the posting of schedules for five days, like all of the provisions, is fair and plausible to look upon, and our friend from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] became indignant because objection was made to it. He believes the railroad attorneys drew up or might have drawn up many of the provisions of the committee's bill. I might say to him in reply that this provision is worthy of the most cunning attorney of the steamship lines or of the Canadian railroads.

Our genial friend from Kansas, whose heart is always right on all these great economic questions, asks, in his own dramatic style, "What objection can be made to this? Suppose it does take five days or ten days to have schedules posted and notice given to the public. Who is it to injure? What of it? Sticking to the bark, gentlemen. Too thin! Too thin!" Now, I believe to require this simple and innocent-appearing duty to be performed by each railroad coming within the provisions of this bill, and not to require it of the others, or of the competing lines of transportation by water and otherwise, so as to include all lines carrying through traffic, you perpetrate an outrage that is indefensible; you discriminate unjustly and outrageously in favor of foreign railroads against our own system, take away the only weapon of defense our great trunk lines have to protect themselves against the Canadian roads, and place a club in the hands of foreigners to beat out the life of your own industries.

Such is the effect that simple provision will be liable to accomplish, should it become a law and be enforced. To illustrate, using an illustration submitted to the committee, I think, by Governor BROWN: The route is from Galveston or Houston to Saint Louis. It will require, say, one day to determine and adjust the rate, one day to publish the schedules, and probably it would require three days to have them properly posted, two in each depot, from Galveston to Saint Louis. Now, the rate can not go into effect until the last schedule posted has been up five days. Here are ten days required in which to make a change in the rate of freight.

This line of road competes at Galveston with steamers and water craft for freight to Saint Louis. On the morning of the day the schedule is to take effect upon the railroad the water transportation lines not affected by this bill reduce their rates just enough to secure all of the desirable freight. Is not the railroad helpless? Do not the steamboat lines command the freight at that port for the next ten days? Do you not thereby prevent competition? Can not the water lines repeat this dose of medicine to the unwilling and emaciated patient every eight or ten days until a relentless war of rates is commenced, to the ruin of possibly both lines and the demoralization of legitimate business? Do you not encourage just this kind of mischief by this provision? Is it not direct discrimination against the railroad in favor of the boats, and to the benefit of no one save owners of water-craft stock?

Take the Canadian lines as another illustration. Could they not command by this means the traffic from Chicago for eight or ten days at a time against the Pennsylvania Central, Lake Shore, Baltimore and Ohio, and other lines? Most certainly they could.

Our lines are bound for eight or ten days; no change, no help, the iron-bound statute must be enforced; one thousand or ten thousand dollars penalty—for what? for whom? For the foreigner, that his line may be privileged that ours may be destroyed.

Such would be the practical working of this provision unless our lines and management go over to the Canadian lines and agree to their terms, whereas to-day the American lines can protect themselves by an instantaneous reduction to meet any warfare the foreign line might attempt.

Could not the steamboat and barge lines from Chicago to Buffalo and thence to New York by the New York Central, none of which lines are affected by this bill, do the same thing? And would not the Pennsylvania Central, Erie, Baltimore and Ohio, and other lines be at the mercy of the lines favored by this discriminating law?

Justice and equity would seem to demand that all transportation lines should be required to post schedules, if any are required to do so, for a definite time prior to a change of rates. It is a question which should be thoroughly considered by a competent board before its enactment into law.

LONG AND SHORT HAUL.

I now come to the long and short haul provision, of which much has been said upon both sides. The Reagan substitute absolutely prohibits more being received or charged for a short than for a long haul. Like all of the provisions of that substitute, they are fair to look upon, and this, as Governor LONG stated in his eloquent speech, as an abstract principle appears all right, theoretically correct; but is it correct in principle when applied to the workings of a railroad and the rights of the people geographically considered? I think not. It discriminates in favor of one locality against that of another. In one instance it would grant additional advantages, not local or natural to the place; in another instance it would take from the place that which nature had secured to it.

This provision pays no attention to the geography of the country, and seeks by statutory provisions and great penalties to place all towns and locations in the United States on the same level or equality, except in discriminating in favor of towns miles nearer the seaboard, thereby tearing down or overturning the natural laws and the laws governing trade and commerce. I therefore seriously object to the geography of this provision as applied to commerce.

The laws of trade and commerce do not recognize miles distant as the important factor; facilities, not miles, is the great item to be considered. And yet this provision would take away all the natural advantages possessed by one town to build up another which has no such advantages. It is contrary to the laws of nature, the law of commerce, and can not be successfully accomplished.

Chicago is much nearer the seaboard from a commercial standpoint than many an inland town located hundreds of miles east of her, simply because she has great natural facilities. The clear water in front of that city extends in an unobstructed volume to the docks of New York and Montreal, thereby enabling her without the aid of railroads to lay freight down in New York and Montreal at a cheaper price than is possible from a more eastern, inland, and mountain-locked city.

Water transportation is the natural regulator of railroad transportation. Improve your harbors, dredge your rivers, build your canals, and increase the natural facilities, and tax the entire people to pay for it, but do not seek to lessen the value of those facilities enjoyed by others.

The increasing of the facilities for water transportation by improving the Illinois and Michigan Canal and the immediate construction of the Hennepin Canal will do more toward cheapening freights and regulating the railroad traffic from Kansas, Iowa, Nebraska, Minnesota, and other Western States than the passage of all the interstate-commerce bills that the wisdom of this House could formulate or that the courts would have the nerve to enforce.

Hear what Mr. Fink, who appeared before the committee, had to say on the factors which were considered in fixing rates on the leading trunk lines of the country:

Another very important rule of action has been adopted by the railroad companies located in the territory east of the Mississippi River, north of the Ohio and the Northern Atlantic seaboard, by which the influence of the low rates on the Erie Canal and the lakes is felt in determining the rail rates from all other points in this great section of the country.

When the rates of transportation between New York and Chicago have been regulated by the competition of the water routes, all the tariffs in this section of country are adjusted upon the basis of the relative distance of the various points from New York, using the distance from Chicago to New York as the basis. The agreed differences are again allowed from the same places to Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore. In this case the popular pro rata principle can be, and is, permanently adopted in establishing the tariffs. The distance of Saint Louis, for example, from New York is 16 per cent. greater than the distance from Chicago to New York, and the rate from Saint Louis to New York is 16 per cent. higher. Can anything be fairer? The low rates established on the Erie Canal and lakes are thus extended to Saint Louis, and that city enjoys the full benefit of cheap railroad transportation the same as Chicago.

Chicago is the great focal point of transportation in the West; she has natural advantages which this provision of the substitute will, in my opinion, to a great extent, deprive her of; and yet without such natural advantages to this or some other point in the West no such rates as obtain to-day would be secured.

The Western farmer by reason of water transportation can command a reasonable rate on his product to New York, and yet you propose to prohibit him the use of the railway unless the Pennsylvania, New York, West Virginia, and other farmers, with no such advantages, located hundreds of miles farther from New York commercially than the Western farmer, shall be allowed to send their crops to market on the basis of the Western farmer's advantages, to the detriment and increase of cost to the latter.

The point I wish to fix in this connection is this, that this substitute discriminates in favor of a town geographically near New York against our people of the West who are commercially nearer New York. You deprive us in the West of the use of the railroad; you take from the railroad the freight, in order to secure or attempt to secure to the man through whose town a railroad runs—now getting transportation at rates he could never dream of except for this through freight—even better rates than he now enjoys at our expense.

Who does it injure that a full train of our grain goes through your town on through bill of lading to Liverpool at a rate which will permit us to compete not with you but with the crop from India, Egypt, and Russia, thereby enabling our farmers to dispose of their surplus grain, instead of consuming it at home as fuel or letting it rot in the field, although you may, forsooth, in rare instances be required to pay a little higher rate upon one hundred pounds of oats to New York. Take as an illustration one made before the committee: On the route from New York to New Orleans the rate through was 70 cents per one hundred pounds. This was all that the merchant would pay. He could ship by water a trifle less. To compete—and competition it is said is what we want—to compete with water 70 cents was the maximum that could secure any freight. Now this route runs through Atlanta, and the rate to Atlanta was $1 per one hundred pounds, and this is regarded as an injustice. Why? Because Atlanta was geographically nearer New York than New Orleans, and yet New Orleans could ship at 70 cents regardless of the railroad, and Atlanta without the railroad would be a pasture-lot. Atlanta has freight cheaper than ever before, and yet it is demanded that Atlanta by arbitrary law shall be placed upon the same footing as New Orleans, with none of her natural advantages. To do so would possibly deprive New Orleans of the use of the railroad and increase the rate to Atlanta.

It is possible that this provision, should it become a law, might aid in equalizing freights to some points in Illinois and the West, but it can not accomplish more in this direction than will be secured by a commission; and to pass this as an arbitrary law will, in my opinion, reduce the value of every farm in the West. The next point that will arise and cause litigation under this provision will be the method of determining the rate of freights—what shall be the basis of adjustment. Chicago has 1,000 cars of wheat for Liverpool, the bill of lading is through, the rate may be subject to extra charge by waiting steamer in New York, but when the pro rata rate, Chicago to New York, per hundred pounds is ascertained on that shipment, will that be the maximum upon which each hundred pounds of like freight going either way or through or only to intermediate points shall thereafter be adjusted?

The substitute makes no allowance for quantity, and while I do not approve of discriminating against a small shipper, I would draw the line somewhere. It appears to me a little unjust to put the casual shipper of fifty or one hundred pounds of freight or a coop of chickens on the same basis with a regular car-load shipper, and yet this substitute goes on the assumption that there is no greater care required, risk carried, or expense incurred in dealing with one hundred shippers than with one shipper, provided the aggregate and kind of freight are the same.

I do not discover any well-defined business principle or a conformity with the rules of trade and commerce in any such transactions. But it is urged that the road will have all the discrimination there is in the difference in distance; that is, that you can charge as much from Boston to Albany as you do to Chicago, if you wish; that the substitute does not prohibit it. I do not believe that the provision would be so construed in court. The meaning of the provision is that the railroad shall not charge more for a short than for a long haul.

On one bill of lading the long haul would be, say, Boston to Springfield. All freight between Boston and Springfield would be governed by the long haul in this instance. The next bill of lading might read Boston to Pittsfield. That would be the long haul in that instance and govern intermediate shipments. The next bill of lading might read to Albany, the next to Utica, and so on to Buffalo, Cleveland, and to Chicago; it will make, and must make, on going west, every succeeding western station the long haul, affecting points intermediate, and going east every succeeding eastern station. So that we would find that the through rate Boston to Chicago would be the aggregate or sum of the local rate charged between stations. Having settled rates from Boston to Chicago and New York to Chicago, how are we to protect our roads against a rate established by the Canadian lines? How about the rate from New York to Buffalo and thence on New York Central boats to Chicago? This bill does not presume to touch that route, and could not, so far as the railroads are concerned, if it attempted to.

Having bound up the Pennsylvania Central, Lake Shore and connections, Erie, and Baltimore and Ohio on rates, can we protect them against the New York Central and the barges? Most certainly not. We thereby prevent competition and legalize discrimination. What will be the basis of the rate Chicago to New Orleans and intermediate points? The rate, of course, must be fixed by rail; yet the Illinois Central to Cairo and by boat to New Orleans, not affected by this bill, would receive the benefits of this act.

There are thousands of instances of inequalities, of discrimination, of legalized outrages that could be cited which would be possible under this provision not possible to-day; and no cast-iron provision of this character can be applied to correct existing evils with justice, equity, or common fairness.

Mr. Chittenden, the great New York advocate of the originial Reagan bill, did not approve of this provision, and cited English cases to show that a greater charge for a shorter than for a longer haul was not prohibited by the English law and was approved of by the royal commission.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have thus hurriedly submitted some of the more prominent views which I entertain with reference to this subject as well as the objections which occur to me in opposition to the substitute of the gentleman from Texas. These views I present in advocacy of the features of the committee's bill. I believe it is our duty to look upon this question from a national standpoint instead of a local one. What may be applicable to the transcontinental lines may not be applicable to those east of the Missouri River. What may be applicable in a matter of national legislation with reference to the transportation of our supplies for domestic consumption may not be properly applicable to the transportation of supplies for export. What may be reasonable and proper in Illinois might not be in California.

But, as I have said, we must look upon the question from a national standpoint, and pass such laws as we believe will be practicable and of service; and in this connection I desire to say that the commission recommended by several States and adopted in England is, in my opinion, much fairer, much better, and will accomplish more good than any iron-clad statutes we can pass at this time.

I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR].

Mr. HORR. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] reserved also fifteen minutes of his time, which he placed at my disposal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCMILLIN in the chair). The gentleman from Michigan is entitled to fifteen minutes remaining of the time of the gentleman from Illinois who has just taken his seat, and ten minutes of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, making twenty-five minutes in all.

Mr. HORR. Mr. Speaker, the twenty-five minutes allotted me is perhaps all the time I desire to occupy in this discussion.

In the Forty-seventh Congress this question of interstate commerce received long, patient, and careful consideration from the committee upon which I then served, hence I shall be compelled to speak to-day largely from impressions that I received at that time. I well remember that the question was one that I left after long investigation fully satisfied that I had by no means mastered it; indeed the feeling was strong that I had come nowhere near mastering it; still I do remember that while I was well satisfied of my inability to present a remedy for all the difficulties of the case, yet there were certain things sought to be done by the bills introduced which I was clearly of the opinion should never be attempted.

To begin with, the railroad system of this country is so extensive, so complicated, so intricate, has to do with such a vast diversity of interests, that I defy any man, I care not how extensive or prolonged his study of the question may have been, to define or lay down any rule of action that will work exact justice in all cases. Indeed, I came to the conclusion that so varied were the circumstances, so peculiar the conditions that surround almost all these great commercial transactions, that really the only possible method to do justice to all the people and at the same time to permit that perfect freedom which is so essential to the carrying trade of the country, is to let each individual transaction stand or fall by itself.

This subject has been agitated constantly in this country for the past fifteen or twenty years. Legislation has been had in various States looking to the control of transportation by iron-clad rules, and if I am not misinformed, no State has attempted this work in that way that has not been compelled to retrace its steps and go back in the end to the commission plan, which is one of the features of the bill now before the House and reported to it by the Committee on Commerce. This result arises from the fact that no law can be devised which will take cognizance of all the peculiar relations that surround so many different transactions in the freighting business of this country.

The case referred to by my friend from Baltimore [Mr. FINDLAY] is one that no man can defend. In that case the railroad company carried sugar for one large dealer from Baltimore to New York for a cheaper rate than it did for another large dealer, and that too after it had agreed to give the first party as low a rate as it did any of its customers. These dealers were similarly situated, entitled to the same treatment, and had no bargain of the kind been made each shipper would have been, in common honesty and fairness, entitled to the same treatment; were all freighting transactions as simple and clear as that one, a bill could easily be framed that would reach the case. No one favors such unjust discrimination as that, and I do not complain of the Reagan bill, this substitute of the gentleman from Texas, on account of its effect upon that class of cases. His bill not only stops that kind of transactions, but it also prevents discriminations that are just and proper, and without which the business of the country would suffer, and it seems to me almost a matter of demonstration that to pass this substitute will increase the difficulties that the gentleman himself really desires to remove.

I do not claim to be able to solve this great question; let me go still further and say that in my judgment it is one of the questions that nothing but time and practical experience can solve. Men of great ability are devoting their entire time in faithful effort to devise a remedy for the inequalities and unjust discriminations of the carrying trade, and it behooves a body like this to move slow in the passage of any bill that shall in any way hamper any traffic, and especially when dealing with a business that we all know is so full of complications as to baffle the skill and ingenuity of the ablest experts. I would avoid every existing evil to the utmost of my ability, but I would be slow in approaching "evils that we know not of."

Let me state in the outset that I have no sympathy with that class of men who are constantly inveighing against railroad companies simply because they are corporations. I have no sympathy with the people who believe that the combined capital of the country has not been beneficial in its development.

I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that it has become quite common, and in some localities very popular, to rant against all combinations of capital made for the purpose of developing the resources of our common country. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] has caught this spirit of the age and is quite a master of its curdling vocabulary. How glibly he talks of "cold-hearted, blood-sucking corporations." It is as good as an ordinary tragedy to just hear him pronounce the word "monopoly," and when he utters the names of "Gould and Vanderbilt" it is almost equal to McCullough in "Virginius"—no, no; I should have said in the "Gladiator." [Laughter.] And in that respect my friend Judge REAGAN is but little behind him.

You shall take men who stand well among their neighbors, who are honored and respected by those who know them best, who are well spoken of by the entire community in which they live. So long as they carry on business as individuals they are all right, but let them put their heads and money together to dig a canal, build a railroad, erect a rolling-mill, put up a salt-block, or organize a bank, and if you can believe these modern critics they at once become a terrible set of "cut-throats," or, to use the classical and clerical language of my friend from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON], "naked, bald-headed robbers." [Laughter.] I believe that the combined effort of capitalists in this country has done more to develop it than any other one agency since the foundation of the Government.

No agency has done more to build up the West than the great railroad system, save and except, perhaps, our common schools. Money has been poured out like water in constructing these great internal highways; men of means have invested their millions in extending them through sparsely populated States and through the very wilderness and over the mountains, with no immediate prospect of returns for their investment. Improvements, homes, civilization have followed in their track, and now I submit they are entitled to fair, honest treatment, and should not be dealt with in a spirit of bitterness and unreasonable hostility.

I introduced a bill very early in this session providing for a simple commission of inquiry, with power to examine into every complaint, to cause the production of books and papers, and thus to get at all the facts surrounding each and every transaction, and thereby enable them to report what was just in each case. It was, as I now understand it, an attempt to introduce into the management of interstate commerce, as nearly as possible, the plan now in existence in the State of Massachusetts, and which I am told has worked for years in that State with signal success. To do more than that at present does not seem to me to be wise or judicious.

I know this does not at all satisfy the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN]. He has been brooding over this subject so long, working at one idea connected with it through so many years, that it has become, as it were, a part and parcel of his very being. Yet, if you will examine the various bills he has introduced and advocated for ten years last past, you will find that even he has made some improvement. One item after another he has himself abandoned. As each new bill appears you will miss some familiar section, until to-day you will hardly recognize in his substitute the bill he pressed upon the country many years ago.

Why, sir, if you compare this bill with the one we worked at so laboriously in the Forty-seventh Congress, you will find he has stricken out the section which gave to informers and prosecutors one-half of all the money that should be collected from the railroads. As I recollect that bill it contained all the objectionable features of the moiety system, and I think the gentleman will admit that he then claimed that that was an essential part of this legislation, that it was really the "gist" of the whole bill.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman is a little extravagant in saying that I regarded that as the "gist" of the bill; it was only a small item.

Mr. HORR. I know the gentleman was very strenuous about that clause at that time, but it has gone into the attempted legislation of the past. So, too, in the early days of this measure the bill contained a clause making it apply to the water ways of the country. Am I not correct in that?

Mr. REAGAN. One bill did.

Mr. HORR. The bill, as I recollect, that you first tried to pass put all these restrictions upon the commerce that was carried over the water ways of the country and which comes in competition with the railroad freights; the same which you now attempt to apply to railroads alone. The water ways by the gentleman's substitute are left free from all the restrictions of this hostile legislation.

Thus year after year he has been compelled to abandon one of his outposts after another, to drop from the bill one great remedial clause after another, and if he would take my advice now and drop out the rest of his substitute and accept in its stead that consummation of human wisdom which I presented to the House on the first day of this session he would then have a splendid bill. [Laughter.] I say this with some assurance from the fact that that bill is not simply my own, but is precisely the one the committee in the Forty-seventh Congress agreed to with great unanimity after an extended examination of the entire question.

But what is the real difficulty with the Reagan bill? I use that term simply because the measure has come to be known all over the United States by that name. I know that gentleman denies that his bill is drawn in a spirit of hostility to the railroads of the land. If you take his word for it (and I can, for I know him to be upright and truthful) his affection for the railroad companies is really something quite touching and beautiful. True his bill, though he does not know it, is favored mainly by that class of people who work themselves into a furore the moment any corporation is mentioned. I have sometimes thought that the gentleman himself has mistaken this local clamor for genuine public sentiment, and that he has been so long working and tugging at his pet measure that it really does seem to him that it is a great work, and one essential to the happiness and prosperity of the country. Has it ever occurred to him that the mere fact of his inability to make others see it as he sees it himself should be sufficient to induce him to call a halt? Let me ask him one question. Have you ever, during your entire work here in Congress, presented this bill to a committee where it has been carefully investigated, testimony taken and arguments presented, and where you have been able to get a report of such committee in favor of your measure?

Mr. REAGAN. Yes, sir. I had the bill twice reported by consent of the committee and once passed by the House by a majority of 35. It was afterward strangled in an adverse committee against the judgment of the House.

Mr. HORR. They may have consented to the report, but I was not aware that a majority of any committee ever adopted the gentleman's bill.

Mr. REAGAN. It was twice recommended and once passed in this House.

Mr. HORR. After an investigation and after proofs had been taken?

Mr. REAGAN. Oh, yes; after we had taken sworn testimony.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Yes; it passed the House.

Mr. HORR. Which Congress passed it?

Mr. REAGAN. The Forty-fifth.

Mr. HORR. That was before my day here. I know the committees in the three Congresses in which I have served have rejected this bill, and to-day the gentleman is simply permitted to introduce it as a substitute; it is not the work of his committee.

Mr. REAGAN. I dislike to interrupt the gentleman, but he ought to confine himself to the exact facts.

Mr. HORR. I am anxious to do precisely that.

Mr. REAGAN. When the bill was beaten in the Forty-seventh Congress the case was not as the gentleman remembers it; it was an 8 to 7 case.

Mr. HORR. I beg your pardon. In the Forty-seventh Congress it was a case of 3 to 12. I was on that committee, and even one of the three did not really believe in many features of your measure.

Mr. REAGAN. The records will show that my bill failed to be reported by a vote of 8 to 7.

Mr. HORR. In the Forty-seventh Congress?

Mr. REAGAN. In the Congress in which you were on the committee.

Mr. HORR. I was on that committee in the Forty-seventh Congress, and the gentleman is certainly mistaken. I remember the circumstances distinctly, and if the rules of the House permitted could name each gentleman and tell how he voted.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL] corrects me. It was in the Forty-sixth Congress that the vote stood 8 to 7.

Mr. HORR. That I presume is true. But in the Forty-seventh Congress I well remember that while quite a number of the members went onto that committee, as I did myself, thinking that perhaps the gentleman's bill was right, after careful investigation and study they became convinced—that is, the most of them did—that the bill would aggravate and not cure the ills it was intended to reach.

Mr. REAGAN. If the gentleman will permit me to interrupt him——

Mr. HORR. Certainly, though my time is limited and fast slipping away.

Mr. REAGAN. I would like to state that in a committee of fifteen in the Forty-seventh Congress, fourteen of them were appointed to oppose the bill and one of them came over and joined me, and there were 2 to 13.

Mr. HORR. That is one worse for you than I had it.

Mr. REAGAN. The committee was 13 to 2, but was intended to be 14 to 1.

Mr. HORR. That is going into a statement of the constitution of that committee, which is beyond my knowledge and which is entirely new to me. I am certain that the gentleman is mistaken as to the facts given.

I know one member on that committee who was not put on with any such idea, for when I was appointed on that committee my feelings, so far as I had any, were in favor of the gentleman's bill, and it was only after careful study that I became fully convinced that the measure would defeat the very end sought to be accomplished, and consequently I abandoned it.

Mr. REAGAN. As to the facts of the case, which I always like to get at, whenever possible, I would like to ascertain the precise time when the gentleman was even in favor of any bill of that kind and the day at which he abandoned it.

Mr. HORR. I abandoned it when I got the testimony, and when I became satisfied that the bill would work harm instead of good. When appointed on that committee I had given the subject little attention; knew little about it; my impressions were in favor of some such legislation, but after careful examination, for the gentleman knows we gave two or three months' hard study to that question, it became apparent to me that the bill proposed by the gentleman would not be best for the people of this country. As the gentleman now admits, thirteen out of the fifteen members of that committee came to the same conclusion. They were mostly men of character. Many of them men of great business experience, and yet they almost unanimously rejected this substitute.

Now, the question I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas is this: If this bill of his is so clearly a good thing for the United States, how does it come about that men who are selected and set to work to examine this question carefully, cautiously, and who faithfully perform that duty, come to a conclusion so directly opposite from his own? I know the gentleman asserts that the committee in the Forty-seventh Congress was made up, packed, so to speak, in the interest of the railroad companies. I did not know that until I learned it here from the gentleman's lips. But how about the committee in this Congress? Was that constituted in the same way? I have heard it rumored that the gentleman had the selection of that committee, and that it was made up with a view of fixing his bill. Will he be kind enough to tell us how that committee stand now?

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman will allow me to say that I did not know the name of one single man who was to be on that committee until the committee was announced at the Speaker's desk. I never named a man on that committee.

Mr. HORR. I presume the statement of the gentleman is correct, and that my intimation as to the gentleman having named the present committee is quite as accurate as what he has said about the committee of the Forty-seventh Congress being packed. I do not believe there was a single man put on that committee for any such purpose, nor do I believe that the gentleman has any knowledge to that effect. I can not think that any such thing ever occurred. But let us return to the committee of the present Congress.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not care to go into a discussion of the matter, but I could show you that I do know what I stated from the very highest authority.

Mr. HORR. Well, let that pass and we will come to the committee of this present House. That was not selected in the interest of the railroad companies, was it? Does any one claim that it was? It was named by the party to which the gentleman from Texas belongs. It is fair, is it not, to presume that this committee is a good, clean committee? How many of them are in favor of your bill, judge—this bill which you say is a remedy for these railroad evils? We have heard from almost all of them during this debate; and if there is one who agrees with you I wish he would stand up and speak. He certainly has not done so up to this date. Why is this? What explanation can be given? Let me make this point a little clearer. Why is it that, whenever a committee of good men, clear-headed, honest men, men who have the good of their country at heart, get together and examine this great question, they almost unanimously come to the conclusion that this pet measure of my friend from Texas is not such a measure as the country needs? Such has been the outcome at least in the Forty-sixth, Forty-seventh, and Forty-eighth Congresses. What I desire to ask is this: Why is it so? Let me tell you why I think it turns out in that way. It is because when these men come to look into all the facts and study carefully all the details and intricacies of the great railroad system of the country, they come to the conclusion that such a measure is not needed and that good business rules will not warrant them in supporting such a bill. And I will try in a few moments to show you that their conclusion is correct.

The pet clause in his bill, the one on which he places the most stress and which he claims will be a remedy against the evils of local discriminations, is the one which provides that no company shall charge more for a short than a long haul. That clause out of this bill and he would abandon it at once, because he considers that the key to the whole situation. Now I believe any man who will carefully examine this question will be forced to come to the same conclusion that so many of these committees have reached, that that is the most dangerous provision in the bill, and that instead of preventing unjust discriminations it really creates them, and that in numerous instances such a rule would hamper trade and prevent the transaction of legitimate, profitable business. It is a strike right at the cheap through freights of to-day, because owing to the competition of the great water ways of the country through freights are as a rule much cheaper than way freights. It is both natural and proper that such should be the case. Railroads are built much more for the benefit of inland towns than for these competing points. These large cities have many ways of getting their products to the markets of the country and the world; the local place has only the one railroad, and is much more beholden to it than the cities that have so many other modes of egress; hence it should contribute more to this one road than can be required at the competing points.

Through freights are low because of the numerous lines that are seeking to procure them. My friend from Baltimore [Mr. FINDLAY] showed yesterday most conclusively that position determines certain commercial advantages and that no legislation can possibly change the natural advantages that arise from these favored situations. His "peanut" illustration should go down to history among the classics. [Laughter.] Among the ancient places of the East, Tyre was noted for its purples, Tarshish for its ivory, Arabia for its gold and its spices, and hereafter side by side with these will stand the peanuts of Pennsylvania avenue. [Laughter.]

And now let me show how completely this Reagan substitute would ruin this very peanut trade.

I hold here in my hand a map of a railroad running from Norfolk, Va., and making connections with a road running to Philadelphia and New York city. Now, this road is compelled to compete with boats carrying freight to Baltimore and thence to New York by rail, with those running directly to Philadelphia, and with others going direct to New York. You may be amazed to learn that at that point of Norfolk last year were shipped over two million dollars' worth of peanuts, the very nuts now made famous by my classical friend. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired. [Cries of "Go on!" "Go on!"]

Mr. RICE. I move that by unanimous consent the time of the gentleman from Michigan be extended indefinitely.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and it is ordered accordingly.

Mr. HORR. I am greatly obliged to the House for its courtesy.

I had just stated to the House that at the point of Norfolk alone there were shipped last year over two million dollars' worth of peanuts, raised mostly in Virginia and North Carolina. This bill of the gentleman from Texas would prevent the railroad from carrying one single carload of that freight, provided that they charged from any intermediate point on the line of their road more for a car of freight than they could get for this through freight.

Now, on the face of the proposition it looks fair and just; a mere statement of this provision looks all right. It is one of those things that seems proper if you do not look into it carefully. But I assure you it will not bear examination. Why not? Simply because at Norfolk the water competition is brisk, and in order to get this through freight at all the railroad is compelled to carry it for much less than the amount for which they can afford to do their other business.

But the gentleman from Texas says: "Why should they get any of it if they must carry it for less than it costs, and then turn around and charge the loss up to the local freight along their line?" Sure enough, if that were true then they should not touch a pound of it, and the gentleman would be correct. But neither proposition is true. They neither carry it at a loss nor do they increase their local rates on account of such through traffic. I well recollect that five or six railroad managers appeared before our committee two years ago, among them a Mr. Alexander, a very intelligent gentleman, who manages a line of Southern roads. He seemed as well posted on this railroad problem as any man I ever listened to. I do not know whether he was before your committee this year or not.

Mr. REAGAN. Not this year.

Mr. HORR. Two years ago he stated in reference to the railroad history of this country that no instance could be found, and he defied any one to point one out, where any railroad company had ever raised its local rates in consequence of carrying through freights at a low price. On this point every railroad manager agreed with him, and they all asserted, on the contrary, that a reduction of local rates almost always followed a reduction of through rates; and my friend from Texas will remember that their universal testimony was that a raise in local freight to make up for losses on through freight was unknown to the railroad business.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if that be true, then the gentleman's proposition falls to the ground. But let us examine this matter a little closer. Ought not a railroad company to be allowed to carry through freights at a less rate than they can afford to do local business? Why not? A railroad company, the same as any other company, ought to be permitted to earn all it can justly on its capital actually invested. It has a right to try and pay interest on the money used in the construction of its road. Local freights should always be carried at a fair and reasonable rate, because it is the only outlet these local points have for their products. If it fixes a fair and just rate for this local traffic, then I say it is not injustice to the people living in these local towns if the company does take through freights at a less rate.

Suppose they fix their local rates so as to pay a dividend of 6 per cent. a year on their investment. If they get any through freight, it is so much extra. If they carry none of the through traffic, other competing lines will, and that, too, at a low rate. They have their engines, their cars, their track on hand; and suppose, in addition to doing their local business, they can carry a portion of this through traffic, and can get it on a basis of paying only 2 per cent. on their investment instead of 6, ought they not to be permitted to do this extra work? Most clearly they should be. This extra 2 per cent. will aid in supporting the company, and in time will enable them to reduce the local rates to a basis of 5 per cent. instead of 6.

Mr. LONG. And finally to reduce them still lower.

Mr. HORR. Certainly such an arrangement will relieve the local traffic constantly, just as long as the through freight pays more to haul it than it actually costs. Can any one longer deny the right of any railroad company to engage in this through business, even though it must do so at a rate lower for a long haul than a short one?

But this clause of the bill in the substitute of the gentleman from Texas discriminates unjustly against all roads that run through more than one State and in favor of roads lying all within one State. It will discriminate in favor of the New York Central, which needs no aid, and against the Delaware and Lackawanna, the Erie, the Baltimore and Ohio, and all the roads of the country that have a continuous line through more than one State. How so? Because you can not formulate a law which will prevent the people of Chicago from sending their wheat to Buffalo as one separate transaction. Then the New York Central can take it as another separate transaction and carry it to the seaboard. This law can not prevent them from getting the best terms possible from Chicago to Buffalo, and the same will be true from Buffalo to the sea-shore. These are separate carriers and neither of them are reached by this bill. It will compel other competing roads to be governed first by the charge made for local freight, next it will prevent them from lowering their advertised rates without posting the new rate for thirty days, and any one can readily see that such routes would stand no chance in the competition for this business. They would be ruled out entirely the moment this law should go into operation.

Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. HORR. Certainly, with pleasure.

Mr. REAGAN. It is not the railroad the bill regulates at all, but commerce. All commerce starting from Chicago to New York or other Eastern points is interstate commerce; when it strikes the railroad it is the same interstate commerce, and is under the operation of this law, whether it passes by water or by railroad.

Mr. HORR. Let us see about that. Suppose I have 100,000 bushels of wheat in Chicago, and I ship it to the city of Buffalo, or to some point in Canada. I may not know just what I will do with it. May sell it in Buffalo; may send it through Canada to the sea-shore; may send it on to New York. Now, your bill would not reach that wheat on its route to Buffalo or Windsor, would it? It is an individual right of mine to ship to any of these points and no law can interfere; at least your substitute would not touch it. Am I right?

Mr. REAGAN. My bill does help that very thing. That fraud on the law is provided for in my bill.

Mr. HORR. What fraud? I have proposed no fraud on your law or any other law.

Mr. REAGAN. The very object of the gentleman's argument is to demonstrate the possibility of defeating the law by fraud——

Mr. HORR. I say there is no fraud intended or committed. I should be simply keeping the law, not breaking it.

Mr. RUSSELL. You might sell your grain in Buffalo, for instance——

Mr. HORR. Of course I might. In that case the gentleman from Texas would admit that his law could not reach it. But I say to him further that I could take it to Buffalo with the honest intention of doing with it what should seem to me best after it reached that city, and then I could decide to send it on to New York or anywhere else I might wish, and your law could not touch it anywhere on its route. That is a right which every man possesses in this country, to do pretty much what he pleases with his own property, provided, of course, that he is lucky enough to have any property. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, this bill not only discriminates in favor of all roads that lie entirely within one State, but it will also give the Canada roads an advantage over all the through lines touching more than one State. You could take grain from Chicago and send it to any point in Canada by boat and thence through the Canadian provinces to the seaboard, and this law would nowhere reach it. I ask the gentleman from Texas if his bill could prevent that? He will not claim that it could. There would be a route to the sea untrammeled by any law. They could bid under and secure freight at their pleasure. The products of the great West would be seeking transportation to the consumers of the East, and our country would present the strange spectacle of having a law so framed as to practically prevent our own companies from competing for the trade, and thus give it all to the roads of a foreign power. Hence I assert if this bill had been entitled "A bill for the benefit of Canadian railways, and to do as much harm to a large number of our own as possible," the title would have been appropriate and accurate.

Mr. Speaker, this short and long haul phrase, as I have already said, sounds well, but there is no practical merit in it. Freights are fixed as a rule upon principles which have been found best adapted to the growth and prosperity of all the business interests of the country. You can not charge freights simply according to weight, nor yet with reference only to the distance hauled. The moment this should be done the business of the country would suffer great loss. Disaster, and disaster only, would follow any such hide-bound rule. Many other conditions must be taken into account when you are fixing just rates for the transportation of the varied products of the land.

My friend from Baltimore [Mr. FINDLAY] who sits here before me knows very well that his city raised a great hue and cry at one time as to the comparative rates to Baltimore and New York. Philadelphia had a hand in the controversy. Finally a high commission, composed of Messrs. Cooley, Thurman, and Washburn, were selected to solve the problem. Baltimore, as I remember the contest, claimed that the grain of the West should be laid down by the railroads cheaper in that city than it should be in New York because of the less distance in reaching Baltimore. I speak only from memory. Am I right?

Mr. FINDLAY. Yes; and she got it.

Mr. HORR. New York claimed, I think, that though she was farther from the grain of the West, that still the "cost of the haul," owing to grades, &c., was less than to Baltimore, and therefore she claimed that the question should be settled upon the "cost" principle. After an investigation of the facts my memory is that it turned out that upon the "cost" principle, too, as well as "mileage," Baltimore had the advantage. But did New York give up the trade on that account? By no means. She continues to handle many times as much grain as Baltimore, and will continue to do so, simply because her people are live people, as much so as are the people of Baltimore. They have built and own their own railroads, have put their own money into them, and hence they will permit the people of no city to cut their business throats. They run their roads, they own them, and they will continue to carry grain at such a rate as will secure to them their immense trade in the cereals of the great West. Have they not a right to do this? Most clearly they have. It is a right they possess under the law of self-preservation, and any statute that tries to annul that great law of nature will always be a dead letter on the statute-book.

I remember some twenty years ago of standing on the banks of the Mississippi River when a steamer with a tow of grain barges floated down that stream. It was, I think, the first trip of the kind ever made. It had started on its way to New Orleans to open up the wheat trade by that route to Liverpool. I know I attended a meeting in Saint Louis commemorating the event, and though it is so long a time since, still the speeches made on the occasion are even now fresh in my memory. They claimed that a new era had just then opened in the grain-carrying trade of this continent.

I recollect that in those speeches the Mississippi River became one mass of steamers and barges from Saint Louis to the Gulf, that Saint Louis itself grew so rapidly that it became the great inland city of this country, and that Chicago soon had grass growing in her streets—in those speeches I mean. [Laughter.] I remember they permitted her to still do a struggling, petty business, such as might be permitted a small hamlet situated as she would be outside the great busy line of the business of the country, and living only in the memory of her past greatness. [Laughter.] They proved by mathematical demonstration that wheat by that route could be landed in Liverpool at a large profit over that sent by the old route. I recollect they had a printed statement of a cargo that had been sent by this new route which showed a large percentage of profit over what could have been realized if it had been sent by Chicago, and from those figures they drew the pictures above referred to.

But, Mr. Speaker, twenty years have gone by, and to-day they are repeating in Saint Louis that same story about this cheap route to Liverpool for the wheat of the country. They are still asserting that that is the natural route for this grain to travel. Theoretically they seem to be right, but practically it does not work. The great bulk of the grain still goes by Chicago and the lakes, and that city is growing faster to-day than at any other minute of her existence. I do not say this to flatter the Chicago men here; they are vain enough already. [Laughter.] Still I will add that in my judgment no city has a greater or more certain future than Chicago. She will continue to be the center of the grain trade of the West and the great shipping point to the East for ages yet to come, and that, too, in spite of any law we may enact, but in accordance with the laws of commerce, which hold business in channels once established until at least a better reason for a change can be given than Saint Louis has yet been able to furnish.

The Saint Louis men in forming their opinion overlooked one fact that enters into this problem. The people of this country consume 90 per cent. of all the grain raised on our broad acres and only 10 per cent. of it goes abroad. The great mass of these home consumers live north of a line drawn through Saint Louis. Hence the northern route must always be the more extensive, and the problem most affected by this bill is the one relating to a cheap transportation for these products from the producers of the far West to the consumers of the East.

The main trouble with the restrictions attempted by the gentleman's substitute is that they will destroy the cheap through rates and increase the present low price of getting the wheat and flour of Kansas, Nebraska, and Minnesota to the mouths of the laboring men of New York, New England, and the entire East. I am not surprised that most of the men here from Kansas oppose this untimely legislation. Why, sir, you pass this bill, and you will reduce the value of every acre of land in Kansas, Nebraska, Minnesota, and Iowa, and in all our far-off Western States. Oh! you do more than that; you compel the teeming millions of workingmen in the East to eat dear bread instead of cheap food, and thus you strike a serious blow at the great cities and manufacturing centers of this country.

These complaints against the railroad companies when carefully examined will be found to be not that they charge too much for local freight, but that they carry through freights for too little money. It is only when comparing local rates with through rates that they get up this fever-heat about extortion. People overlook the great benefits that have come to them by means of this brisk competition of to-day. They forget that it has placed the products of the farm at the door of the consumer at a rate so low as to almost annihilate distance. Then why this constant cry of "monopoly" and "anti-monopoly?" Is it because it tickles the ears of unthinking men? I know it has come to be popular in this country to claim that the people are being ruined, ground to pieces by a few men who own everything; and yet wealth is more evenly distributed in the United States to-day than in any civilized nation under the sun. Not owning anything myself I can appreciate this feeling. [Laughter.] But let us reflect a little. Does it necessarily follow because a man has accumulated a little something that he should be called a "villain," a "heartless monopolist?" The gentleman from Texas is always drawing pictures of the havoc created in this country by a few men who, he claims, are accumulating vast fortunes at the expense of the laboring classes, and he is prone to instance the same men always named by my Kansas friend—Gould and Vanderbilt.

Mr. Speaker, some men do get very rich in these days and many more get to be well off. But does it follow that because they have made money, accumulated wealth, that they have necessarily stolen it? Is it not possible for a man to accumulate wealth faster to-day than could have been done a century ago, and still rob no one in doing it?

Why, sir, fifty years ago, or say one hundred years ago, a man who worked twenty men and made a profit of 50 cents a day on each man had a fine business. To-day a man with the same ability will work 1,000 men, and if he saves 10 cents a day on each man he will make ten times as much money as the man did a century ago, and take less out of the wages of each workingman. Men get rich in this age owing to the magnitude of their operations. Then is it just to base arguments against railroad corporations upon the simple fact that some of their managers have accumulated fortunes? No doubt some men who have come to be directors of railroads have also come to be bad men. Is it reasonable on that account that we should class them all as scoundrels? Can not two men join together in an enterprise and be almost or quite as decent jointly as each man is when acting by himself?

This is coming to be a serious question. One who has listened to this debate for a few days past will almost conclude that it is an utter impossibility for three or four men to associate themselves together for any business purpose, especially to build and manage a railroad, without commencing at once to cheat and wrong somebody. Take for example the two men Gould and Vanderbilt. I take them because they are the men who seem to be ever present in the minds of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON]. These men are said to have obtained vast wealth, but can any man here say that they have wrung it from the wages of the laboring masses. The roads they own and have built have been paid for. The men who did the work, who handled the shovel and the pick, who furnished the ties and laid the iron, have all been paid for their labor. These men have made money, and made it very rapidly in two ways. First, they have taken property that has been badly managed until it could be purchased cheap, they have bought it on the market, and then, by good management, by putting brains into the business, have made the same property valuable. What was worth but little, by their superior skill has come to be worth a good deal. Is not that legitimate gain? Such transactions benefit the owners, but they also benefit the country.

Again, these men have undoubtedly made large sums in another way. Scattered all over the country are men who come to the conclusion that they are fitted for careers of speculation, and with their money they rush into Wall street to take a bout with these old "bruisers of the ring." [Laughter.] They at once tackle stocks—"buy long and sell short." A few weeks or months and the contest is over. The "lambs are shorn" and the leaders of the flock return to their fold "fatter and better fed." [Laughter.] The money thus accumulated does not come from the poor people, and takes nothing from the workingmen. If you can show me that railroad companies are becoming rich by means of extortionate charges I will go as far as any man to correct the evil. But does my friend from Texas claim that the roads in his own State are at present charging these extortionate rates? Can he name to me a single road in that great Commonwealth, renowned for its vast territory and "magnificent distances," that has ever paid one cent to its original projector? Is there within the boundaries of the State a single road that has ever returned to the men of England, of Europe, of New England, or New York 1 per cent. interest on the capital they have furnished to build up the road and develop the State? I am informed upon good authority that up to this time you have never paid a shilling to any man who invested his money in those enterprises. The State needs those roads. These men have advanced their money for the purpose of benefiting that country. They have made your State richer, more prosperous. They expected no immediate returns; they depended upon the future. They are still waiting, hoping that the growth of the State, the increase of local business, may some day bring them a little interest on their hazardous venture.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman will allow me one moment. He seems to be very familiar with railroads and other matters in Texas; but I will say to him that the stock of the Central Texas Railroad is worth more in the market to-day than that of any other railroad I know of; the dividend-paying profit is larger.

Mr. HORR. You surprise me. I confess I am making my statement from memory. I put this very question to men two years ago in the committee, as the gentleman from Texas will remember, and was then told that up to that time not a single road in Texas had ever paid a single shilling of dividend on its original stock.

Mr. REAGAN. I have heard a hundred as false statements as that made to the committee since I have been on it.

Mr. HORR. I will state further—and the history of railroads in this country will bear me out—that over three-fourths of the railroads running to-day in the United States are not paying the men who invested their money in them one dollar of interest on their capital. And only a few large roads, like the New York Central, are to-day paying more than 6 per cent. This bill, if you put it in force, will help the New York Central (which now pays good dividends) to increase them, and will prevent the roads of the West and the South from paying dividends at all. Worse than that, it will prevent some of them from paying running expenses.

Mr. REAGAN. As the gentleman has had his time extended, I would like to ask him this question, which I asked the representatives of the New York Central Railroad before the committee: If this measure would benefit the New York Central road by discriminating in its favor against other roads, why is it that the officers and employés of the New York Central resist and oppose this bill as earnestly and persistently as does any other road?

Mr. HORR. It is not on account of your long and short haul provision at all.

Mr. REAGAN. It is disinterested benevolence.

Mr. HORR. It is because you propose to meddle with another branch of their trade. So far from its being the fact that the long and short haul provision is detrimental to that company, did not Mr. Depew state at the outset that that provision would not damage the New York Central?

Mr. REAGAN. I beg to correct my friend. Mr. Fink and the whole of them opposed that provision in the bill specifically and every other provision in it, and the published record shows it.

Mr. HORR. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The published record of the hearings before the committee will show that the New York Central did not object to the bill so much on that ground, but there were other provisions which they thought were an attempt to meddle with the railroads of the country in such a way as would do damage instead of benefit to them all, their railroad included.

Let me now examine the question of discriminations. This question of freight is a practical question. I remember, and my friend from Texas will remember, an instance given by Mr. Alexander, who was at that time managing a large line of roads in the South. He stated that every day in his business as a common carrier he was compelled to decide upon special cases. He said that at a point in North Carolina they had immense quantities of turpentine to ship over his road. He met the turpentine dealers, and they agreed on what would be a fair rate for the shipper from a certain point to the market place. Afterward one of the heaviest dealers came to him and stated this: That across the river through a long swamp there was an immense pine tract, and if he could get the turpentine from that tract he could make large shipments and build up a large business, but that if he went to the expense of corduroying the swamp and of getting the turpentine across the river he could not get a new dollar for an old one. He said to the railroad company, "If you will do this, if you will put a lower rate on the turpentine made beyond the swamp and beyond the river, which will enable me to get it, I will then build up that new business and I will make it a prosperous trade for that section." He made that contract. The men who were shipping turpentine paid no more than they first agreed to—paid no more than they were satisfied with.

This new business was not any more profitable to the man who made the turpentine than his old business. When he shipped the new he did not make any more out of it, but it enabled him to do more business and the railroad to do more business than they could otherwise have done, and so the agreement was adopted by which they discriminated in favor of the turpentine on that side of the river and beyond the swamp. Was that stealing? Was that wrong? And yet under this bill no such judgment could be exercised.

Why, sir, discrimination means to use judgment—it means to have a little common sense in business. But here is a bill which would deprive the people of the right to exercise their common sense; that is, to bring into their business the exercise of their ordinary judgment.

Now, sir, take another case: On one of the roads which runs through the pine country where I live there are two stations. At the station nearest the mills a gentleman owned a large tract of land near the railroad. He desired to cut the timber from that tract and put it on the railroad and get it to market. He went to the railroad officers and agreed on terms. The company granted what they considered a just and fair price. It was satisfactory to the lumberman. Now, another man, living twenty miles farther from the mills, had a tract of pine, which, instead of being on the line of the railroad, was two and a half miles from it. He could by hauling the logs four miles put them into the river and send them to the mills by that route. He could bring them to the railroad with a haul of only two and a half miles, but he could not do it and pay the rate which they were paying at the town twenty miles nearer the mills than he was. The railroad company saw the difficulty and they said, "Certainly, we will bear part of the burden;" and they contracted with him at a lower rate than that for which they carried the shorter haul. He did not make any more money out of it than the men on the shorter haul who paid more freight, but he made such a rate as enabled him to reach the mills and at the same time it gave additional business to the railroad company.

Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him at this point for one moment?

Mr. HORR. Certainly.

Mr. REAGAN. As the gentleman from Michigan assumes it to be a portion of the business of the railroad company to equalize profits of competing business, I would like to ask him whether he thinks it is proper for us to make a law in favor of equalizing the rates of profit between cultivating small farms and large farms.

Mr. HORR. Not at all, sir; there would be no sense in doing that. That would be simply another attempt to legislate upon a matter that can not be reached by passing bills.

Mr. REAGAN. I understand that to be the gentleman's argument.

Mr. HORR. No; I am trying to provide for discrimination where it is right and just.

I now come to another point, but I fear that I am detaining the House on this subject too long. I would have a wise commission for the sole purpose of having every such case as those which I have pointed out examined carefully and fairly, and if the railroad officers did not use good judgment and proper discretion in this kind of contracts, to bring them to terms and to show to the people that railroads would not be permitted to make any very bad mistakes in such matters. In doing that you would not impair the business interests of the country. In passing this bill, which prevents discriminations and fixes the same rate on each class of freight, you prevent the exercise of that business judgment which is necessary in the management of any enterprise, and you take into account none of the conditions which should vary rates. Let me ask the distinguished chairman of the committee a question. Would you prevent railroads extending from Omaha to the Pacific Ocean from carrying one class of ore cheaper per ton than another?

Mr. REAGAN. I understand, in fact, that if the ore is valuable they charge all the profit there is in it, and the same with the inferior grades per ton, so that it amounts to the same thing.

Mr. HORR. That is not borne out by the facts. Do these men continue to work their mines and give all the proceeds away? No, sir.

Mr. REAGAN. And that statement has been submitted to the committee, and there is not a member on this floor from the State of California that will not verify it.

Mr. HORR. The simple statement of the gentleman's proposition refutes itself.

Why, Mr. Speaker, that is as good an illustration as I could have made up if I had sat up nights for that purpose and studied out a statement to show how extravagantly people inveigh against railroad companies without cause. The statement amounts to this: that the railroad companies—for they would have to do it—get an assay made of all the different ores on their lines, find out how much it will cost to produce them, and then carry them to their destination for the rest that the ore is worth, leaving nothing whatever to the owners of mines anywhere in the United States. Is it not absurd for any man to make such a statement? What is the fact? The fact is that the railroad companies found that there were a large number of mines in the West that could not pay the full rate for taking their ores to the smelters and live. If they did charge a full rate it would compel them to shut up the mines and stop the business. The railroad companies, not doing what my friend from Texas said they did, considered the subject in the light that it was presented to them, and said: "Here there are large amounts of ores in the West that are very rich; we will make these ores pay more for carrying them per ton because they can afford to do it, and we will carry the cheaper and poorer classes of ores for less than it is really worth to perform the business in order to keep the mines going."

Now, what is the result? You keep in employment thousands and hundreds of thousands of men all over the United States and at good wages. You furnish freight to the railroad companies so that they can employ all their rolling-stock in the business. You build up business instead of crippling it. You develop the country instead of impoverishing it; and I say it is right and proper that freight should pay according to its worth and value as well as its tonnage. Otherwise how would you get the coal of the world? How would you get the grain and fuel, everything that goes to feeding and housing and clothing the teeming millions of this country, if there should be a uniform standard of price by the ton fixed for carrying all of the articles that go into consumption? Extra freight should be put upon luxuries, upon things that can bear the extra charge, and that is the only way to build up the country and sustain our great railroad systems. No fixed rule can be invented. The necessaries of life, the heavy articles used for food and fuel, should be carried cheaply, and the carrier should be permitted to make good his business by charging extra rates for moving the silks and satins, the wines and plate, of his more wealthy customers.

But, Mr. Speaker, I have detained the House much longer than I intended. I do hope the men from the West, the men from the South, will think twice before they vote for the provisions of this substitute bill, for I say to you that if adopted the effect will be to increase the through rates without giving us any relief for local rates. I say to you that it will discriminate against rates that ought not to be discriminated against. It will throw the trade of the nation largely into the hands of foreign corporations instead of building up our own. I am not for treating the railroad companies with any degree of favoritism. I would have them do justice by all men, and I would have them run on business principles. But in a system so ramifying, so extended, so gigantic and diversified, it is impossible to fix any established iron-clad rule under which they can do the business of the country. It is a problem that must be governed in the future as it has been in the past, by those rules and laws of common business sense, those principles which are older than statutes, and more lasting than the enactments of any legislative body. [Applause.]

Mr. BOYLE. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to discuss what may be considered the general questions involved in the legislation proposed by both the bill of the Committee on Commerce and the substitute for a part thereof proposed by the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN]. These have received very full consideration, and have been very exhaustively examined by the gentlemen who have preceded me in this debate. I shall undertake no more than to speak of some of the provisions of these bills, to inquire as to how far they may be efficacious toward remedying the evils against which they are directed and which are admitted to exist in some degree, and as to the probable results and consequences of the legislation proposed.

What are the provisions of these two bills, and what are the differences between them? Both are founded upon that clause of the Constitution which gives to Congress power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the States, and with the Indian tribes." And the advocates of both find in this clause warrant for the General Government to interfere between shippers and carriers by rail as to all traffic and commerce crossing State lines and to provide by statute what shall be the relations between them, what shall be the rates charged, in what manner the business shall be conducted, what shall be the measure of damages for breaches of duties imposed, and in what way the penalties and punishments provided for may be collected and inflicted. Regarding railroads carrying such freight as instrumentalities of commerce among the States, in the language of Supreme Court decisions, they assert the same power to control them, and, of course, to the same extent, that Congress has heretofore exercised over other instrumentalities of commerce.

Both bills require that all rates shall be reasonable, and so does the common law. Both bills prohibit discriminations between shippers "for like and contemporaneous services" in carrying freight, &c., "under substantially similar circumstances." So, in my judgment, does the common law, if such discrimination be unjust or unreasonable. The committee bill denies the right to allow rebates, drawbacks, &c., to one shipper which are refused to another "under similar circumstances." The substitute prohibits all rebates, drawbacks, &c., whatever. So does the common law, if such rebates and drawbacks are the means of producing unreasonable inequalities and discriminations among shippers. Both bills prevent the pooling of freights by competing railroads, "by dividing between them the aggregate or net proceeds of the earnings of such railroads or any portion of them." The common law does as much, and, in my judgment, much more.

The committee bill gives a civil remedy for actual damages sustained, and in case of willful violation of the law gives, in addition, to the party injured a sum "sufficient to cover all his counsel and attorney fees and all expenses and disbursements in the action, including his own necessary personal expenses." The substitute gives triple damages, and for willful violation a sum in addition sufficient to cover all counsel and attorney fees. The common law in these cases, as in all others, awards to the injured party actual compensation for the injury suffered, together with costs. The bill of the committee makes all violations of the law, except the charging of unreasonable rates, crimes, punishable by a fine not exceeding $1,000; the substitute makes no exception, and provides that the fine shall not be less than $1,000, without providing a maximum limit—a rule for punishments which I do not know to exist in any other case. The committee bill provides for a commission, and a remedy by injunction to prevent continuance of acts prohibited by the bill; the substitute goes only to the extent of supplying the first seven sections of the committee bill, leaving the provisions for a commission undisturbed; and as it also gives a remedy in equity, should the bill, with the substitute, be adopted, we will have double remedies in equity, which will probably be more than are desired. The substitute goes further, and prohibits the charging of more for a short than for a longer haul, and requires the posting of schedules and strict adherence to them. There may be other provisions which I now overlook, but they are not material to this discussion.

As I have said that the first section is only declaratory of the common law, I object to it only on the ground that it is an assertion of the power of Congress to regulate and determine the rates at which railroads shall carry what is called "interstate commerce." If Congress may require that rates shall be reasonable it may also determine what are reasonable and what unreasonable rates, and may thus fix rates and assume entire control of the whole matter. I may refer further to this before I conclude.

The second section of the committee's bill forbids discrimination in charges between one shipper and another engaged in interstate commerce "for like and contemporaneous service in the carrying, receiving, delivering, storing, or handling the same under substantially similar circumstances;" and it also requires equal facilities to be given, subject to the same provisions. And the third section prohibits the allowance of rebates, drawbacks, or other advantages in any form to any one person which are not allowed under similar circumstances to all other persons.

Former bills on this subject, as I understand, were limited to freight by the car-load. These have no such limitation. Is it intended that all shippers of the same article are to have the same rates without regard to the quantity? Is the man who ships five barrels of flour to pay no more per barrel than the man who ships a car-load or ten car-loads? Must a single box of dry goods be charged for at the same rate as a car-load? Shall the firm which ships only five car-loads of coke a day from the Connellsville coke region pay no more per car than the firm which ships three hundred car-loads every day? Is the party who ships ten car-loads one day and ten car-loads some other day, irregularly and at uncertain times, to have the same rates and the same facilities as the party who is ready with his three hundred car-loads every day? In other words, are shipments of the same article in such different quantities and with such differences as to regularity "like and contemporaneous services, * * * under substantially similar circumstances?" If not, then matters will remain just as they are.

The complaint is that railroad companies discriminate by rebates, drawbacks, &c., in favor of large shippers and against small ones—in favor of regular customers and against those for whom they carry only occasionally. The chairman [Mr. REAGAN] has stated that he left out the provision as to car-loads at the instance of jobbers, so that the bill might apply to quantities less than car-loads. He must mean that the man who ships a car-load or less than a car-load is to be charged no more than the man who ships a much larger quantity, or he must allow discriminations to be made. Is it to be one hundred pounds against another hundred, one car-load against another, one ten car-loads against another? This is utterly impracticable. And if you allow discriminations on account of quantities and of regularity of shipments, where will you stop?

Mr. CHACE. Am I not right in saying that both bills use the term "like?" Are they not identically the same in that respect?

Mr. BOYLE. The substitute, as I remember, does not contain the qualifying clause "under substantially similar circumstances." The other clause is the same in both bills.

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. The word "substantially" is included in the bill of the committee. There is a modification of the language of the bill itself. It is for "substantially like service."

Mr. FINDLAY. "Substantially similar service."

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. Yes, sir; "substantially similar service."

Mr. CHACE. It is true, then, as I have stated, that both bills use the word "like."

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. Yes, they use the word "like;" but the bill also uses the word "substantially," which enlarges its scope.

Mr. CHACE. The committee bill goes a little further in its application.

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. It was so intended.

Mr. CHACE. Then it is open to the gentleman's criticism.

Mr. BOYLE. I do not know how that may be. It is difficult to distinguish between what is "like" and what is "substantially like." That will be matter for the courts; that is, if any person who thinks himself injured can, under the provisions of this bill, ever get into the courts.

The last clause of the fourth section is understood to prohibit pooling. It prohibits only one kind of pooling; that is to say, it forbids railroad companies to pool "by dividing between them the aggregate or net proceeds of the earnings of such railroads or any portion of them."

"Pooling," as I understand it, is resorted to by railroad companies for the purpose of preventing a reduction of rates by competition. The name and this particular manner of accomplishing that end are of modern origin. I have heard it said that the gentleman so frequently referred to in this debate, Mr. Albert Fink, is entitled to the credit of devising this particular form of combination. But the practice of combining to keep up rates is older than Mr. Fink, and is, as I have stated my belief, contrary to the common law. I know, sir, that "pooling" by men who earn their living by their labor, for the purpose of keeping up its price, has been held not only a civil wrong, but a crime. It may be that there is a different rule of law for railroad companies; but so far as I know, no court has yet undertaken to show wherein lies the difference, if difference there be.

Railroad-men are credited with a full share of ingenuity. Prevent them from keeping up rates by combining and dividing the aggregate or net proceeds of their earnings, and they will very quickly find some other means to accomplish the same result not within the terms of your bills. You leave them full liberty to combine together to keep up rates by any other means than this one. You might as well forbear all reference to the matter whatever.

HOW FOUR RAILROADS WILL BE AFFECTED.

Assuming that these bills go beyond the common law in the matter of the wrongs prohibited, as must be maintained by those who advocate them and as they certainly do in some other particulars, what will be their effect? Their avowed purpose is to establish equality between shippers. I presume it is not intended to establish inequalities between railroad companies and to impose burdens upon some from which others, under similar circumstances, will be relieved. Let us see what will be their effect in this respect.

The committee's bill provides "that all charges by any person or persons engaged alone or associated with others in the transportation of property by railroad from one State or Territory to or through one or more other States or Territories of the United States or to or from any foreign country, shall be reasonable." These words, as descriptive of the persons within the purview of the bill, are referred to in every other part of it, and are substantially the same as those used in the substitute.

Take four of the great trunk lines, which are largely engaged in carrying what is called interstate commerce. First, the New York Central road, alluded to by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR]. Its terminal points are Buffalo on the lake and the city of New York. It is entirely within the State of New York. Of course to any business originating at or between these terminal points, and not going beyond them, the provisions of these bills will be inapplicable. But more than this, they will not in any degree affect any of the immense traffic from Chicago or any of the lake ports to Buffalo and from there to New York by the Central road, for the reason that this bill does not deal with interstate commerce carried by water, and so far as this railroad carriage is concerned it begins and ends within the State of New York, and does not go out of it. As to this enormous lake traffic, as to all the traffic originating at Buffalo and other points along the line and going east; as to all traffic originating at New York and along the line and going west to Buffalo, and thence by the lakes to Toledo, Detroit, Chicago, Milwaukee, or to any other point in the great West, the New York Central Company will be independent of this legislation. It may charge rates reasonable or unreasonable. It may grant rebates, drawbacks, or resort to any other device to give to one shipper preference over another. It may discriminate between shippers and between localities in any manner and to any extent it may deem proper so far as this legislation is concerned, and snap its fingers in the faces of your commissions and your courts.

Now consider the Erie Railway. Its terminal points are Dunkirk and Buffalo on the lake and New York at tide water. It is engaged in precisely the same kind of trade as the Central, and is practically a parallel road. But unfortunately it crosses a small corner of Pennsylvania. In the language of the bill it passes from one State through one other State; and by reason of that fact is made subject to all the provisions, pains, and penalties of this measure. What the New York Central may do legally, the Erie may not do without a breach of the law. What a Central director or a Central agent may do with impunity would make an Erie director or agent a criminal, and subject him to a fine of unlimited amount—by the substitute not less that $1,000—and his company to triple damages and to costs and expenses at the discretion of the complaining party.

There are two other roads in like circumstances, and which afford a like striking instance of the gross injustice which will follow this legislation—the Pennsylvania Railroad and the Baltimore and Ohio. The main line of the Pennsylvania runs from the Delaware at Philadelphia to the Ohio at Pittsburgh. The company owns or controls the Philadelphia and Erie from the port of Erie to its main line at Harrisburg. It controls the Allegheny Valley from the oil regions of Pennsylvania to its main line at Pittsburgh. All these are wholly within the State of Pennsylvania. It passes through the gas-coal region and the coke region of Western Pennsylvania. It connects with the Ohio River at Pittsburgh, and is there fed by the immense traffic which is gathered from all the great rivers of the West and brought to Pittsburgh. It connects those great freight-producing cities Philadelphia and Pittsburgh.

Now take the Baltimore and Ohio. Its main line runs from the bay at Baltimore to the Ohio River at Wheeling. It has a branch from Grafton to Parkersburg, also on the river. It practically owns and actually controls another line or branch from Cumberland to Pittsburgh. It also traverses the gas-coal region and the coke region of Western Pennsylvania, and connects the great freight-producing centers of Pittsburgh and Baltimore. It gathers traffic from the commerce of the Ohio River at Wheeling and Parkersburg. It also has connections with the oil regions of Pennsylvania by means of the Pittsburgh and Western. I need hardly say to gentlemen what quantities of freight originate at the points named and are carried by these companies. From the Connellsville coke region alone, when the ovens are in operation, there are sent nine hundred car-loads of coke a day; most of it, it is true, going West, but much of it going East over these roads. I can not state what goes from other points or from other sources, but I know it to be enormous.

As to all this traffic the Pennsylvania road will not be subject to any of the provisions of this bill, while the Baltimore and Ohio will be as to all and every part of it. The Pennsylvania may deal with shippers as it may please; it may discriminate as it may think proper, and grant such favors and impose such burdens as to it may seem good; it may build up one man and break down another, with no act of Congress to molest or make it afraid; while the Baltimore and Ohio, as to all this traffic, will be tied hand and foot. It must treat all this freight as interstate commerce. It must make it stand upon the same footing precisely as the freight which it carries from Chicago, from Saint Louis, from Cincinnati, from any part of the boundless West—giving to one no advantage over the other, and imposing no burdens upon one which it does not impose upon the other. It can not discriminate between these freights, while the Pennsylvania can. It can not distinguish between freights coming to it by rail from other States and those before referred to, while the Pennsylvania can. Its officers become criminals for doing what Pennsylvania officials may do without impairing their reputation as honest men.

And why this difference? The Pennsylvania road and its feeders I have named are all within the State of Pennsylvania, and the commerce which comes to it from the Ohio River comes by water and not by rail. The Baltimore and Ohio and its feeders, on the other hand, pass through Maryland, West Virginia, and Pennsylvania—they pass "from one State to or through one or more other States." And yet these bills are urged as measures which will prevent discriminations and secure equality in the shipments of freight by rail!

Mr. REAGAN. If my colleague on the committee will allow me I would like to ask him a question.

Mr. BOYLE. Certainly.

Mr. REAGAN. I wish to ask whether under the provisions of the bill he is criticising all commerce originating in another State than New York or another State than Pennsylvania, passing over the New York Central or the Pennsylvania Railroad, would not be subject to the provisions of this bill, whether it reached a terminal point on these roads by water or by land—whether we are not protecting commerce, not regulating railroads?

Mr. BOYLE. I understand the view of the chairman, and think I will be able to show that he is mistaken. I say this, I trust, in no improper spirit, but with due deference for his intimate and long acquaintance with this subject and for his great ability. This legislation is intended to affect only interstate commerce carried by rail. Although it may pass from one State to another, yet if carried outside of a State by water and wholly within it by rail it will not be subject to the provisions of these bills.

Mr. REAGAN. I see that we are not likely to agree, but I wish the House to understand my suggestion. It is that commerce which originates in one State and passes through another, whether by one or many railroads or by water a part of the way and by land another part of the way, is interstate commerce. But under the rule which my friend lays down it can not be protected.

Mr. BOYLE. Take the case I have stated, of commerce originating in Illinois, carried by water to Buffalo and there first carried by rail from Buffalo to New York by the Central Railroad. Is it within the provisions of this bill?

Mr. REAGAN. It is distinctly subject to the provisions of this bill. If you put a cargo of commerce on a ship at Chicago, land it at Buffalo, and there transfer it to a railroad, it is interstate commerce from the point of shipment to the point of destination; and when it goes upon the New York Central Railroad is to be controlled by the provisions of this bill like all other commerce between the States. I repeat, it is not the railroads that we regulate; it is the commerce which we protect.

Mr. BOYLE. The gentleman will understand that I do not deny that Congress has the same power to regulate commerce passing partly by water and partly by rail that it has to regulate commerce carried entirely by rail. All I have said and all I now say is that such commerce carried partly by water and partly by rail, where such rail carriage is wholly within one State, is not covered by the provisions of this bill. And the best evidence on the point of difference between the gentleman and me is the language of the bill itself. I will read it. It is the first section:

> That all charges by any person or persons engaged alone or associated with others in the transportation of property by railroad from one State or Territory to or through one or more other States or Territories of the United States or to or from any foreign country, shall be reasonable for such service.

The case I have put is one in which property does not pass by railroad from one State to another; it is a case in which persons are engaged neither alone nor associated with others "in the transportation of property by railroad from one State or Territory to or through one or more other States or Territories." It is an association, if at all, between a carrier by water outside of the State and a carrier by rail wholly within one State. I do not differ with the gentleman as to what constitutes interstate commerce; my difference with him is only as to the meaning of this bill, and in support of my view I submit the bill itself.

THE COMMISSION.

I come now, Mr. Speaker, to that part of the committee's bill which provides for the establishment of a commission of interstate commerce. It is to this that many gentlemen give their most earnest support. It is to it I am chiefly opposed. The chairman of the committee [Mr. REAGAN] regards the charging of unreasonable rates, the allowance of rebates and drawbacks, and the maintenance of pooling, &c., as crimes, and he says so, and proposes to punish them as other crimes are punishable. He also regards them as civil injuries, and he offers to give to the injured party direct remedies in the way of damages, to be sued for by himself, and recovered as other recoveries are had for injuries done. His meaning and his purpose there is no misunderstanding. Another gentleman who supports the committee bill characterizes the chairman's plan as "the cast-iron, inflexible, perfunctory method, terrible on paper as an army with banners. but practically as ineffectual as a Chinese gong." He further says:

> But I predict it would be a dead letter so far as being of any use to the people from the day of its passage if it stood alone; or that if enforced except through the elastic and automatic adaptation of the commission recommended in the bill of the committee, it would only embarrass business, increase rates, and add to the burdens of the people's cost of transportation.

And he says further, after explaining the commission feature of the bill:

> Compare with this elastic, self-adjusting, and sufficient system the stunted and utterly ineffectual method of a dormant statute, too expensive and too like a boomerang for any poor shipper, whose property is at the mercy of the humor of the railroads, to set in motion.

Certainly this commission—this automatic, elastic, self-adjusting, sufficient commission, so enthusiastially described by my distinguished friend from Massachusetts [Governor LONG] which is to stand between the oppressor and the oppressed; which is to do for the poor shipper what in this free country, where the courts are open to all alike, he can not do for himself; which is to correct evils which have ruined individuals and communities—must be a very beneficent and a very powerful body. Let us see.

The commission is to consist of three persons, to be appointed by the President for the term of six years, and each commissioner is to receive a salary of $7,500. It is to have a clerk at a salary of $2,500, and an accountant at a like salary. It is also to have such "additional clerical, engineering, expert, or other service" as it may request and the Secretary of the Interior may be willing to furnish. Actual and necessary traveling and other expenses for the commission and its employés are to be paid, and they are to be allowed to pass and repass over any railroad engaged in interstate commerce free of charge; but whether with or without the consent of the railroad company is not stated. It is to be provided with an office in Washington, but may go into any part of the United States to discharge its duties, or it may send one of its own members or its clerk, or anybody else, into any part of the United States to perform and discharge its duties, and to this end may delegate to the person thus sent all the powers of the commission. Fortunately, with such liberality as to the delegation of power, the power to be delegated is not very great.

The establishment of a commission was urged by nearly every railroad man who appeared before the Commerce Committee, and I do not wonder. As provided for in this bill, it will not only be without power to aid the shipper, but will be an actual obstruction in his way when he seeks redress for injuries done him by a railroad company.

A private individual or a firm may complain to the commission. Unless a United States district attorney, or a State district or county attorney, or other corresponding officer, certifies that "he has examined the facts and in his opinion the complaint is well founded" (for which he must, of course, be paid by the party complaining), the commission may utterly ignore and disregard the complaint. If the complaint be made by a board of trade or other commercial body or be backed by a district attorney, the commission is required to proceed with an examination.

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. Will you allow me one moment?

Mr. BOYLE. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. The bill provides that the commission may take notice of such complaint.

Mr. BOYLE. Yes; but it is not obliged to do so unless the individual complaint is backed by a district attorney.

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. Or a board of trade.

Mr. BOYLE. Yes; as I have said, or a board of trade.

From my knowledge of district attorneys I see no reason why we should interpose them between the injured individual and the commission. Why shall any person who feels himself aggrieved ask the permission of anybody to have his complaint inquired into? Why shall this commission not be open to all alike, the high and the low, the rich and the poor, as the courts of the country are? Why shall a district attorney be paid in order to secure a hearing?

Mr. LONG. Do I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania to say that a person can not apply to the commission?

Mr. BOYLE. No; but that the commission may disregard the application unless backed by a district attorney.

Mr. LONG. That is to say, that the commission may exercise its judgment.

Mr. BOYLE. Yes.

Mr. LONG. It is not a fair presumption, is it, to say the commission would act unwarrantably?

Mr. BOYLE. I do not know what the commission might do. The failure to have the indorsement of the district attorney would itself discredit the complaint in the eyes of the commission at the outset. I maintain the right of all men alike to be heard—individuals as well as boards of trade, and individuals without a district attorney as well as with one. What would be thought of a court required to hear one man and not another, both complaining of a like wrong?

Say the commission concludes to examine. Say the wrong complained of occurred in California, or Nevada, or Texas, or Mississippi, or Maine. The commission would not go to the place unless the weather was suitable. It would exercise the power of delegation before referred to. Gentlemen who favor the commission seem to be largely influenced by the success of certain State railroad commissions. They forget that the United States is bigger than the State of Massachusetts, great as it is. They forget that an inquiry which might readily be made in a State by a State commission may be attended with very great difficulty when made in a remote State by a commission located at Washington.

Mr. MILLS. Let me ask the gentleman what are the powers of the commission for the correction of these evils.

Mr. BOYLE. I will state in a few minutes.

Mr. CHACE. If it will not interfere with the argument of my friend I wish to ask him a question, as he seems to be in favor of Judge REAGAN'S substitute.

Mr. BOYLE. I am not conscious of having said anything that would warrant that inference. In response to the inquiry of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] I say that with enforcing the remedies given, with imposing the penalties proposed by this bill, the commission has nothing whatever to do. The wronged party must go into the courts single-handed and alone, as he would have to do if no commission existed, and meet these giant and terrible corporations face to face. He must employ an attorney and bring his action like other people who complain of wrong. He must make his information and prosecute for the crime committed just as he would without any commission.

The reason given for the establishment of a commission is that shippers are not able to contend with the railroad companies. Who are the shippers? They are the merchants, the manufacturers, the corporations of the country. You leave the widow whose husband and the children whose father has been killed by a railroad company, the poor employé who has been maimed and ruined while in its service, to sue those companies themselves and to meet and contend with them without the backing of the Federal Government or any other government, while you pretend to give to the capitalists of the country the moral backing at least of a great, imposing, well-paid commission. I do not agree that suitors with railroad companies are at a disadvantage in the courts of the country; much less do I agree that support shall be given to the strong which is denied to the weak.

Let it be understood that with what are called the remedial provisions of these bills, those portions giving remedies for injuries done and imposing punishments for wrongs committed, the commission has nothing whatever to do. All that is claimed for it is that it may aid in preventing the continuance of the wrong. Again, let us see——

Mr. PETERS. Will the gentleman permit me to ask this question: Does not the provision in relation to injunctions distinctively enjoin the railroads from doing the wrong against the individual?

Mr. BOYLE. I have said nothing to the contrary. But it is not done at the instance of or through the commission.

Mr. PETERS. You say there is no remedy to the individual.

Mr. BOYLE. No; there are remedies which he must himself seek. I say the commission does not intervene to give the individual a remedy.

Mr. PETERS. It gives it by injunction.

Mr. BOYLE. No; he must obtain that for himself also. The commission stops short of that. Nor does it intervene to enable him to obtain compensation for wrongs done.

Mr. PETERS. Other provisions of the law do compensate him.

Mr. BOYLE. Undoubtedly; but at his own suit, and without aid from the commission.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That is, the commission has no power to enjoin.

Mr. BOYLE. No, nor any other power except to inquire. The commission upon complaint made has the power to cause a copy of it to be served on the party complained of and to require an answer. After answer, it may, "if it shall think fit," institute an inquiry as to the matters of fact alleged in the petition, "in such mode and by such persons or means as it shall think proper." If it finds the complaint sustained, it is to "make and record its report in writing." Within twenty days it is to serve a copy of its report and findings on the offending railroad company, with notice to desist from the wrong, and it is also to deliver to the United States district attorney for the district in which the act complained of occurred a similar copy.

And here the functions of the commission absolutely terminate.

If the offending company fails to comply with the commission's notice, the district attorney is to commence proceedings in the name of the injured party for an injunction. He is not compelled to do so; and, as no fees are provided for the service, it is not likely he will do so unless the injured party should compensate him. And if he is to pay he should be allowed to select his own lawyer, as he is permitted to do if the district attorney fails to proceed for ten days. And what is the court to do? Is it to enforce the finding of the commission? Not at all. Is the finding of the commission of any value before it as evidence or otherwise? Not at all. The court is to "proceed in a summary manner to ascertain whether the said report and findings are true." That is to say, a proceeding in equity is to be commenced and carried on in the ordinary way after the commission has reported, except that the inquiry is to be confined to the findings of the commission. Everybody must have notice and an opportunity to appear, and, as the question of fact is to be inquired into, everybody, including the railroad company, must be allowed to produce witnesses. In other words, the injured party is just where he was when the inquiry before the commission commenced, except that the scope of inquiry is limited by the findings of the commission, perhaps greatly to the prejudice of the injured party. And the proceeding is carried on at the risk of the injured party. District attorneys do not work for nothing. There is no provision here for paying them.

Mr. PETERS. If the law makes it the duty of the district attorney to do this the private party can not be made to pay him.

Mr. BOYLE. Nor can the United States.

Mr. PETERS. I agree with you there.

Mr. BOYLE. Nor can the district attorney be compelled to perform the labor without compensation. The bills do not undertake to so compel him.

Mr. MILLS. Suppose the party making the complaint loses—he pays the costs.

Mr. BOYLE. Yes; I have said that the proceeding is carried on at his risk. The bill provides that the "court may, in its discretion, award or deny costs to any party to such proceeding."

Where is the good of the commission? The injured party finds himself worse off at the end of its inquiry than at the beginning. Without it he might have commenced proceedings in equity for an injunction in any court of competent jurisdiction. He might have made the scope of his complaint and the subject of inquiry as broad and comprehensive as he liked. He could have had the whole subject disposed of, and not only a preliminary but a permanent injunction before the commission completed its utterly useless inquiry. Under the commission scheme he is confined to one court, the United States circuit court of the district in which the wrong is alleged to have been done. He must wait on notices to the railroad company; he must wait the pleasure of the district attorney, and then either pay him or employ his own lawyer. And then he must limit his inquiry to the findings of the commission.

Surely this scheme was devised by the railroad companies themselves. I have said that their attorneys advocated it. It seems hardly possible that any person other than a railroad manager could have suggested a device so entirely in the interest of the railroad companies. I can see how such a commission might be of great service to itself and its employés, but how it is to help the suffering shipper does not appear.

THE QUESTION OF POWER.

I do not intend to submit an argument as to the power of the Federal Government to enact this legislation. My respected friend before me, the chairman of the committee, entertains no doubt whatever of the existence of this power. My colleague from the Pittsburgh district [Mr. HOPKINS] is equally clear that the Federal Government has full power to enact the legislation here proposed; that is to say, that the Federal Government, under the clause of the Constitution giving Congress power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States, has authority to control the entire railroad system of the country; for it comes to that. Let me make a suggestion—I make it only by way of suggestion, without committing myself irrevocably. Under this same clause of the Constitution the Federal Government has exercised all the power it has ever claimed in regard to the shipping of the country. It has prescribed, I believe, the manner of building ships, how they shall be manned, how they shall be commanded, how they shall enter, clear, &c.

Everything that Congress has enacted in relation to the shipping of the country has been based on that clause of the Constitution giving Congress the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States. Control of the navigable rivers of the country is derived from the same provision; so, too, is the right to authorize bridges over navigable waters. Our entire regulation of shipping and seamen and steamboats and inspection of steam-engines and everything of that kind finds its warrant in this clause. Now, I ask gentlemen on this side of the Chamber whether they are willing to extend this power to the control of the railroads of the country? If the same clause which has warranted our legislation in regard to the shipping justifies the exercise of like power and control over the railroads, you may have Congress directing what kind of signal-lights the railroad trains shall carry, how the trains shall be manned, how they shall be run; in short, doing everything as to railroads and railroad trains that it has done and is doing as to ships upon the ocean and navigable rivers and the ships and boats thereon.

It is claimed broadly that Congress has the same power and control of the instrumentalities of interstate commerce as of the instrumentalities of foreign commerce, and that there exists in Congress the same power to control the railroads, because they are instruments of commerce, as the shipping of the country. Are you gentlemen willing to take this step toward centralization? Are you willing to confide to the Federal Government the control of the entire railroad system of the country? It will extend to every railroad in the United States, for there is not one, however short or inconsiderable, which does not at some time, and frequently, carry commerce passing from one State to another.

The Democratic party has seen with alarm the strides toward centralization made by the Republican party while it has had control of the Federal Government. It has labored zealously to preserve and maintain the rights of the States, and to confine the General Government to the exercise of the limited functions which were committed to it by the framers of the Constitution. But to my knowledge no movement has ever been made by the Federalists or their successors which would add so much to the power of the National Government as this, and no doctrine has ever been enunciated by them more destructive of State rights and local self-government.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BOYLE. With pleasure.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. You admit, as I understand, that the General Government has the right to control interstate commerce except when it is carried on railroads.

Mr. BOYLE. I have made no such distinction.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But is not that the logic of your position?

Mr. BOYLE. I have not gone so far. I wish to be held responsible for no more than I say. As I have said, it is a good deal by way of suggestion, and although I may use strong expressions, I am not to be understood as committing myself irrevocably to any particular view as to the powers of Congress over railroads as instrumentalities of interstate commerce.

Mr. REAGAN. I will ask my friend to allow me a suggestion. The courts of the country, State and Federal, have, without exception, decided that the States can not regulate commerce between the States. Now, the gentleman assumes that the Federal Government can not do it. Does he recognize the principle that the railroads are a power uncontrolled and uncontrollable by law, either State or Federal?

Mr. BOYLE. No; I am not an advocate or apologist for the railroads, and never have been in any public position I have had the honor to hold. I am not willing to concede that the railroads of the country, great as they are and strong as they are, can not be controlled by the law. I do not admit the correctness of the gentleman's statement. I believe that the humblest court in the country, State or Federal, can put its hand on a railroad company and control it within the limits of the law.

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. You mean under the common law?

Mr. BOYLE. The courts are as strong to enforce the common law as the statute law. They have the same power, in this respect, as to both.

That the Federal Government has power to regulate commerce among the States I have never doubted. I could not question it without flying in the face of the plain letter of the Constitution. But what is this power; to what does it extend?

In all that the Federal Government has thus far done in the regulation of shipping, in the control of the foreign or interstate commerce of the country, it has never, so far as I am aware, undertaken to prescribe on what terms that commerce shall be carried. If Congress has ever said that ships carrying commerce to or from foreign countries shall do so at certain rates, I do not know it. If Congress has ever legislated at all with reference to the terms between the shipper and the carrier, I do not know it. It is assumed here that because Congress has power to regulate commerce among the States, therefore Congress has the power to prescribe the terms upon which the carrier shall be compelled to carry that commerce. But this is begging the whole question—it is assuming the very point in doubt and controversy.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will allow me, I will state that if he refers to the Revised Statutes of the United States, he will discover that Congress has been exercising the right of regulation of transportation for many years. A law is now upon the statute-book upon that subject.

Mr. BOYLE. I am not cognizant of any legislation by Congress touching the matter to which I have been referring—the terms, as between shipper and carrier, upon which commerce shall be carried. It may be said this bill does not do that. But this bill, Mr. Speaker, asserts and is bottomed on the power to do it. This bill says in its first section that the rates for carriage shall be reasonable. Well, if Congress has the power to declare rates shall be reasonable, then Congress has the right to determine what are reasonable rates. One follows the other inevitably. That ground is taken by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON], who has been so earnest in his advocacy of these measures. He maintains that Congress has the right to prescribe the price railway companies may charge for the transportation of commerce between the States.

Mr. Speaker, no case has been cited touching the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce from which it can be gathered that any court has held that that power would warrant the Federal Government in interposing between shipper and carrier to the extent of prescribing how commerce shall be carried by rail or what rates shall be charged for its transportation. To my knowledge there is no such case. Congress has the right under the Constitution to regulate and control interstate commerce. That is, to facilitate it, and to prevent States from placing obstacles in the way of carrying it on. It has the power to prevent the imposition of burdens or taxes upon it by States.

Mr. REAGAN. If the gentleman will permit me I will again interrupt him.

Mr. BOYLE. Certainly; I yield for that purpose.

Mr. REAGAN. There have been repeated decisions, Mr. Speaker, in which the courts have said that under the provision of the Constitution granting to Congress the power to regulate commerce the whole power is given to Congress over that commerce, and that it is ample and complete in every respect. That as every State has the power to regulate the commerce within the boundaries of the State, Congress has like power under the Constitution to the regulation of interstate commerce. That has been decided over and over again by the courts.

Mr. BOYLE. The gentleman is not to understand me as dissenting from that proposition.

Mr. STORM. If my colleague will permit me to interrupt him for an instant I would like to ask him whether he takes into account the difference between commerce upon the high seas and navigable rivers and interstate commerce as carried on by railroads? In the former case, the channels of commerce are open to all the regulation of price would not be necessary, but in the other case it is not so, and it is important this distinction should be taken.

Mr. BOYLE. I may say to my colleague that the distinction he makes might afford a reason for Congress interposing, if it had the power; but it does not by any means determine that Congress has or has not the power to make the same provision in one case as in the other.

Mr. REAGAN. Let me go on a little further. The power to regulate in a State rests upon the common law principle that common carriers or persons engaged in any employment in which the public has an interest, and especially where the franchise is derived from the political authority, are subject to the control and regulation of that political authority, such as in the case of hackmen, public ferrymen, &c.

Mr. BOYLE. I am not disposed to dispute that. The States have the right to control common carriers within their borders, but it does not spring from any right to regulate commerce. They have the same power to regulate and control all persons engaged in a public or quasi-public business, whether relating to commerce or not. The States do this, because they possess general governmental powers. Where a man sets up to carry for the public generally, then he is subject to the control of the State to the extent, at least, that his charges shall be reasonable.

Mr. REAGAN. I only mentioned the point to show the authority in the State for the regulation of this subject. The courts have decided that Congress has the same power over interstate commerce that the particular States have over local commerce.

Mr. BOYLE. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Texas a palpable difference. The railroad companies of the country, to which this law is to be applied, did not derive their existence from the Federal Government. These railroads you intend to regulate by regulating the interstate commerce on them do not owe anything to the Federal Government as their creator. They were created by the States. The power which creates a corporation may impose such burdens and conditions upon it as to it may seem good. It is clear to me, therefore, that when the gentleman claims the same power for the General Government over State corporations exercised by the States which created them the reason for his claim utterly fails.

Mr. LEWIS. How about the Texas Pacific and the Northern Pacific Railroads?

Mr. BOYLE. I was alluding to the general system of railroads, not to these. But the principle I have stated applies to them, and they happily illustrate it. The Federal Government created them; it gave them all the powers they have; it is their sovereign. Will anybody say it can exercise like control over railroads entirely within a State, created by the State, because they engage in the carriage of interstate commerce, that it can over the Pacific roads?

Mr. REAGAN. If the gentleman will allow me, I will state that that doctrine would lead to the conclusion that a State, by creating a corporation, can take from Congress its constitutional power to regulate commerce between the States. I am satisfied my friend from Pennsylvania will hardly assent to that proposition.

Mr. BOYLE. By no means. The distinction is clear; it comes to this, after all: What is embraced within the regulation of commerce?

Mr. BARKSDALE. If my colleague will permit me a moment I will call his attention to a case in point, and cite a decision bearing directly upon this point.

Mr. BOYLE. Certainly; I will yield to my friend from Mississippi.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I refer now to the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the States, and cite the case of the Pensacola Telegraph Company against the Western Union Telegraph Company. Chief-Justice Waite, in delivering the opinion of the court, said:

> Congress has power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States. The powers thus granted are not confined to the instrumentalities of commerce, or the postal service, known or used when the Constitution was adopted, but they keep pace with the progress of the country, and adapt themselves to new developments of time and circumstance; they extend from the horse with its rider to the stage-coach, from the sailing vessel to the steamboat, from the coach and the steamboat to the railroad, and from the railroad to the telegraph, &c.

Mr. HERBERT. And the telegraph company to which the gentleman alludes, and whose rates were in question, was a corporation created by a legislative act of the State of Florida.

Mr. BARKSDALE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BOYLE. That, however, is only, as the gentleman will perceive, a statement of the general principle involved. It amounts to saying that the power of Congress to regulate commerce is not confined to transportation by horses and mules, which were the principal modes in operation at the time the Constitution was framed and to a large extent were the only means used at that time for the carriage of commerce by land.

Mr. BARKSDALE. But it declares that the power exists in Congress.

Mr. BOYLE. Undoubtedly the power to regulate interstate commerce rests in the Federal Government under its Constitution, and is supreme and exclusive. I do not wish to be understood as denying the power of Congress in the premises; but I maintain that this power does not include the power to regulate the specific charges for freight by railroad companies created by States and exercising their corporate functions within the States which created them. A State in granting a charter to a railroad company may limit the rate of charges, but that being once done the State has no power to change that provision, unless the right to do so is reserved in the charter or by general law or constitutional provision.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BOYLE. Certainly.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. When a railroad company accepts a charter from a State are not the powers conferred upon the road measured by the provisions of the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. BOYLE. Undoubtedly the Constitution of the United States is the supreme law of the land. That all understand.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Yes; but in accepting a grant of privileges or powers from the State are they not bound by the provisions of the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. BOYLE. Yes; the Constitution of the United States may properly be considered a part of every charter ever granted by a State, because the charter and all State laws are subject to it.

And if you find in this clause of the Constitution (and this is, after all, a matter of interpretation) that Congress has power to regulate the charges which the carrier may make against the shipper, then the power exists, whatever may be in the charter, for the corporation takes its franchises subject to whatever power the Federal Government may have under the Constitution. But what I tried to say is that the power to regulate the charges by a State stand upon an entirely different footing.

The corporations, I repeat, so that I may not be misunderstood, are not created by the Federal Government. They do not derive their franchises from it. They are subject, of course, to the Federal Constitution and laws made in pursuance of it; but the Federal Government is not its sovereign in that sense. The State government may fix the charter, and in fixing it put in such restrictions as it chooses; and of course the corporation takes the grant cum onere. More than that: in my judgment a State government, having created a corporation, might make such changes in its charter and subject it to such control as it thought proper, so long as it did not violate that clause of the Constitution which forbids a State to impair the obligation of a contract.

Now, sir, I recognize the existence of the evils complained of and the evils intended to be remedied by this bill. And if a plan can be devised within the powers of the Government, State or Federal, to prevent railroad corporations from making unreasonable charges or discriminations between shippers by granting one facilities or rates which are denied to another, it shall have my hearty support. I am most anxious to forward any such measure. But I entertain so much doubt at least as to the power of Congress to enact this legislation—and if the power exists, I see so much objection to giving to the Federal Government practical control of all the railroads of the country—that I hesitate to support either of the measures now before the House. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate insisted upon its amendment disagreed to by the House of Representatives to the bill (H. R. 4716) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, asked a further conference with the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Messrs. HALE, LOGAN, and BECK as conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested, namely:

A bill (S. 1018) to amend sections 3929 and 4041 of the Revised Statutes, authorizing the Postmaster-General to prohibit the delivery of registered letters and the payment of money-orders and providing for the return of the same;

A bill (S. 1574) to provide for the sale of the Cherokee reservation in the State of Arkansas;

A bill (S. 1742) to authorize Albert T. Stream, keeper of the life-saving station at Shoalwater Bay, Washington Territory, to accept a medal awarded to him by the British Government; and

A bill (S. 1820) to provide for the ascertainment of claims of American citizens for spoliations committed by the French prior to the 3d day of July, 1801.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill relating to interstate commerce.

Mr. WEAVER. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BOYLE] yield to me?

Mr. BOYLE. I yield whatever time I have remaining to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. WEAVER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has only five minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. WEAVER. Instead of speaking in the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania I should prefer to be recognized in my own right.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska is recognized and will proceed.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, when we consider the vastness of the business sought to be regulated by the committee bill and the substitute bill, and the limited amount of knowledge possessed by those outside of railroad management on the questions under consideration, it becomes very important that we carefully consider every measure that shall be crystallized into law, to the end that we may have legislation to stop those abuses that are known to exist, and having once prohibited by statutory enactment the doing of those things concerning which there is no division of opinion as to their being absolutely wrong, then for the present should we stay further legislation until it becomes known that further abuses have crept into the railroad management.

I say that we should not attempt to correct any imaginary evils, but strictly to confine our legislation to the correction of evils that are known to exist. Neither do I think as to the subject sought to be covered by either of the bills but that the legislation offered is confined strictly to abuses that are known to exist, and the only question at present for consideration is which one of the bills before the House will best serve the purpose for which it is intended.

The first seven sections of the committee bill cover nearly the whole ground covered by the substitute bill; and by this I do not wish to be understood as saying that the first seven sections of the committee bill are similar to the substitute bill, but only that in the first seven sections of the committee bill we have provisions traversing nearly the whole ground traversed by the substitute bill; and if the bill were to end here, and leave the enforcement of the law to the courts entirely, the measures here would elicit little discussion. But after leaving the seven sections of the committee bill we have offered to us a board of commissioners, whose duties and powers are pointed out in the bill; and it becomes very important, after having carefully looked into the proposed system, to determine whether by the adoption of the committee bill we shall have lent our influence to the adoption of a system by which the alleged evils shall be more readily examined into and corrected or whether we will have placed in the road an ornamental stumbling-block.

But before entering into a discussion of the advisability of adopting the board of commissioners, it will be well for a few moments to point out the real difference between the committee bill and the substitute bill in the matters that relate to railroad regulation. As has been stated upon this floor, there is no substantial difference between the first and second sections of the committee bill and the first section of the substitute bill.

The third section of the committee bill covers the same subject-matter as the second section of the substitute bill, namely, the subject of rebates and drawbacks, the committee bill prohibiting any rebate or drawback upon shipments except such as under similar circumstances are allowed to all persons alike, while the substitute bill absolutely prohibits any rebate or drawback, and I have no hesitancy in saying that on this subject I favor the provisions of the substitute bill. No argument has been adduced tending to show that under any state of circumstances could it be to advantage to allow drawbacks and rebates even where under similar circumstances it must be all owed to all persons alike.

It was suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG], in support of the allowance of rebate, that a railroad company in shipping goods from Chicago to a party in New York, upon being informed that another company had been shipping the same class of goods under similar circumstances at a lower rate, ought to have the opportunity to grant a rebate or drawback to the end that the said company might retain its business. We have another provision offered in the substitute bill, which, if it be adopted, will always be a standing notice not only to railroad companies and their agents but the world at large, as to just what charge can be made upon all the classified articles for shipment not only from Chicago to New York but from every place from which any company makes shipment to every and any place to which the shipment is made, so that the House can readily understand that the company that shall have exercised ordinary diligence in the carrying on of its business can not be misinformed as to what any other company is charging for similar service.

The question of allowing a rebate and drawback under similar circumstances is always a question of fact, and will lead not only to much cavil and dispute, but to much litigation and trouble. Another argument that has been made upon this floor in behalf of the drawback system is to the effect that in the case of shipment of goods where the charges had been prepaid and pending the shipment and before the delivery the property of the consignee had been destroyed by fire, it is urged in such case it would be but just to grant the consignee a rebate or drawback; to all of which argument it might be answered that the rebate or drawback given under such circumstances and for such a purpose is nothing more nor less than a donation, and that there is nothing in this bill that provides against the company making a donation under such or any circumstances.

The truth is that the retention of this drawback system as proposed in the committee bill is but to leave open the door to favoritism on the one side and oppression and destruction on the other.

Passing to the fourth section of the committee bill, we find that the same corresponds exactly with the third section of the substitute bill, each one of which makes it unlawful for railroad companies to pool their earnings. I am not prepared to say that this kind of legislation is wise, because we must remember that there should be some safeguards to the railroads, to the end that by reckless management they may not become bankrupt and destroyed, which might occur in a determined effort to destroy a competing line.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that the purpose of this legislation is not to injure railroads, but to prohibit them from taking any unjust advantage, as common carriers, of the people, who must necessarily depend upon them to make their commercial exchanges, and in determining the question as to what is a reasonable charge in fixing the schedule of rates—should that power ever be devolved upon the board of commissioners or be directly fixed by statutory enactment—it might become quite as important to fix a minimum rate as to fix a maximum rate, to the end that there might be protection to weak companies as against their stronger competitors. The people of this country want nothing more than such legislation as shall give to the railroad companies fair profit upon honest investment.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] calls attention to the small profit realized on railroad investments. He says:

Look at some of the figures. The six billions or more invested in the 125,000 miles of railroads in the United States pay only about 3 per cent. per annum to their stockholders.

Now, sir, if this were true, that the 125,000 miles of railroads in the United States had cost $6,000,000,000, or if the present value of the 125,000 miles approximated to that amount, there might be something in the argument to justify a conclusion that rates are reasonable—or perhaps too low—at the present time. But what is the truth? We know that two-thirds of this capitalized stock is water. In other words, that they are receiving 3 per cent. of interest on $2 of watered stock for every dollar of actual outlay, and it is to this that the people of this country object.

What is it but watered stock that has made both Jay Gould and Vanderbilt this day worth more money than the whole assessed valuation of the States of Nebraska and Kansas—both real estate and personal—(the two States comprehending an area of one hundred millions of acres, and a population of over two millions of people), and all this wealth extorted from the honest industry of this country. And this is what is called railroad business and railroad management, and it is just this kind of management that has made it necessary to have railroad legislation. The people do not and never would object to fair profits upon actual and honest investment.

And, again, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] says, "it was in evidence before our committee that a drawback or rebate is sometimes desirable in order to aid in exporting to foreign markets the product of American labor," and proceeds to argue that in the exporting of staves from the United States to England the American laborer without a drawback or rebate would be unable to compete with the Norwegian.

Mr. Speaker, I am unable to understand why $10 or any other amount of drawback or rebate on a car-load of staves in transitu for the seaboard, the ultimate destination of which is England, would be of any greater advantage to the shipper or place him in better condition than he would have been in had the $10 or amount to be drawn back or rebated never been charged and paid. Why should any amount of money be advanced to the railroad company as pay for freight only to be returned? The American shipper when he sends his car-load of staves knows that he will meet the Norwegian in England with his staves, and knows that unless certain rates be given him he can not compete, and the management of the railroad company knows it, and, to the end that the American laborer may be able to compete, arranges a system of rebates and drawbacks. And now I would like to have the gentleman from Massachusetts tell me why the rates could not just as easily have been so adjusted that it would not have been necessary for the railroad company to temporarily take charge of the shipper's money, a return of which had already been stipulated for, because had not this been so the American shipper would have kept his merchandise, knowing that he could not compete.

The truth seems to be that the rebate business is a fraud. In any event the stave argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts does not tend to show how it can aid the American producer in shipping abroad.

The gentleman from Massachusetts says:

Section 6 of our bill—

The bill of the committee—

gives to an injured party, in addition to his right of resort to the commission, an action for damages for violations of the provisions of the bill, and in cases of recovery allows costs sufficient to cover all his expenses in obtaining it.

Now, if this were true I would most heartily approve and support the sixth section of the committee bill; but the gentleman from Massachusetts is mistaken when he makes this statement, because the sixth section only provides that the injured party can have an additional allowance by way of costs to cover his counsel and attorney's fees and expenses and disbursements in the action, including his own necessary personal expenses, when it shall be found that the violation was willful or continued after notice.

This is wrong, as any one can see by considering the most numerous class of cases liable to arise from overcharge and discrimination. Take, for instance, a violation of the provisions of the act in an overcharge (beyond a reasonable charge) of five or ten dollars, and who will contend that the aggrieved party, failing to procure settlement, should be required to pay twenty-five or fifty dollars attorney's fees—which would be very ordinary fees in a contested case—to secure the return of five or ten dollars justly due as an overcharge, unless it should be found that the violation was willful or after notice. The expense incident to the recovery of so small an amount without any certainty of recovering the costs would lead to an abandonment of many just claims.

No, sir; this section is not right, but should be just as the gentleman from Massachusetts claimed it to be. In every instance where there is a recovery for actual damage for the violation of this act the verdict should carry with it a reasonable attorney fee, to be allowed by the court, and all reasonable and necessary expense incident to the litigation, and I regret that upon this subject the seventh section of the substitute bill affords no better relief than the provision in the committee bill.

The substitute bill offers as a premium to every one who has sustained an actual damage a verdict for three times the actual damage sustained. This is wrong, and lies in the line of confiscation, and by some courts it has already been held that no such damage can be recovered.

I read from a decision made by the supreme court of Nebraska, Atchison and Nebraska Railroad Company vs. Baty, 6 Nebr., page 37, where under a statute it was provided that any railroad company liable to pay for injuring or killing stock should fail to pay the same within thirty days after notice should be required to pay double the value of the property so injured or killed:

> In this cause one question only is raised for determination by this court, and that is whether that part of the statute of June 22, 1867, which gives to the owner of live-stock "double the value of his property injured, killed, or destroyed" on a railroad track, in case the same is not paid within thirty days after demand therefor is made upon the company is "the law of the land." This question is one of importance. It involves an inquiry into the individual rights of property, the inquiry whether the title to the same can be divested without the assent of the owner, and the question of legislative power over such property. The term "right" in civil society is defined to mean that which a man is entitled to have or to do or to receive from others within the limits prescribed by law.
> If, however, the Legislature has authority by enactment to declare that, for an injury of the kind in question, the injured party shall be entitled to receive "double the value" of the property injured, then does not the authority imply the power in the Legislature to make it a hundred times the value of the property? And the excess beyond the damages sustained, whatever it may be, is so much property taken from one person and given to another. If this legislative power exists in respect to the case under consideration, why shall it not, on the same principle, apply to simple debt? And therefore, if upon demand by the creditor the debtor fails to pay within a certain time, he may by legislative decree be compelled to pay double, treble, or a hundred times the amount of the debt, according as the Legislature may decree by legislative enactment. And whatever the object of such legislation may be, it eventuates in a decree taking property from one man and giving it to another; but such legislation is repugnant to the fundamental principles of individual rights, the maxims of the common law, and the constitutional limitations, and therefore it can not be "the law of the land." (Bay City and Sag. R. R. Co. vs. Austin, 21 Mich., 401; Lewis vs. Webb, 3 Greenleaf, 326, 330; Holden vs. James, 11 Mass., 396; James vs. Reynolds, 2 Texas, 251.)

Now, sir, by this same kind of legislation here we are liable from the courts to meet with a similar decision. But, Mr. Speaker, there is no necessity, for the ends of justice nor for the efficiency of the bill, to have a different measure of damages than that which might reasonably be given in any other class of cases, namely, that the injured party in every instance where he makes out his case shall be able to recover as additional costs his attorney's fees and all reasonable and necessary expense incident to the litigation. The provision to give every injured party who shall make out a case all his necessary expenses incident to the establishment of his case is much better for the majority of cases than either three or four times the amount of damages with his expenses dependent upon the finding as to whether or not the violation of the statute was willful, and then it has the advantage of being founded in justice and is not subject to being overturned by the courts. A statute like this, that compels the corporation that violates its provisions to pay all legitimate expense for its enforcement, will execute itself and needs no ornament of a board of commissioners, without power other than to make reports and draw a salary.

The fourth section of the substitute bill embraces a feature not included anywhere in the committee bill, as follows:

> That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in the transportation of property, as provided in the first section of this act, to charge or receive any greater compensation for a similar amount and kind of property, for the carrying, receiving, storing, forwarding, or handling of the same, for a shorter than for a longer distance on any one railroad; and the road of a corporation shall include all the roads in use by such corporation, whether owned or operated by it under a contract, agreement, or lease by such corporation.

Even Governor LONG does not like "to deny the abstract correctness of the principle here stated," but argues against it by calling our attention to an imaginary town on a hill between Jericho and Jerusalem. He says:

> Suppose a city set on a hill. It withers because it is inaccessible. At enormous cost a railroad is carried to it from the port of Jericho, at the foot of the mountain. Its grateful people willingly pay the heavy charges which the expensive building of the railroad necessitated. Inspirited, they extend their new railroad down the other side to Jerusalem on the plain, which has, fortunately for itself, a river winding round the mountain to the same port at Jericho. The mountain road pays its way with its local rates. But if it would compete with the river in carrying freight over the mountain from Jerusalem to Jericho it must carry for the same price, thereby instituting a competition with the river, which would be of great benefit to the poor people of Jericho and Jerusalem. Ah! if you do that, say the hill people, you must do our work for less, for we on the summit are only half way on your through line. But, answereth the railroad, I must either give up this through business and surrender it to the river and confine myself to your local business, charging you for it what you know it is worth and were at first glad to pay, or you must let me do this through business at through river rates and without reduction of your local rates, except so far as any slight profit I may get from this additional through business may enable me gradually to favor you. In such a case who discriminates against the hill folk? Is it the railroad? No. Is it the hill? Yes.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if we were inserting this provision for the purpose of regulating the through business of an imaginary railroad passing over an imaginary hill between Jericho and Jerusalem, the illustration might have some little force; but, as will be readily seen, it were better even then that the bill might go through for the salvation of Jerusalem. We know that the railroad could not carry the freight over the hill, as against the water competition around the hill, except at a heavy loss, which, of course, would be readily done by the railroad until the navigation company had been destroyed and taken off its barges and schooners, and then the day for cheap freights for Jerusalem has passed by, and Jerusalem will wish she had never had a railroad.

The truth is, Mr. Speaker, that railroad companies are not hunting for some town on a hill to save from withering. Nor are they on the road to Jerusalem. We would better apply this legislation to the situation of things in this country, where the railroad companies build along the streams by the most accessible routes to their ultimate destination. Take the great West as an illustration, and we who have lived there know well that the companies have paid but little attention to the towns, it being frequently necessary to give large subsidies by way of bonds to divert them but a short distance to the towns, the passing by of which would have much depreciated the property of the resident citizens; and frequently has it been necessary to divide the real estate of the town site with a ring formed inside the railroad company to secure railroad facilities, but more frequently has it occurred that town-site companies (inside the railroad management) have gone in advance of the building of the road and selected town sites, at which points the railroads have erected their stations, paying little or no attention to towns that had been started before the railroad was built, and thereby adding another great source of wealth to those whose only legitimate business should be that of aiding commerce for fair and reasonable compensation, such as is provided by the substitute bill.

I say that when we take into consideration the actual situation of things in this country, the imaginary hill railroad running from Jericho to Jerusalem seems a little far-fetched.

The gentleman from Massachusetts further suggests that the company ought to be allowed to charge a greater rate for a shorter than a longer distance, especially when that shorter distance covers a very expensive portion of the road, such as the bridge at Saint Louis or the Hoosac tunnel; but, unfortunately for his illustration, so far as the bridge part is concerned, most of the bridges, or at least those concerning which I have knowledge, have their separate tolls and charge for every freight-car carried over them, and to-day are paying a greater dividend on the money invested than any other portion of the road under railroad management; but in any event the tunneling through a hill or the erection of bridges over navigable streams is but a portion of the expense in the erection of any great railroad line, and would always be taken into consideration in arriving at the average value of a road from its different termini. In considering what would be reasonable charges under the provisions of this bill and let a car of freight be shipped a short or a long distance, the railroad company would always be receiving reasonable pay, taking into consideration the average cost of a road from end to end.

There is no provision in the substitute that prohibits any railroad company from charging and receiving as much for the carriage of freight for ten miles as it does for a hundred, or for a hundred miles as much as it does for a thousand, other than that provision which says all charges shall be reasonable, and I am much in favor of the provision in the fourth section which says that the charges in a shorter haul shall not be greater than for a longer.

I know of but one gentleman who has taken stronger grounds against the Reagan bill than the gentleman from Massachusetts. That gentleman is John C. Brown, accredited representative of over 6,000 miles of railway, and who made his argument before the committee.

Mr. Brown goes so far as to urge that Congress has no power to pass any bill interfering or regulating transportation of freight from State to State; but does make one strong admission, which forever ought to set the American people at ease, and operate as an estoppel against any railway seeking to gainsay the proposition, namely: "That Congress has the power to appoint its own agents for gathering statistical information in reference to any branch of industry;" so that if we never succeed in passing this or any other bill, we at least have secured a concession of a representative of 6,000 miles of railroad that Congress may go into the statistics business in perfect safety. This gentleman evidently thinks that the creature is bigger than the creator, and has reversed the adage, Vox populi, vox Dei, and come to the conclusion that the voice of Vanderbilt, Gould, and Huntington is the voice of God.

The next argument that seems to have the most weight against the proposed legislation in the substitute bill, wherein it declares against a greater charge for the shorter than for the longer haul, is the argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RICE], and is illustrated by two railroads having the same termini, the one making the base of a triangle and the other the perpendicular and the hypothenuse, the base road being two hundred miles in length and the other road being three hundred miles in length. Now as both these roads start from the same point, and run to the same destination, it is urged by the gentleman from Massachusetts that in order to secure through freights the road which has one hundred more miles to travel must carry the through freight at the same rate as its competitor carries it or fail to secure any proportion of that business. This is true; but who is there who does not know that if the road that carries the freight only two hundred miles is making only a reasonable charge therefor the other road can not carry that freight without a loss, or at least, without profit, and that any loss sustained by the carriage of the through freight must necessarily be made up by overcharge on the local traffic, which overcharge must be just so much in excess of reasonable rates, because all such overcharge is for no other purpose than to enable the road with an indirect line between the two given points to compete with the road that has the direct line?

It is just such business as this that the substitute bill seeks to remedy, namely, that each and every road shall have a full and fair opportunity to do the business that legitimately belongs to it at reasonable and fair rates, and to prevent unjust discrimination and to relieve the people of one locality from paying the charges that naturally fall to those of another.

The fifth section of the substitute bill provides for the posting up of schedules giving the rates of freight and the prices of carriage between different places. This is obviously a very just requirement, to the end that every person who desires to make shipment of freight may be fully advised as to what the charges will be. It has been urged here that the provisions of this section are unreasonable, in that there must be given a notice of at least five days before any new schedule of rates can go into effect. I can readily see how the want of any notice of this kind might work serious injury to shippers, but can not see how the notice can do wrong to any one, either the company or shippers. Take one instance by way of illustration: Grain buyers at the different stations along the road, who have been purchasing large quantities of grain on a close margin, basing their purchases upon present rates charged by the railroad company for carrying the grain to market. Now, sir, if the railroad companies without a day's warning can raise the freights, they have the power not only to deprive these grain buyers of the profits to which they are legitimately entitled, having purchased their grain with reference to rates already fixed—I say they have the power not only to take away their profits, but to cause them great loss; but on the other hand, if they shall have five days' notice in the proposed raising of any freights, as this bill provides, they will have abundant time in which to send their grain to market. And especially is this section of advantage to the farmer, who may desire to send his own grain or stock to market without the intervention of the middleman, always being advised by the schedule rates as to just how much the middleman is making off of him in handling his property, namely, the difference between the freight to market and the market price. This section has my unqualified indorsement.

We come now to the consideration of that part of the committee bill relating to the commission, and it might be well for a moment to inquire into and ascertain how much of this commissioner system is of practical utility and how much is ornamental. We begin at the ninth section, and in that section find that the commission has the power to appoint a clerk at a salary of $2,500 a year, and an accountant whose salary is $2,500, and to make additional expenses by calling upon the Secretary of the Interior. We also find that they have power to accept a pass from any road engaged in interstate commerce, and armed with this weapon of self-defense they go out into the world in the discharge of their sacred duties of seeing fair dealing between the railroads and the people without any power to enforce fair dealing. This is the sum and substance of the ninth section.

Coming to the tenth section, we find that they have power to entertain a complaint made upon petition, and are required to do so when the complaint bears the certificate of any district attorney of the United States or of any district or county attorney or other officer or correspondent thereto of any State or Territory that he has examined the facts and that in his opinion the complaint is well founded. They have power to notify the railroad company of the complaint made, and in proper cases are required so to do, and cause a copy of the petition to be served on the company complained against; but the section fails to define a proper case. The commissioners have power to require the company to appear before them and answer said petition and to prosecute an inquiry and to form their own conclusion in respect to the matters charged in the petition, and it is made a duty of said commission to find whether or not there has been a violation of the statute and make a report in writing setting forth the fact, and if there has been a violation of the statute, within twenty days thereafter to serve a copy on the railroad company so found to have violated the act and to notify the said company to cease and desist from such violation, and also to deliver to the district attorney of the United States for the district a copy of such report, findings, and notice. This is the sum and substance of the tenth section.

In the eleventh section there are no powers conferred upon the commissioners or duty required, but the district attorney to whom the report has been made proceeds before a United States court by petition to secure an injunction, and notwithstanding the finding of facts that have been reported to him by the commissioners, the court is not authorized upon these findings to grant even a temporary order of injunction, but only to cite the company to show why the injunction should not be granted, and to proceed to investigate the same as in ordinary cases it would where the petition alleged a violation of the law where there had been no commission appointed. Now, will some one point out the utility of this commission, in that any citizen has a right at any and all times before the courts to ask for an injunction in case of an alleged violation of the law?

We have now arrived at that point where we have spent at least thirty or forty days with the commission—landed in the court (a place where we had a right to go in the first instance) for an investigation of the case de novo.

If this is not an ornamental board, and of as little use as the fifth wheel in a wagon, I have been unable to understand the provisions of the bill. We find further along in this bill that the commission may require the production of all books, papers, and documents relating to any matter before them, but nowhere do we find the power to compel an agent of a railroad company to disclose the facts within his knowledge, neither could he be compelled to do so where there had been a criminal violation of the statute, because the bill makes no provision against the disclosure being used against the party in a criminal case, as does the Reagan substitute, and in this the bill is very defective, because without the disclosure of the facts by the witness the real truth can not be arrived at. The last power conferred upon the commission is that of a notary public, namely, to administer oaths and affirmations, and here ends the power of this remarkable board sought to be thrust upon the public with no real power except to draw its salary and to go armed with the proper implements of its office, namely, a pocketful of railroad passes.

I am in favor of the Reagan substitute, and would like to see it modified only in one particular, and that in allowing the injured party to recover his real damages, with his necessary expenses, including attorney's fees, in every instance when he has made out his case; but in the event that the Reagan bill should fail to take the place of the bill reported by the committee, I shall support the committee bill, believing as I do that it is necessary to have some legislation upon this subject, and for the reason that it contains many provisions of utility aside from that part relating to the commissioner system.

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont, was recognized.

Mr. REAGAN. If the gentleman from Vermont will yield to me I will move that the House adjourn.

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. I yield for that motion.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WARNER, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 1309) to provide statuary and historical tablets for the Saratoga monument.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the Committee had examined and found duly enrolled a joint resolution of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (S. R. 98) extending the time fixed for the joint commission appointed under the sundry civil act approved July 7, 1884, to submit their report.

FREEDMAN'S SAVINGS AND TRUST COMPANY.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Commissioner of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company, transmitting his report, as required by the act of February 21, 1881; which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted Mr. DIBBLE for two days, on account of important business.

MRS. JANE E. COLE.

Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 7670) granting a pension to Mrs. Jane E. Cole; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

MRS. MARY L. CARR.

Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire, by unanimous consent, also introduced a bill (H. R. 7671) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary L. Carr; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

ELBERT HEWITT.

Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire, by unanimous consent, also introduced a bill (H. R. 7672) granting an increase of pension to Elbert Hewitt; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

MRS. ADELINE E. CHADBOURNE.

Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire, by unanimous consent, also introduced a bill (H. R. 7673) granting a pension to Mrs. Adeline E. Chadbourne; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL CEMETERY, BAXTER SPRINGS, KANS.

Mr. PERKINS. In the last session of Congress I presented a memorial pertaining to the national cemetery of Baxter Springs, Kans., which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. That committee has considered it and has the papers here. I ask that the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that, with the accompanying papers, it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

JOHN T. WALSH.

Mr. McCOMAS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 7674) granting a pension to John T. Walsh, of Alleghany County, Maryland; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

And then, on motion of Mr. REAGAN (at 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rules, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BOUTELLE: Memorial of the mayor and city council of the city of Bangor, Me., asking aid in the construction of works for the protection of the Government buildings and other property at that place—to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. CUTCHEON: Resolutions of the Michigan State board of agriculture, in regard to experimental stations—to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. DAVIDSON: Petition of certain citizens of Florida, asking the forfeiture of railroad lands—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. DEUSTER: Petition and other papers relating to the pension claim of Capt. Lyman Mower—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. ERMENTROUT: Memorial relative to the prevention of cholera in America—to the Committee on the Public Health.

Also, petition of cigar-makers of Boyertown, Pa., eighth district, to abolish revenue tax on tobacco and cigars—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. HARMER: Petition of Martha McKeown, widow, &c., for arrears and increase of pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. A. S. HEWITT: Petitions of cigar-makers of New York, in favor of a modification of the revenue laws affecting the sale of cigars—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. PRYOR: Papers relating to the claim of James A. Patterson—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. CHARLES STEWART: Bill for constructing a channel through the bar at the mouth of Cedar Bayou, in Galveston Bay, Texas—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. G. D. WISE: Petition of Henry Trimble, late second lieutenant Company K, Ninety-ninth Ohio Volunteers—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, December 10, 1884.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

NAMING A PRESIDING OFFICER.

Mr. SHERMAN called the Senate to order, and the Secretary read the following letter:

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 10, 1884.

To the Senate of the United States:

Under and pursuant to the rules I do hereby name and designate Hon. JOHN SHERMAN, a Senator from the State of Ohio, to preside in the Senate during my absence this day.

GEO. F. EDMUNDS,
President pro tempore.

Thereupon Mr. SHERMAN took the chair as presiding officer for to-day.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

WORLD'S INDUSTRIAL AND COTTON CENTENNIAL EXPOSITION.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHERMAN) laid before the Senate the following communication from the commissioner-general of the World's Industrial and Cotton Centennial Exposition; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table and be printed:

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 9, 1884.

SIR: I am instructed by the board of management of the World's Industrial and Cotton Centennial Exposition to invite the Senate of the United States to participate in the opening ceremonies in the city of New Orleans on the 16th of December, 1884.

In obedience to these instructions I have the honor to request that you communicate this invitation to the honorable body over which you preside.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

F. C. MOREHEAD,
Commissioner-General of the World's Industrial and Cotton Centennial Exposition.

Hon. GEORGE F. EDMUNDS,
President of the Senate.

THE FORBES HISTORICAL ART COLLECTION.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following communication; which was read:

NEW YORK, June 17, 1884.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to transmit the following extract from the proceedings of the meeting of the Army of the Potomac, held in Brooklyn, N. Y., June 11 and 12:

Resolved, That this society earnestly recommend the passage of the bill now pending in Congress providing for the purchase by the Government and preservation in the Government archives of the extensive and comprehensive series of sketches and etchings of the battles and campaigns of the Army of the Potomac known as "The Forbes Historical Art Collection," and that a copy of this resolution, duly certified by our president and secretary, be transmitted to the Senate and to the House of Representatives.

Respectfully, your obedient servants,

U. S. GRANT,
President of the Army of the Potomac.
HORATIO C. KING,
Secretary of the Army of the Potomac.

To Hon. GEO. F. EDMUNDS,
President of the United States Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the communication will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CONGER. I think it should be referred to the Committee on the Library.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator make that motion?

Mr. CONGER. I make that suggestion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A bill on the subject is now before the Committee on Military Affairs, the Chair is informed.

Mr. CONGER. The subject of purchasing for the use of the Library, the etchings and so forth?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that there is a bill before the Committee on Military Affairs embracing the subject-matter of the paper.

Mr. CONGER. I do not know what the process might be to have it considered; but the question of the purchase of the plates and the materials mentioned in the letter and the etchings which are now in Barlow's gallery should be referred to the Committee on the Library, as matters of that kind are always so referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator submits such a motion the Chair will put the question to the Senate.

Mr. CONGER. I shall not make any motion. If the subject is already before the Military Committee, they can, perhaps, report upon it; but the purchase should be made upon the recommendation of the Committee on the Library.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from Michigan does not make any motion.

Mr. CONGER. No, sir; I simply call attention to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The paper will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs if there be no objection.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 6865) to amend section 2805 of the Revised Statutes of the United States so as to allow oaths to be administered by notaries public was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (H. R. 5747) to authorize the increase of the capital stock of the First National Bank of Larned, Kans., not to exceed $250,000, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HILL presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce and Board of Trade of the city of Denver, Colo., favoring the improvement of Galveston Harbor, and praying that a contract be made with Captain James B. Eads for that purpose; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LAPHAM. I present the petition of Thomas W. Robertson and 572 others, formerly employés of the custom-house in New York, praying for an appropriation by Congress to reimburse them for 10 per cent. of their salaries withheld several years ago by reason of a deficiency of appropriation. They ask that Congress may make provision for the payment to them of the sum so withheld. It is an object already provided for by law, for which an appropriation should be made. I think this petition should go to the Committee on Appropriations and that provision should be made for the payment in the deficiency appropriation bill. I move the reference of the petition to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I present a memorial of citizens of Kalamazoo, Mich., a memorial of citizens of Coldwater, Mich., and a memorial of citizens of Flint, Mich., remonstrating against the ratification of the clause in the proposed Spanish treaty relative to the tariff on tobacco. I do not know where the proper place is to present such memorials.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised that it is usual to present such matters to the Senate at another time.

Mr. CONGER. I will withdraw them, then.

Mr. MITCHELL presented a memorial of the Ale and Porter Brewers' Association of Pennsylvania, favoring the redemption of the trade-dollar; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. JACKSON presented the petition of Mary E. Fillebrown, widow of Commodore Thomas Scott Fillebrown, praying for a pension of $50 a month; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2119) for the relief of Dudley D. Smith, in his own right and as administrator of Whitcomb Smith, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2314) for the relief of the legal representatives of Aquilla Lockwood, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. SHEFFIELD, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2326) for the relief of Margaret T. Dugan, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on Claims to report back the bill (S. 1351) for the relief of the Continental Fire Insurance Company, Eagle Fire Insurance Company, City Fire Insurance Company, and Commercial Mutual Insurance Company, all of New York city, it being a bill to refund to certain insurance companies a tax which they claim to have been illegally exacted. The committee ask to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The report was agreed to.

PRINTING OF PANAMA CANAL PAPERS.

Mr. MILLER, of California, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, submitted the following resolution; which was agreed to:

Ordered, That the dispatches of Mr. Grorge Maney, formerly United States minister at the United States of Colombia, relative to the Panama Canal, furnished to the Committee on Foreign Relations by the Department of State on the 29th day of March, 1884, be printed for the use of the Senate.

COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Relations to ask the leave of the Senate for that committee to sit during the sessions of the Senate. The business of that committee has accumulated to such an extent that it can not be disposed of at the regular meetings. I make that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California moves, on behalf of the Committee on Foreign Relations, that it have leave to sit during the sessions of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

THE TENTH CENSUS.

Mr. HALE. I am instructed by the Select Committee to make provision for taking the Tenth Census and ascertaining the results thereof to report without amendment the joint resolution (H. Res. 289) authorizing the Superintendent of the Census to continue the work on the Tenth Census. I should like to have it passed now if there is no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine asks the immediate consideration of the joint resolution reported by him. It will be read at length for information.

The joint resolution was read.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is that a House resolution?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is a House resolution.

Mr. HALE. I hope there will be no objection to it; it is simply extending the time.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is just the House resolution?

Mr. HALE. It is just the House resolution.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It repeals so much of the act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, approved July 7, 1884, as provides that the Census Bureau shall be closed on January 1, 1885; and authorizes the Superintendent of the Census to continue the work of the Tenth Census until the further action of Congress. But in no case shall any expense be incurred under this resolution, either for salaries or other items, in excess of the balance of appropriations heretofore made for the work of the Tenth Census which shall remain unexpended on January 1, 1885, and the bureau shall be closed with the expenditure of the money heretofore appropriated.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MANDERSON introduced a bill (S. 2431) for the relief of Miss Anna Ella Carroll; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MCMILLAN introduced a bill (S. 2432) to increase the appropriation for the erection of the public building at Minneapolis, Minn.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. MAXEY introduced a bill (S. 2433) for the relief of Thomas F. Purnell; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. VANCE introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 99) directing copies of the official letter-books of the executive department of the State of North Carolina to be furnished to said State; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MILLER, of California, introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 100) authorizing the printing of certain naval and military reports; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

ERICSSON'S SUBMARINE GUN.

Mr. BLAIR submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to investigate the new system of naval defense for the seaports of the United States proposed by Capt. John Ericsson, especially with a view to ascertaining the efficiency of his new submarine gun and projectile torpedo for that purpose. Also, to ascertain whether the same is about to be purchased for the exclusive use of any foreign power, and whether or not the efficiency of the naval service and prudent provision for the national defense require the purchase and appropriation of this invention by the Government.

Mr. BLAIR. As that is simply a resolution of instruction to the committee, I should like, if there is no objection, that there be action upon it at the present time; but before action I desire indulgence to say a few words.

It appears evident at the present time that public sentiment is fast ripening up to a determination to rebuild the American Navy. Of course if the Navy is to be reconstructed and a navy made of capacity to compete with and meet in order of battle the navies of the world the expense must be simply enormous. I have never heard it doubted by any individual who was capable of making an estimate of the probable expense that sooner or later, and that within a very few years, it would be at least $500,000,000; and if we enter upon this course of expenditure at all we can hardly be justified in so doing unless we contemplate the ultimate result, for it is no use to half arm the American Navy or to half provide suitable defense against the aggression of foreign powers. Our seaports, as we learn from the reports of the Secretaries of War and of the Navy and from every source, are utterly defenseless at the present time as against the aggression of any of the first-class powers of the world or even of the second class or possibly the third.

Captain Ericsson has invented a submarine gun which it is claimed is of itself, with comparatively a slight expenditure, capable of meeting and destroying the combined navies of the world; at all events that it is valuable in the way of self-defense at a comparatively slight expenditure to the American people. It is stated in behalf of that invention that the harbor, for instance, of the city of New York could be provided at an expense of less than a million dollars with two, three, or four vessels armed with this submarine gun, and by means of that comparatively slight expenditure be able to resist an attack from any or all of the combined navies of the world.

The attention of the Navy Department has been called to this invention, and I presume the attention of the Committee on Naval Affairs has been arrested by it. There have been commendations of its efficiency from the highest naval authorities of the country, Admiral Porter and others, and there is every reason, I think, to believe that a fair investigation of this new system of defense will result in the appropriation of the invention by the Government and the saving of an enormous expenditure to the American people.

I have lately received, in reply to inquiries made by myself, from Captain Ericsson some account of the invention itself, in a letter which I desire to have printed in connection with the remarks I am now making, and also one or two other documentary matters, which throw a good deal of light upon the probable value of the invention. I desire to have this matter printed in connection with what I say, and that the whole shall either be referred directly to the committee for investigation, the resolution itself, as well as this matter, or that the resolution may be acted upon affirmatively and at once by the Senate. I will ask that the matter be printed and that the resolution go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire asks that certain documents, referred to by him, be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. ALLISON. What is proposed to be printed in the RECORD?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Certain documents referred to by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask that, rather than to take up the time of the Senate by reading them at the present time as part of my remarks. I am not particular, however. Let the letter of Captain Ericsson be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The letter will be read as part of the Senator's remarks.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the letter of Captain Ericsson, dated New York, December 1, 1884, but before concluding was interrupted by,

Mr. ALLISON. I do not care to hear the paper read further.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the paper will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter is as follows:

NEW YORK, December 1, 1884.

SIR: I am informed by my friend Mr. G. H. Robinson that you intend to introduce a resolution in Congress with reference to my new system of destroying hostile iron-clad ships by means of submarine artillery, carried in small, cheaply constructed vessels.

The Secretary of War, in his report for 1883, said: "Our seacoast, with its great cities and important harbors, is defenseless to-day against the attack of a modern ironclad, and it is humiliating even to imagine the mortification, loss of life, property, and prestige to which we would be subjected should war come suddenly upon us, as the history of nations shows may happen at any time." That no means have yet been proposed by our Government capable of preventing the destruction of our great seaboard cities by an enemy's iron-clad ships will be seen by reference to the accompanying "statement relating to the defense of the seaports of the United States."

Regarding the submarine gun, the principal feature of the Destroyer system, I have the honor briefly to call your attention to the fact that its explosive projectile, loaded with three hundred pounds of gun-cotton, is capable of shattering the hull of any ironclad whatever. Admiral Porter, in a letter to the Secretary of the Navy, says with reference to the Destroyer system: "My own opinion is that Mr. Ericsson has invented the most destructive principle known in naval warfare, and if there are objections to it, the objections are simply to mechanical details, which can be ascertained by careful trial. This Government is too poorly provided with means of defense against foreign aggression to allow it to treat lightly this invention of Mr. Ericsson." (See letter from the Secretary of the Navy to the Senate, February 20, 1884.) Since Admiral Porter's letter was written, the Destroyer has been completed, as you will find by referring to the accompanying report, "Trial of the Destroyer," dated October 31, 1883. No defects whatever having been discovered during this final trial of the system, I have offered to build a steel vessel of the Destroyer type, 132 feet long, 20 feet beam, 11½ feet deep, for the sum of $160,000, including submarine gun, projectiles, and all appurtenances complete for actual service. I have also forwarded to the Navy Department complete working drawings and specification of the vessel, steam machinery, submarine gun, and projectile.

Impressed with the importance of the subject, and apprehensive that the Navy Department may not see fit to recommend an immediate introduction of my submarine system for the defense of our unprotected harbors, I respectfully suggest that you introduce a resolution in Congress instructing the Secretary of the Navy to enter into a contract with me for building a steel vessel of the Destroyer type, in accordance with the foregoing particulars. Permit me to observe that such a contract and the acceptance of my offer involve no responsibility whatever on the part of the Department nor can the country suffer any loss, since the due performance of the vessel, submarine gun, and projectile is guaranteed by my sureties.

I beg to state for your information that I have declined to comply with Commodore Sicard's request to exhibit the operation of the submarine gun a second time before a naval board, my grounds for not complying with the demand being stated in the accompanying letter to the Department, dated September 29, 1884.

The report of the trial of the submarine gun on board the Destroyer by the naval board under Captain Selfridge (see letter of the Secretary of the Navy to the Senate, February 20, 1884) concludes thus: "Though the trials before the board have been very limited, sufficient has been shown to convince them that the Ericsson submarine torpedo is a projectile of the most formidable character within a limited range, and within that range whatever further experiments and improvements may prove such to be it is superior to any known form of torpedo." I respectfully submit that on the strength of this report and the facts contained in the accompanying printed documents, apart from my offering sureties guaranteeing the successful performance of my invention (as was the case when I built the original Monitor, which was not fully paid for until after the action at Hampton Roads), Congress will do well to instruct the Navy Department to enter into a contract with me for the construction of a steel vessel of the Destroyer type, armed with submarine artillery, agreeably to the plans and specifications now in the possession of the Navy Department.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

J. ERICSSON.

Hon. HENRY W. BLAIR,
United States Senator, Washington.

Mr. BLAIR. In this connection I submit a "statement relating to the defenses of the seaports of the United States," and also a report relating to the record of the trial of this vessel, the Destroyer, in the form of an official report to the Secretary of the Navy by Captain Ericsson.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the papers presented will be printed as part of the Senator's remarks. The Chair hears none.

The papers referred to are as follows:

STATEMENT RELATING TO THE DEFENSE OF THE SEAPORTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

SIR: I have the honor to submit the following statement concerning my new system of naval defense by means of which the seaports of the United States can be effectually defended. The problem how to defend the seaports of the Union has engaged my attention during a series of years; but the improvements gradually introduced by the leading naval powers in their iron-clad ships have called for modifications which have retarded the execution of my plan of constructing vessels capable of defending harbors against those ships.

The completion of the Inflexible, Lepanto, and other ironclads carrying guns weighing from 80 to 100 tons, protected by armor of 18 to 22 inches in thickness, having at last arrested further increase of weight and size, we now possess a definite knowledge of the character of the ships we must be prepared to meet. But some of the naval powers of Europe have done more than merely increasing the weight of their guns and armor; they have fitted their ships with a protecting netting of wire-rope (readily applied on entering harbors), rendering defense by means of self-moving torpedoes absolutely useless. Moreover, a certain maritime power has elaborated efficient means for destroying stationary submarine torpedoes while passing through channels protected by that delicate and complex system of defense. Having thus briefly adverted to the formidable character of the armored ships possessed by other maritime nations, I propose to show that the United States is wholly unprepared to resist an attack by those ships directed against its seaports, and that at present no adequate means are being prepared for that purpose: (1) The stationary torpedoes intended to be placed in the ship-channels—hitherto supposed to offer an insurmountable barrier against hostile ships—can easily be destroyed by the enemy. (2) The guns of the various United States forts, although very useful for the purpose of destroying the enemy's torpedo-boats, are incapable of penetrating the armor of first-class armed ships, hence unable to resist their entrance into the harbors. (3) The movable torpedo recommended by the Bureau of Ordnance—supposed to be capable of piercing the vulnerable parts of an iron-clad vessel—is of no use, since it can not penetrate the netting which protects the assailant. (4) The turrets, protected by 12-inch steel-faced iron plates, now being built (to be mounted on light vessels insufficiently armored), are too small to admit of guns of sufficient caliber to make any serious impression on modern armor. At the same time the projectile of an 80-ton gun easily penetrates the 12-inch thick turret, besides utterly destroying its mobility, in virtue of the enormous impact of the projectile. It will be well also to bear in mind that conflict in harbors means short range and accurate aim; hence the light hulls of the turret vessels will inevitably be destroyed by the superior attacking ships.

The facts which I have thus had the honor to lay before you prove that, after the completion of the turret vessels now in course of construction, and notwithstanding the intended employment of movable torpedoes, the great cities on the seaboard may at any time be destroyed by a squadron of first-class iron-clad ships.

In view of the foregoing, it is demonstrable that submarine artillery capable of reaching the vulnerable parts of armored ships is the proper method of defending our harbors. Moreover, such a system of defense can be quickly and cheaply arranged. Impressed with the correctness of these assumptions, I have built a partially-armored iron vessel, the Destroyer, capable of navigating the coast in any weather, 130 feet long, 17 feet 4 inches wide, and 11 feet deep, the bow of which is protected by heavy inclined armor plates placed transversely and backed by timbers several feet in thickness. Below this inclined armor, near the bottom of the vessel, a submarine gun 30 feet long is applied, the muzzle of which passes through an opening in the stem. This formidable piece of ordnance has been thoroughly tested under varying conditions, the result being that it has not in a single instance failed to expel the submarine projectile with the required velocity. Its caliber is 16 inches, the projectile being 25 feet long, 15¾ inches diameter. The weight of the latter is 1,450 pounds, including an explosive charge of 300 pounds. The hull of the vessel is provided with an intermediate arched iron deck extending from stem to stern below the water-line. The motive engine, 1,000 indicated horse-power, is located under the intermediate deck. During conflict the crew retire below this deck. The Destroyer, whose buoyancy and stability admit of inclined armor several feet in thickness being employed, is capable of resisting any ordnance whatever. It attacks bows on, the projectile being discharged at a distance of 300 feet from the opponent. The explosive charge is sufficient to shatter the hull of any iron-clad ship, thus rendering water-tight compartments of no avail.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

J. ERICSSON.

Hon. S. S. COX,
Chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, House of Representatives.

NEW YORK, January 7, 1884.

TRIAL OF THE DESTROYER.

NEW YORK, October 31, 1883.

SIR: I have the honor to submit the following report relating to the trial of the Destroyer, its submarine gun and projectile torpedo, conducted during the last four months:

1. Commodore Sicard's apprehension has proved groundless, "that the comparatively low velocity and great length" of the projectile torpedo will cause a deviation of its course in the vertical plane, in consequence of the angular motion of the axis of the gun "while the projectile is passing out of the bore." Various tests were instituted in the course of the trial to ascertain if the deviation from the axial line of the gun in a vertical direction, imagined by the Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance, took place; but no such deviation could be detected. Among other expedients resorted to, a metallic outrigger was applied to the stem of the Destroyer, in order to determine the position of the projectile at the instant of leaving the bore of the gun. Apart from this practical method of proving that the apprehended difficulty does not exist, it may be shown, theoretically, that at the instant of leaving the muzzle the axis of the projectile coincides with the prolongation of the axis of the gun. The accompanying drawing of the projectile torpedo shows that although the tail end is six inches less in diameter than the central part, the four metallic wings attached to the former fit the bore of the gun exactly, thus forming guides which insure the parallelism of the axis of the gun and projectile until the latter leaves the bore. Nor can any appreciable strain take place, since the last three feet of the movement of the projectile within the gun occupies scarcely one one-hundredth of a second.

2. It was found, by repeated discharges during the trial, that although the projectile torpedo, as shown by the drawing, is perfectly symmetrical, it invariably descended on an inclined plane—the angle of deviation from the axial line of the gun at the instant of exit being constant. Various methods were adopted for the purpose of ascertaining whether the tail end of the projectile, as appeared probable, was lifted up by the rush of water accompanying the exit of the propelling piston. Satisfactory indication that such was not the case being furnished during the trial, a very simple expedient was resorted to for depressing the tail end of the projectile—namely, an adjustable inclined projection at the extreme aft end. This device has proved quite successful, and now affords certain means of causing the projectile to continue its course in the direction of the axis of the gun at the instant when the projectile leaves the bore, or at any desirable angle above or below the gun's axial line.

3. With reference to firing the submarine gun at the right time as regards vertical direction, I beg to call your special attention to the fact that far less accuracy is requisite on the part of the manipulator of this gun than that which the ordinary naval artillerist must possess. An error on the part of the latter of only one degree at the moderate range of 1,000 yards will send the shot 50 feet above or below the point aimed at, while an equal error on the part of the manipulator of the submarine gun, the range of which never exceeds 300 feet, will send the projectile torpedo only 5 feet above or below that line of the opponent's hull deemed most desirable to strike.

4. The important fact has been established by the trial that the outboard sea-valve of the submarine gun can be suddenly opened by steam-power while the vessel is running at maximum speed, and that the valve within the gun is capable of resisting the united pressure of the sea and that produced by the powerful current attending the onward motion of the vessel at the instant of opening the outboard sea-valve. As the inner valve should be so fragile that it may be broken by the projectile without sensible loss of energy, it was originally composed of wood; but the valve now employed is made of cast iron one-eighth inch thick, the form being semi-spherical. It proved during the trial to be more readily broken than the original wooden valve. The metallic valve has moreover proved to be perfectly water-tight, a fact established by the following circumstance: The Destroyer having returned to the navy-yard at the conclusion of the trial of the valves, without firing the submarine gun, the inner valve of course remained in the bore. On going to the trial ground again, after the lapse of a week, it was found on opening the breech-plug that not a drop of water had entered through the fragile valve, which during the period mentioned had been subjected to the pressure of water between the two valves.

5. The propelling pistons of the submarine gun, which transmit the energy of the ignited charge to the projectile torpedo, performed their function without causing any trouble whatever during the entire trial. It is scarcely necessary to observe that one of these pistons, together with the inner sea-valve, must be sacrificed for each shot, since, owing to their weight, they sink after leaving the gun. The projectile torpedo, however, the weight of which is somewhat less than that of the water it displaces, may be used during an indefinite number of discharges, as it floats to the surface after having spent a certain amount of its propulsive energy in overcoming the resistance of the water. It should be observed that the propelling piston is constructed like a steam-engine piston, with an expansive metallic ring at the circumference; hence, unlike the rifle shot, this piston fits air-tight in the bore of the gun. Consequently the whole energy developed by the powder gases is rendered available. Nor should it be overlooked that the great air space round the charge—the marked feature of the submarine gun—promotes a more perfect combustion than hitherto attained. In addition to this advantage, I have devised a new gas-check, composed of gum, which during the prolonged trial remained perfectly tight. This improvement, together with the close fit of the propelling piston and perfect combustion of the charge, satisfactorily accounts for the extraordinary amount of dynamic energy developed compared with the quantity of powder employed. The maximum charge during the trial, 12 pounds of prismatic powder, has proved adequate to propel a projectile 25 feet long, weighing 1,450 pounds, a distance upward of 300 feet in three seconds.

6. The following important question was completely set at rest during the trial: is the firing pin of the percussion lock, which ignites the explosive charge of the projectile, capable of penetrating the inner sea-valve and overcoming the external resistance of the water? The lock referred to being patented and its construction, therefore, well known, it will suffice to mention that the spiral spring which restrains the inward motion of the pin was adjusted to overcome an outward pressure of 700 pounds, its maximum resisting power being twice as great. It will be proper to add, that owing to the great velocity of the projectile the resistance of the water is upward of 400 pounds per square inch against the end of the firing pin. Now, in order to prove practically its capability to overcome the said resistance, besides the needed energy to penetrate the rubber which covers the central hole of the inner sea-valve, the firing pin was coated with paint just before the insertion of the projectile in the gun. Careful examination after each discharge showed that the paint was undisturbed, thus proving that the power of the spiral spring, although set to only half its tension, was adequate to overcome the resistance encountered by the firing pin in piercing the valve.

7. The firing pin of the percussion lock being an essential part of the new system of submarine attack, I have ascertained practically that when the projectile encounters a fixed or a very heavy movable body, while advancing at the rate of 8 feet per second (about 5 miles an hour), the firing pin is instantly pushed in, notwithstanding the resisting power of the spiral spring within the lock—the internal mechanism being such that a triple detonating fuse is exploded by the movement.

Regarding the vessel (the Destroyer) which carries the submarine gun, I have the honor to inform you that the increase of beam adverted to in my former communication has imparted the expected stability to the hull, the Destroyer being now emphatically a sea-going vessel. The mechanical device, before reported, by means of which the vessel is turned on the center without backing or going ahead, has proved very useful; while the present great stability and excess of buoyancy enables the Destroyer to carry inclined armor 2 feet thick backed by 5 feet thickness of wood.

In view of the foregoing it will appear that vessels of the Destroyer type, capable of defying ordnance of any caliber while attacking bows on, armed with submarine guns and projectile torpedoes, can effectually defend our harbors against iron-clad ships—more particularly since the projectile torpedo can not be stopped by the netting carried by European ships, which so completely protects against attack by the feeble self-moving torpedo.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

J. ERICSSON.

Hon. W. E. CHANDLER,
Secretary of the Navy, Washington.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to say further in connection with this matter that I am informed and believe that the English Government is engaged in a negotiation for the appropriation of this invention. It is an American invention, made by the man who saved the commerce of the United States during the recent war, whose invention at that time effected a revolution in the system of naval warfare of the civilized world. I believe it probable that this new invention of his marks a like era; and it would be well for the Government of the United States to investigate this matter carefully, for it may be that other powers will be very soon appropriating an invention which might be exclusively our own.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator ask for the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. BLAIR. Let it go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be printed and placed on the Calendar.

INTEROCEANIC SHIP-RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. VEST. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 1690) to incorporate the Interoceanic Ship-Railway Company, and for other purposes, and that I may have leave to withdraw the bill from the files of the Senate. I have received a letter from Captain Eads, in which he says that certain changes made in the concession of Mexico necessitate the withdrawal of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri moves that he have leave on behalf of the Committee on Commerce to withdraw a certain bill named by him.

The motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution:

A bill (S. 1309) to provide statuary and historical tablets for the Saratoga monument; and Joint resolution (S. R. 98) extending the time fixed for the joint commission appointed under the sundry civil act approved July 7, 1884, to submit their report.

CHICAGO COMMERCIAL NATIONAL BANK.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to call up a bill reported yesterday from the Committee on Finance, the bill (S. 2375) to authorize the increase of the capital stock of the Commercial National Bank of Chicago, which, I am informed by the Senators from Illinois, it is very desirable should pass and become a law before the 1st of January.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. It is suggested to me that there should be an amendment made to the bill. I move to add the following proviso:

Provided, That two-thirds of the stockholders shall consent thereto.

So as to read:

And the Comptroller of the Currency is hereby authorized to fix the limit of the increase of the capital stock of the Commercial National Bank of Chicago at the amount of $2,000,000: Provided, That two-thirds of the stockholders shall consent thereto.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FORFEITURE OF OREGON LAND GRANT.

Mr. SLATER. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 181) to declare forfeited certain lands granted to aid in the construction of a railroad in Oregon, and to enforce the same by judicial proceedings.

Mr. HARRISON. I suppose the Senator from Oregon does not intend that the bill shall displace the regular order at 2 o'clock.

Mr. SLATER. Certainly not. I do not wish to do that.

Mr. HARRISON. I think we can dispose of the bill in a little while, and in that case I have no objection to its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Oregon.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That so much of the lands granted by an act of Congress entitled "An act granting land to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Portland to Astoria and McMinnville, in the State of Oregon," approved May 4, 1870, as are adjacent to and coterminous with the uncompleted portions of said road, and not embraced within the limits of said grant for the completed portions of said road, be, and the same are hereby, declared to be forfeited to the United States and restored to the public domain, and made subject to disposal under the general land laws of the United States as though said grant had never been made: Provided, That the price of the lands so forfeited and restored shall be the same as heretofore fixed for the even-numbered sections within said grant.

Mr. DOLPH. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill as reported by the committee, which would involve striking out the proviso of the committee's amendment. I understand that my amendment should be offered before action upon the amendment of the committee. Therefore, I offer now the amendment presented by me yesterday, and which was printed, and which I now send to the desk of the Secretary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that it is an amendment to the text of the bill.

Mr. DOLPH. It is an amendment to the amendment reported from the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is in order, and will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike from the amendment of the committee the following proviso:

Provided, That the price of the lands so forfeited and restored shall be the same as heretofore fixed for the even-numbered sections within said grant.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

All persons who at the date of the passage of this act are actual settlers in good faith on any of the lands hereby forfeited, and who are otherwise qualified, on making due claim to such lands under the homestead, pre-emption, or other laws, within six months after the same shall have been declared forfeited, shall be entitled to a preference right to enter the same in accordance with the provisions of this act and of the homestead, pre-emption, or other laws, as the case may be, and shall be regarded as having legally settled upon and occupied said lands under said pre-emption, homestead, or other laws, as the case may be, from the date of such actual settlement or occupation; and in case any such settler may not be entitled to thus enter or acquire such land under existing laws, he shall be permitted, within one year after the passage of this act, to purchase not to exceed one hundred and sixty acres of the same, at the price of $1.25 per acre; and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to make such rules and regulations as will secure to said actual settlers the benefit of these rights: Provided, That the price of the even-numbered sections within the limits of said grant and adjacent to and conterminous with the uncompleted portions of said road, and not embraced within the limits of said grant for the completed portions of said road, is hereby reduced to $1.25 per acre.

Mr. DOLPH. By the bill as it is reported by the Committee on Public Lands it is proposed to forfeit and restore to the public domain for settlement under the general land laws of the United States so much of the lands as were granted to the Oregon Central Railroad Company of Portland by the act of May 4, 1870, as lie adjacent to and conterminous with the uncompleted portions of said road, and to fix the price of the odd sections so forfeited at $2.50 an acre. By the act of May 4, 1870, there was granted to said company, the Oregon Central Railroad Company of Portland, each alternate section of the public land not mineral, except coal and iron, designated by odd sections, to the amount of ten sections per mile upon each side nearest to the road except such as had been previously reserved or otherwise disposed of or held under valid homestead and pre-emption rights; and also the right to take materials from the public land for the construction of the road and the usual grant of land for depot and station purposes.

The Oregon Central Railroad Company of Portland had prior to the date of that grant projected a line of railroad from Portland westward to Forest Grove, thence along the west side of the Willamette Valley by McMinnville and other west side towns to the southern boundary of the State of Oregon, and had commenced the construction of that line. It had been engaged in a long contest with the Oregon Central Railroad Company of Salem for the lands granted by the act of Congress of July 25, 1866, granting lands to such company as should be designated by the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Portland, in Oregon, southerly through the Willamette Valley to a suitable point of junction with the line of the Central Pacific Railroad Company in California, and having been unsuccessful in that contest, had come to Congress for aid in the construction of its road.

The late Hon. Joseph S. Smith, of Oregon, then in Congress, introduced a bill to grant lands to the company to aid in the construction of its road as then projected, but before the bill was passed it was amended so as to limit the grant of land upon the projected line of the company's road to McMinnville, a point about fifty miles from Portland, and through the influence of the late Judge Olney, of Astoria, and other persons interested in getting a line of road from Portland to Astoria, the bill was amended so as to include a grant of land from Forest Grove to Astoria, a distance of about ninety-seven miles.

Shortly after the passage of that act the Oregon Central Railroad Company of Portland constructed about forty-eight miles of road from Portland to Saint Joe, a point about a mile and a half distant from McMinnville, and then failed, and have been unable to continue the construction of the road. The constructed road and the earned and unearned land grant was transferred to the Oregon and California Railroad Company, a company which has succeeded to the ownership of the grant under the act of July 25, 1866. That company has also acquired fifty miles of additional road from Saint Joseph southward upon the original projected line, and is devoting all its energies to the construction of its main line, and nothing has been done toward the construction of the line from Forest Grove to Astoria. Nothing in fact has been done in regard to the matter except to make preliminary surveys.

As I stated upon this floor on a previous occasion, I intend to vote for the forfeiture of this unearned grant; but as this is an important bill to the people of the State I have the honor in part to represent, and as, if it becomes a law, it will undoubtedly have no little effect upon the future settlement and development of portions of my State, I do not feel like letting the opportunity pass without saying that I have come to the conclusion to vote for the forfeiture of this unearned grant with a good deal of reluctance. I do not share in the views of some that the forfeiture of this grant will aid in securing the early construction of the road. I do not see how we can expect to secure the early construction of the road without Congressional aid when we have not been able to procure it with the aid of a Congressional grant. A railroad constructed from Forest Grove to Astoria would pass through a mountain-broken, timbered country; it will be difficult of construction, quite expensive to build, and when built will have to compete for its traffic with river transportation on the Columbia River.

When the bill making this grant was under consideration in the House Mr. Smith described that country, and I desire to quote briefly from his remarks on that occasion, both for the purpose of showing why the road has not been built and why my amendment as to the price of the lands and for the protection of settlers should prevail. I send the debate to the Secretary's desk, and ask to have the extract marked read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

This bill is in the interest of settlers or prospective settlers on the public lands through which this road is designed to pass. The road will be about one hundred and thirty miles long. Fifty miles of that distance the country is settled; for the remainder of the distance it is not settled, and is not susceptible of settlement, unless means of communication through it such as are proposed by this bill shall be provided.

* * * * * * *

The Willamette Valley, which contains two-thirds of the population of the State of Oregon, has no outlet to the sea but by the Columbia River. That river flows across the north end of this Willamette Valley. On the west, between that valley and the sea, a mountain range extends along its whole length. Through this range of mountains to the mouth of the river we have no road of any kind.

* * * * * * *

We want this road to give us an outlet to the sea at all seasons; and we want to open up the pass we have found through these mountains to the settlement. It is not a question whether by the passage of this bill this land shall be withdrawn from settlement, but the question is whether by the passage of this bill you will open up to settlement a region of country which otherwise never would be settled. It is a question whether it shall be occupied by settlers under the provisions of this bill, or whether it shall remain a wilderness in the future as in the past; whether it shall be the home of a busy, thriving population, or continue to be the home of the elk and the bear.

For twenty-five years, Mr. Speaker, this land has been open to settlement, first under a donation law, and now under the homestead law; and yet no man has gone there to settle. No white men ever went there until they went to find this pass for a railroad to the sea. The red man never lived there. It is a forest, an Oregon forest, such as is found nowhere else, perhaps, in the world. And no settler will ever go there unless there is a railroad through the pass connecting this Willamette Valley with the sea. In that event some of the smaller valleys will be opened to settlement. The lands are rich; the timber is abundant; it is valuable. But the land and the timber would remain in the condition they now are for a hundred years to come if this road is not built.

* * * * * * *

No man with a knowledge of the condition of the country and its future prospects would ever settle there in the absence of this railroad.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I think the description of that country given by Mr. Smith, just read, is somewhat overdrawn, but it is nevertheless true that the lands which will be restored to the public domain and subjected to settlement under the land laws of the United States according to this bill are not very desirable for settlers, and I might add that there have been very few homestead or pre-emption settlements on the even sections within the limits of the grant.

This bill is an important one, as I said before, to the people of my State, and I believe the best interests of the people would be served by holding on to the grant as long as possible, in the hope that it may prove an inducement to the construction of this road. But both political parties of the State have declared in their State conventions for the forfeiture of this unearned grant, and petitions were presented at the last session of Congress, and had been presented at previous sessions, praying for the forfeiture of the grant. I have concluded to accept these expressions as an announcement of the will of my constituents, and, as nothing has been done toward the construction of the road, and the present owners of the grant do not appear to have the ability or the disposition now to commence the construction of the road, to vote for the forfeiture. I do not think, either, that there is any great demand by settlers for lands for settlement within this grant, or that the settlement of the country has been greatly retarded by the withdrawal of these lands from market. From the description already given of the lands it is apparent they must be settled slowly, until the more desirable lands in the vicinity have been occupied.

Since this bill was reported, however, such information as has come to me has convinced me that there ought to be some amendment made to it in the interest of settlers on the land. I have learned that several settlers have gone upon the land supposing that the grant had lapsed. I am informed that settlers have gone upon the odd sections within this grant supposing that the grant had lapsed and become a part of the public domain; and although the officers of the local land office refused to receive and file their papers, they still reside there. Some have gone on the land with the expectation of securing their title from the railroad company.

Under this state of facts, I think their rights should be protected by some provision like the amendment offered by me. The amendment offered by me, except the provision fixing the price of the even sections at the minimum price, one dollar and a quarter an acre, is part of the House bill as it came to this body, and it appears to me is unobjectionable.

It will be observed that it is proposed to strike out the proviso of the bill as reported by the Senate Committee on Public Lands fixing the price of the even sections at two dollars and a half an acre, and from what I have said in regard to the quality and condition of those lands I think it is apparent that if the price of the land is now fixed at two dollars and a half an acre, or double the minimum price, it will retard the settlement of the lands and the development of the country. I know what reasons induced the committee to report the bill fixing the price of this land at two dollars and a half an acre. It was supposed that some persons had gone upon the even sections and purchased lands within the limits of the grant at two dollars and a half an acre, and that they would complain of the inequality should the odd sections be placed at a dollar and a quarter an acre, and come to Congress for relief. I have, however, taken pains to inquire into that matter, and while I could not examine the books in regard to all the townships embraced within this grant, I took two or three at random. One was 6 north, 4 west. I found that eighty acres only had been sold at two dollars and a half an acre. The next was 4 north, 6 west. I found that there had been no entry. The next was 8 north, 6 west, near the Columbia River, half way between Forest Grove and Astoria, and I found that there had been since the date of the passage of the act only 28.64 acres entered at two dollars and a half an acre. It will therefore be seen that the amount of land probably entered upon the even sections at two dollars and a half an acre is so very small, so inconsiderable, as to be of no consequence; and that the difficulty which the committee anticipated does not in fact exist. Besides, Congress has already provided a remedy for such cases by the act of March 3, 1875, which I ask to have read from the Clerk's desk, as it is only a few lines in length.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That where any actual settler who shall have paid for any lands situate within the limits of any grant of lands by Congress to aid in the construction of any railroad, the price of such lands being fixed by law at double-minimum rates, and such railroad lands having been forfeited to the United States and restored to the public domain for failure to build such railroad, such person or persons shall have the right to locate on any unoccupied lands an amount equal to their original entry, without further cost, except such fees as are now provided by law in pre-emption cases: Provided, That when such location is upon double-minimum lands, one-half the amount only shall be taken.

Mr. DOLPH. It seems also reasonable to me that persons who have gone upon these lands in good faith as provided in this amendment should have their rights protected. They should have priority of right to purchase the same under the land laws of the United States; and if any persons have gone upon these lands under the railroad company who are not qualified to purchase under the general land laws of the United States and made settlement and improvement, no harm will be done by permitting them to purchase their land to the extent of 160 acres at the minimum price. I do not believe that the Government ought to recognize any contract, if any has been made, between the railroad company and the settlers or perfect their titles without payment of the price to the United States, and I have therefore not included in the amendment offered by me that provision of the House bill.

The amendment offered by me is broad enough to cover the legal and equitable rights of all settlers, and if any persons have made any payments to the railroad company they must look to the company for the return of the same and not to the Government. The amendment offered by me is intended to provide at once for the settlement of all claims of all persons on any of these forfeited lands, to prevent controversies between the settlers, to relieve the officers of the Land Office from trouble, and turn the matter over at once for adjustment to the Secretary of the Interior. It is not proposed to recognize the rights of any but settlers in good faith at the date of the passage of the act. The right recognized is a priority of right to purchase under the general land laws of the United States, a right to make actual settlement upon the land, a right if any settler is found not to be qualified under the general land laws to purchase one hundred and sixty acres at a dollar and a quarter an acre.

This amendment, it appears to me, is eminently just both as to the settler and as to the Government. I can see no objection to it. It is not to be wondered at when lawyers do not agree as to the question of the title to the lands within the limits of a railroad grant where the road is not constructed after the time limited for the construction of the road and before Congress has acted in forfeiting the grant, that the Western pioneers have gone on the lands under circumstances which require special legislation.

If Congress does not now provide for this class of persons it will undoubtedly do so in the future, for that has been the unbroken practice of Congress for nearly a century. I do not think there are many such settlers in this case, but be they few or many, it appears to me there is plain necessity for the legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. PLUMB. I wish to make an inquiry of the Chair in regard to a parliamentary matter. The amendment which has been proposed by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] is not objectionable to me except as to the proviso. I wish to know if it is in order now, before the amendment is acted upon, to move to strike out the proviso. Is that a proper motion to make?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon proposes an amendment striking out a proviso in the committee's amendment and inserting what he has sent to the Chair.

Mr. PLUMB. My difficulty arises from the fact that it is usual in the Senate, acting as in Committee of the Whole, to adopt first the committee amendment, and I think that would be better in this instance, and then let the Senator from Oregon propose his amendment to the bill as it will then stand. I am not particular about that, but I object to the proviso incorporated in the amendment of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. DOLPH. I do not understand the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. PLUMB. I will move to strike out the proviso in the amendment of the Senator from Oregon. It is in the language following:

Provided, That the price of the even-numbered sections within the limits of said grant and adjacent to and coterminous with the uncompleted portions of said road, and not embraced within the limits of said grant for the completed portions of said road is hereby reduced to $1.25 per acre.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas will perceive that the amendment which he proposes now would be an amendment in the third degree. The proposition before the Senate is an amendment reported from the Committee on Public Lands, which is open to amendment, and an amendment is pending to that amendment, proposed by the Senator from Oregon. An amendment in the third degree would not now be in order.

Mr. PLUMB. I did not want to lose my right to move the amendment by submitting to the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Oregon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the amendment of the Senator from Oregon shall prevail, then it will be perfectly in order for the Senator in the Senate to move to strike out the proviso.

Mr. PLUMB. The trouble is in this case that the amendment of the Senator from Oregon strikes out the proviso reported by the committee in line 14 and following, and that proviso, I think, ought not to be stricken out. I do not object to a portion of what the Senator proposes to insert, but I do object to what he proposes to strike out of the report of the committee. Therefore, I am put in the attitude of asking the Senate to vote down the entire amendment, which I do not wish to do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is still of the opinion that the proposition as made by the Senator from Kansas would not be in order, being an amendment in the third degree. The Senator can vote against the pending amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. But I do not wish to vote against the amendment, nor do I wish to lose the proviso reported by the committee for very good reasons, which I shall submit to the Senate; and if that be stricken out for the purpose of inserting provisions which are proper in connection with some things that are improper, then I can not move to reinsert that which has been stricken out. I should like to have some way of procedure devised whereby this matter can be voted upon separately; that is to say, the question of striking out the proviso from line 14 to 16, reported by the committee, and then the propositions contained in the amendment of the Senator from Oregon separately, of which there are two.

Mr. SLATER. I would suggest to my colleague that in order to accommodate the Senator from Kansas he withhold his amendment until the Senate pass, in Committee of the Whole, upon the amendment of the Committee on Public Lands, and then offer his amendment in the Senate. That will give an opportunity to the Senator from Kansas to amend the amendment, which he can not now do.

Mr. PLUMB. If the Senator from Oregon who made this motion includes in it a motion to strike out so much of the committee's amendment as is found in the proviso, then I shall have to vote against the entire amendment, for I conceive that the amendment as a whole would be mischievous.

Mr. DOLPH. Striking out the proviso as reported by the Committee on Public Lands and inserting the proviso contained in the amendment offered by me is the vital part of my amendment.

I have been attempting to show that the character of these lands is such, that if their price in the absence of the construction of a road is now made two dollars and a half an acre, double the minimum price, it will retard the settlement of the lands and the growth of the country, and I see no reason for carving out a strip of land in that State through a mountainous, broken, timbered country, not desirable for settlement, and fixing the price thereof at two dollars and a half an acre, while the price of all the other public domain in the State not embraced in the limits of a grant is a dollar and a quarter an acre. I think this is an exceptional case. I think the lands embraced in the limits of this grant are not worth more than a dollar and a quarter an acre. As I have said before, their settlement must necessarily be slow, and I think and I know my colleague agrees with me in that opinion, that the price of these lands ought not to be increased, but ought to be the same as it was before the grant was made. Therefore I say that the striking out of the proviso which I propose to strike out of the bill reported by the committee and the insertion of the proviso in my amendment are both vital and important, so as to secure the fixing of the price of all these lands at a dollar and a quarter an acre, the same as all the other public lands within the borders of the State. If there had been a railroad constructed, if these lands had been benefited by the construction of a road already constructed, I would make no objection to the increase of the price to two dollars and a half an acre. I hope that the Senate will sustain the amendment as it is offered.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator from Oregon is either oblivious of the point I made or he does not wish to disembarrass his amendment of the objectionable feature in order to obtain that which is without objection. I do not care to enter into a discussion of it, except to show to the Senate that his amendment, while some of it is good enough, when taken altogether is one which ought not to receive the favorable consideration of the Senate.

Mr. DOLPH. I should be glad to assent to anything that does not prevent me from having the amendment voted on. I understand if the bill as reported by the Committee on Public Lands be adopted the Senate will have voted for the committee's proviso, and I could not afterward move to strike it out. If the Senator will suggest any parliamentary course by which I can save my right to have a vote on the proposition to strike out the proviso of the bill as reported by the Committee on Public Lands and at the same time withdraw my amendment, I shall be most happy to do it.

Mr. PLUMB. That can be accomplished by withdrawing the amendment and moving to strike out the proviso reported by the Senate committee. If that is stricken out then the entire proviso of the Senator will be in order and probably be passed without any debate, but if the Senate shall adhere to that proviso then all except the proviso of the Senator's amendment would be in the same condition.

Mr. DOLPH. I have no objection to that course, and I withdraw the amendment temporarily for that purpose, and instead of it I move to strike out the proviso reported by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon withdraws the amendment proposed by him, and moves to amend the amendment of the Committee on Public Lands by striking out the proviso, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out the proviso in lines 14, 15, and 16 of the committee's amendment, as follows:

Provided, That the price of the lands so forfeited and restored shall be the same as heretofore fixed for the even-numbered sections within said grant.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, under this grant, as under all similar grants of public lands which have been made heretofore, the price of the sections retained by the Government was advanced to two dollars and a half an acre. If we were to restore the lands granted to this railroad company to the public domain without making any regulation in regard to the price at which they should be sold, we should have the spectacle of the Government asking $1.25 per acre for one section of land, and $2.50 for the adjoining section of land, without there being any perceptible difference or any ascertainable difference in their quality or their value. Therefore some action is necessary to unify the price; that is to say, the Government must either reduce the price of the land it has heretofore held at $2.50 an acre, being the alternate sections which it retained within the limits of the grant, or it must raise the price of the land which it now takes from the railroad company and restores to the public domain. Under either one of these operations there would be a uniform price.

If nothing is done but the forfeiture of this grant and the restoration of the land to the public domain, then the land restored, as I before said, would be sold at a dollar and a quarter an acre, as the land which had before belonged to the Government and within the limits of the same grant would be sold at two dollars and a half an acre. The committee adopted the plan of raising the price of the land to be restored to the public domain by means of the forfeiture to two dollars and a half an acre, the price at which the Government held lands which it had not granted and which were within the limits of the grant, and that was for the reason, in the first place, that there has been a large enhancement of the value of public lands. That, however, is the most inconsiderable of the reasons which operated on the committee, as I believe—certainly on my own mind. But there are persons who have purchased lands within the limits of the railroad grant from the sections which the Government retained the title to, paying therefor two dollars and a half an acre. Many of these purchases were made years ago. It is true the Senator from Oregon says there are very few such cases within the limits of this grant. But whatever number there may be, the moment we pass the bill with the amendment of the Senator from Oregon reducing the price of all the lands to a dollar and a quarter an acre, those persons who have heretofore purchased will have a good claim in equity upon Congress to repay to them a dollar and a quarter an acre in order to put them upon an equal footing with the persons who may purchase hereafter. That class of cases, as the members of the Committee on Public Lands very well know, is largely increasing, and it constitutes a claim of no mean proportions in regard to the amount of money at stake and is of a great deal of force from an equitable standpoint.

But the Senator from Oregon says that this land is not specially valuable, and that it would retard the settlement of that country if we were to fix the price at $2.50 an acre. In making that statement he entirely overlooks the fact that we do not touch the homestead law at all; that the man who wants the land for actual settlement, within the fair meaning of the public land laws of the United States, has only to go upon the land and settle and live there the requisite time to obtain the land for nothing.

Mr. DOLPH. If it does not trouble the Senator from Kansas to be interrupted, I should like to ask him a question: Would it not increase the fees to be paid by settlers for taking a homestead settlement? Would it not double the price of their lands if they were to commute their homesteads?

Mr. PLUMB. A commuted homestead is not a homestead. A commuted homestead is a pre-emption entry, and that is all there is of it. The moment a man performs the act called commutation under the general land laws he simply becomes a pre-emptor in place of a homesteader. He changes the entry from a homestead entry to a pre-emption entry.

The Committee on Public Lands have heretofore voted to report a bill, which is on the Calendar of the Senate, to repeal the pre-emption law entirely. They believe with the Commissioner of the General Land Office and with the Secretary of the Interior that the pre-emption law as it is now administered, and as it is bound to be administered, is the shelter for fraud in the entry of public lands. The Commissioner of the General Land Office has stated repeatedly in his reports to the Secretary of the Interior, and these statements have been indorsed by the Secretary of the Interior himself, that more of these entries were fraudulent than genuine, and that the system did not result in putting settlers upon the public domain, but did result in a speculation in the public domain of a character which has heretofore and always in point of fact been the subject of animadversion as against the spirit and intent of the public land laws of the United States. Now we leave in full force and vigor the homestead law, which permits every citizen of the United States who has not had this privilege to go upon the public lands and by making a genuine, bona fide homestead entry, that is, by making a home upon this land obtain a title for nothing. If a person does not want to make a home on the public lands I do not think he ought to have them, at least such as are proper to be acquired for that purpose; and if he does want to make a home on the public lands, how can he say it is a hardship to him to be required to live in that home for the space of five years, or, if he has been a soldier of the United States, live upon it five years minus the time which he served in the Union Army? Certainly he can not say that.

Then we come back to this proposition, that if the experience of the General Land Office is correct, or is correctly reported, the only benefit of the reduction of the price of these lands to a dollar and a quarter an acre would be to give the people who want to speculate on the public domain the benefit of speculation at that low price. Now, if there is to be a speculation in the public domain at all, I want it to be such a speculation as the Government will derive some benefit from, and I think the imposition of two dollars and a half an acre for pre-emption entries would largely tend to prevent speculation in the public domain and confine the settlements within the limits of this grant, or wherever else that rule was applied to persons who wanted to make homes upon the lands and were willing to manifest that intention to make a home by living on the land for five years.

As I said before, there is certainly no hardship in that; and if the public domain is to remain in fact for the purpose of settlement not only some measure as drastic as this, but some one of greater force, some one prohibiting legislative enterprise, will have to be passed in order to save what is left of the public domain from the grasp of speculators, who under the pretense of settlement make a nominal compliance with the land laws of the United States by means whereof they obtain large areas of the public domain. It is a notorious fact that in all portions of the West where lands adjoining water courses are valuable, and where that water is valuable by reason of the fact that it adjoins pasture lands, under the operation of the pre-emption act, and not by actual settlement but by the use of temporary expedient, cattle companies and persons seeking the use of cattle ranges without cost have made locations through the interventions of employés and others by the payment of a dollar and a quarter an acre and get the title and cut everybody else off from the water, thereby appropriating to themselves great fringes on either side of these streams which otherwise they would not be able to obtain.

If there is any virtue at all in the public land laws, if there is any virtue at all in the principle that there should be lands for the landless and homes for those who want homes on the public lands, it is to be found embodied in the homestead law—not necessarily the homestead law as it is now, but in the principle involved in the homestead law and in such wise and judicious amendments of that law as shall make it more stringent and more adequate to the requirements of the spirit of the law, which is that no man shall acquire title to the public domain unless he actually makes a home upon the land, not a home in name, not a home under a contract with somebody else to part with the legal title as soon as he has acquired the entry, but a home permanently, a home for a term of years; and that is the view the committee had in mind when it adopted this amendment, and also the view which it had in mind when it reported the bill repealing the pre-emption law; and in addition to that, as I said before, the idea of preventing the bringing in here of claims for compensation, or for the repayment of one-half the money that has been paid heretofore by men who, by reason of this land having been within railroad limits, have paid two dollars and a half an acre for it, and who would have a right to claim it if we opened up all the remainder of this great area at a dollar and a quarter an acre.

On these two grounds, involving, as I think, materially the administration of the public land laws of the United States, involving the retention to some extent of the remaining portion of the public domain to settlement only, the Public Lands Committee acted, after due consideration, not only in one case but in two or three and perhaps in half a dozen of them, as under their responsibility it seems to me they only could act; and therefore I think that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon to strike out this proviso should not prevail.

I will read from the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, the last report not as elaborate as the former one, what is said about the question of fraud under the guise of pre-emptions.

Mr. MORGAN. Before the Senator proceeds to read what he has before him, I should like to ask him whether the lands in this railroad grant are subject to private entry.

Mr. PLUMB. I think they are not subject to private entry. That was a matter which was discussed in the committee, and information was obtained, or at all events it was alleged to have been obtained, from the General Land Office that no portion of these lands were lands that were subject to private entry, but they could only be acquired for the purpose of pre-emption except so far as they are timber lands, and those come under another provision of the statute, or stone lands, each of which character of lands is entitled to be purchased at a price irrespective of the question of settlement.

Mr. DOLPH. I will state in regard to that matter that prior to the date of the grant some portion of these lands had been for several years open to private entry at a dollar and a quarter an acre; but I understand that the Land Office holds (whether correctly or not I am not able to state) that having now been withdrawn from the market, should the grant be forfeited and the lands again restored to the public domain, they will not again be subject to private entry until they have been offered at public sale, and that it is not now the policy of the Interior Department to offer lands at public sale. Consequently there is no danger that they will be restored to private entry.

Mr. PLUMB. The report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office for 1883, upon the subject of "fraudulent pre-emption entries," is as follows:

Large numbers of fraudulent pre-emption entries have been and are being made by parties either for their own benefit or the benefit of others who furnish the money to them for that purpose. The reports of agents show that gangs of men, ranging from ten to fifty, are often employed to make as many entries; that these men are hired at so much a head for that purpose; and that they do not hesitate to perjure themselves in supplying proofs for each other showing that the law has been complied with in every particular. Such violations of law occur in many localities.

And the Secretary in his report for the same year says as follows:

The Commissioner again renews his recommendation that the pre-emption law be repealed. He says:

"In my last annual report I renewed the recommendation frequently made by my predecessors that the pre-emption law be repealed.

"Continued experience demonstrates the advisability and necessity of such repeal.

"The objection that much good has heretofore resulted from the pre-emption system, and that it should not be discontinued because abused, appears to me without good foundation under the changed conditions created by the homestead law.

"Before the homestead system was adopted the only method by which unoffered public lands could be obtained by settlers was by pre-emption. All the advantages of the pre-emption system are now embraced in the homestead laws. The same lands can be entered upon the same conditions and proofs and the payment of the same price under the homestead law as under the pre-emption law.

"We have simply a double system for the same purpose, employing two sets of machinery, two agencies of adjustment, and a duplication of records, when only one is required. The administration of the law would be simplified and the labor and expense lessened by a discontinuance of the now unnecessary system of pre-emption."

It may be asked why the committee in this particular case did not report in favor of restoring this land to entry under the homestead law only. That was for the reason that we had to deal with a great many grants, and it was thought that unless we could apply some general rule to the entire public lands of the United States we should not apply any; that is to say, we should not apply this provision to this grant and then refuse to apply it to the remaining public lands not embraced in any grant; and, therefore, we decided to relieve the Government from the possibility of the presentation of the character of claims that I have spoken of, and at the same time to put this obstruction in the way of fraudulent pre-emption entries. In addition to that, it was understood that the committee had already acted upon the question in a general bill and that that would be ample for that purpose. Therefore the committee did that which it deemed proper in this particular case and in pursuance of its general idea of limiting the entries under the pre-emption system and of actually or substantially confining them to the homestead law.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I do not desire to occupy more than a moment. I think the Senator from Kansas is mistaken in supposing that the Committee on Public Lands has reported in favor of the repeal of the pre-emption law. My recollection is that such a bill has not yet been reported. I am ready to vote for the repeal of that law at any time. Such repeal will affect all the public domain of the United States; but I am not in favor of repealing the law as the Dutchman cut off his dog's tail, by inches. I am not in favor of repealing the law as to this particular grant, as to a strip of land through the State of Oregon, and leaving it in force over all the other public lands in the State. In view of the character of the land that would be an injustice to settlers. The effect of increasing the price of the odd-numbered sections to two dollars and a half and leaving the price of all the even-numbered sections at two dollars and a half would be to increase the fees to be paid by homestead settlers to double the price of their land if they commuted their homesteads, and to double the price of land to all settlers under the pre-emption act. That would be a provision against the settler as to this particular strip of land. I think it would be safe to wait until Congress does repeal the pre-emption act and let the repeal take effect on all public lands of the United States. It appears to me that what has been said in regard to the frauds under the pre-emption act is hardly relevant to the question under discussion now, and, as I said before, I hope that the Senate will not increase the price of these lands. The road has not been built. The lands have not been benefited by the grant. There is no reason in the world why the price should be more than that of adjacent public lands or than the price was before the grant was made. The proviso in question was reported by the committee against the wishes and judgment of both my colleague and myself.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It seems to me that whenever lands are held for so long a period out of the public domain and kept from sale they must advance in value. It seems reasonable that when they are returned back to the public domain they ought to be in the same condition as other lands, provided they have not increased very greatly in value. Sometimes particular sections of land which are held out of the market have advanced to fifteen, thirty, or forty dollars per acre. I would ask the committee if all this difficulty might not be obviated by putting a proviso in the bill that these lands shall be put up at public sale, and if they do not bring beyond the Government price, then they shall be open to entry at a dollar and a quarter an acre to everybody. I ask the Senator from Kansas, who is perfectly familiar with this whole question, and is chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, if such a proviso would not obviate the whole difficulty—first put them up at public auction, and if they do not bring beyond the Government price, open them all at a dollar and a quarter an acre?

Mr. PLUMB. That is a practice which once obtained, and not with advantage either to the public domain or to the settlers. It resulted in plastering the public domain with land-warrants and withdrawing large areas from the opportunity of settlement. So far as I am concerned, I am not in favor of disposing of any acre of the public domain anywhere to anybody except it be to an actual settler, as far as the title goes. and I do not believe that it would be wise to put up these public lands or any other public lands to public sale. The Government has not disposed of its public domain, for many years at least, with the idea of obtaining a revenue; and the view of the committee was not that the Government should obtain a revenue here, but that by putting these lands at a price of two dollars and a half an acre it would more nearly represent their actual value, and if any one should take them under the pre-emption law with the opportunities that affords for speculation he would have to pay that much more, at the same time leaving in operation the homestead law, whereby the person seeking an adjoining home bona fide on the public domain may have the lands without cost except the payment of the necessary fees.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Do not speculators, capitalists, buy up homestead entries?

Mr. PLUMB. They do not, because under the homestead law the lands are only subject to disposal under laws which require settlement. Such entries can not be purchased by any one who does not enter for actual settlement; but under the pre-emption law, requiring only settlement for six months, there can be a conspiracy covering that period of time, which actually occurs according to the reports, which enables men who do not actually make homes upon the lands to obtain title under the pretense of having made settlement. But if you require a settlement of five years the proof is not so easily made; the evidence is more tangible of the continued occupancy and cultivation such as is necessary to show that a man has actually made his home on the lands before he can acquire title.

Mr. SLATER. Mr. President, I only desire to say a word in relation to this amendment. I am entirely in accord with my colleague in regard to this, and hope his amendment will prevail. I should not, however, myself have offered it, because I agreed with the committee on their general proposition, which I think ought to be accepted in this particular case. I think, however, this is out of the line of the character of grants of lands on which it is desired to place the other principle. This land will not be sought for settlement, being on the slope of the mountains, and the Government may consider itself fortunate if even at a dollar and a quarter an acre it can dispose of it to settlers. The lands are in the interior, remote from access to thoroughfares, and the settler who goes there has many difficulties to encounter. The fact that the even-numbered sections have remained unbroken since the grant was made, although offered at two dollars and a half an acre, shows that until a different condition shall prevail there these lands will not be sought to any large extent for settlement.

I am anxious that the bill shall pass, and therefore do not wish to take up the time of the Senate in discussing it beyond the points absolutely necessary to be brought to the attention of the Senate. I hope we shall have a vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I concede that the arguments and statements made by both the Senators from Oregon are very persuasive to show that in this case the Senate might very well depart from the rule which the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands insists is the proper rule for the disposal of the public lands in general cases of forfeiture, but the Senate ought to be careful about this. It ought to be expressly understood here that this is an exceptional case, where the character of the country, on account of the very heavy forests which are upon it, is so unfavorable to settlement that the United States, with a view of encouraging settlement on these lands, can afford to price them down to a dollar and a quarter an acre.

A great many grants have been made to railroad companies and a great many lands have been disposed of by the Government of the United States on the even-numbered sections in different parts of the United States, and these grants are being assailed now in both Houses of Congress. If the right to the lands is declared to be forfeited by Congress, it would be a very dangerous thing for us to do to allow these lands to be disposed of to future settlers under pre-emption claims at a lower price than that fixed in the law making the grant, which is uniformly, I believe, two dollars and a half an acre. I am willing that this amendment should be adopted if it be understood that this is an exceptional case, and that the exception is well founded upon facts stated by the Senators from Oregon. This land has been a long time in market now on the even-numbered sections and practically the great body of public domain in that country is as yet unbroken. The principle which is stated by the chairman of the committee is a very just one and it ought to be observed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] to the amendment of the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PLUMB. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FRYE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER].

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—33.

Bowen,	Garland,	Maxey,	Sheffield,
Call,	Gorman,	Miller of Cal.,	Slater,
Camden,	Hampton,	Mitchell,	Vance,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hawley,	Palmer,	Walker,
Coke,	Jackson,	Pike,	Williams,
Conger,	Jones of Florida,	Platt,	Wilson.
Cullom,	Logan,	Sabin,
Dawes,	McMillan,	Sawyer,
Dolph,	Manderson,	Sewell,

NAYS—19.

Bayard,	Groome,	McPherson,	Ransom,
Beck,	Harris,	Morgan,	Saulsbury,
Blair,	Harrison,	Pendleton,	Sherman,
Brown,	Hill,	Plumb,	Van Wyck.
George,	Lamar,	Pugh,

ABSENT—24.

Aldrich,	Edmunds,	Hoar,	Mahone,
Allison,	Fair,	Ingalls,	Miller of N. Y.,
Butler,	Farley,	Jonas,	Morrill,
Cameron of Pa.,	Frye,	Jones of Nevada,	Riddleberger,
Cockrell,	Gibson,	Kenna,	Vest,
Colquitt,	Hale,	Lapham,	Voorhees.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment of the committee as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. DOLPH. Now I offer the rest of my amendment as an addition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon offers the amendment already read. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. PLUMB. I now move as a separate section what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is first on the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole. Does the Senator wish to move an amendment to that amendment?

Mr. PLUMB. No, sir; I wish to offer mine as a separate section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the question is on the amendment adopted as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] offers an amendment, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert as an additional section:

SEC. 2. That the act of March 3, 1875, entitled "An act for the relief of settlers within railroad limits," is hereby repealed.

Mr. PLUMB. I want to call attention to the fact that this matter has been discussed heretofore, and to the legislation that is proposed to be repealed. Chapter 196 of the laws of 1875 is as follows:

That where any actual settler who shall have paid for any lands situate within the limits of any grant of lands by Congress to aid in the construction of any railroad, the price of such lands being fixed by law at double-minimum rates, and such railroad lands having been forfeited to the United States and restored to the public domain for failure to build such railroad, such person or persons shall have the right to locate, on any unoccupied lands, an amount equal to their original entry, without further cost, except such fees as are now provided by law in pre-emption cases: Provided, That when such location is upon double-minimum lands, one-half the amount only shall be taken.

That is a very vicious form of speculation in the public domain; it gives to every person who has heretofore taken eighty acres of land within the limits of this railroad grant the right to a piece of scrip for eighty acres more locatable on any of the public lands in the United States without any condition of settlement, and that upon the theory that indemnity is due to these people. What is that indemnity? Certificates of that precise character now are selling in this city for $18 an acre, and that is given to a man under pretense that he has been deprived of the right to enter one hundred and sixty acres of land and limited to eighty. Indemnity for the eighty acres he did not get at the rate of $18 an acre.

But that is not the worst of it, because the question of value, as I hold, is of no practical consequence in considering the disposition of the public domain. The main difficulty is that it enables that man to locate his eighty-acre warrant or scrip upon any unoccupied portion of the public domain without settlement—timber land, and choice bottom land, or any other land he may find—the best of course that he can find; and under the operation of this ill-advised law as heretofore passed, assuming to deal with the soldiers, hundreds of thousands of acres of the public domain have been withdrawn from settlement and put into the pockets of speculators in the public domain under a system which will be aggravated really by permitting to remain in force this law while we are forfeiting railroad grants. The moment the bill now under consideration shall be passed there will be dozens, perhaps hundreds, of cases where men have entered only eighty acres of land within the limits of this railroad grant—land worth now two, three, four, five, or six, or perhaps ten times what was paid for it originally—who will be entitled to a scrip location of eighty acres of land on any portion of the public domain, worth $18 an acre at the moment the scrip is issued.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

Mr. CONGER. Now let the act proposed to be repealed by that amendment be read.

Mr. PLUMB. I read the law a moment ago, but will ask the Secretary to read it again.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

CHAP. 196.—An act for the relief of settlers on lands within railroad limits.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That where any actual settler who shall have paid for any lands situate within the limits of any grant of lands by Congress to aid in the construction of any railroad, the price of such lands being fixed by law at double-minimum rates, and such railroad lands having been forfeited to the United States and restored to the public domain for failure to build such railroad, such person or persons shall have the right to locate on any unoccupied lands an amount equal to their original entry, without further cost, except such fees as are now provided by law in pre-emption cases: Provided, That when such location is upon double-minimum lands one-half the amount only shall be taken.

Approved March 3, 1875.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, whether this amendment is right or wrong, it ought not to be attached to a private bill or to a bill relating only to a particular portion of the lands of the United States, and passed and become a law without any further discussion than it has received. In my opinion the effect of repealing that provision of law, if I understand it aright, will be, where soldiers have located on railroad lands with the expectation of receiving the benefit of a railroad near to or through the lands where they have located, when the Government takes back the lands and prevents the railroad being built, to leave those soldiers with their eighty acres of land instead of one hundred and sixty. Whether it reaches that case or not it at least reaches this case: Where citizens have bought land and paid 20 shillings an acre in anticipation of the benefit of a railroad, to which the other half of a certain body of land was given, when the Government recalls that grant, takes away the land, prevents the building of the railroad, it keeps the money, the 20 shillings an acre, of the settler who has paid that double price for some prospective advantage, keeps the money that has been given for eighty acres, which would have bought one hundred and sixty, prevents the company from building the road at all, and prevents any indemnity land or increased number of acres of land being granted. I think it will work great hardship to the soldiers; I think it will work great hardship to the settlers.

I do not know what kind of scrip is issued in such cases. If there is a kind of scrip issued that will enable the holder of the scrip to go far away from the lands he already has, from that Territory, from that district, and pick up more valuable lands elsewhere, there may be something wrong in it, something which would require legislation; but here, on what might almost be called a private bill, a bill to repeal a grant of land to a certain company, to take away all the rights of the soldier and all the rights of settlers who paid double price for their land with the expectation of profiting by the building of the railroad for which the lands were given, I think it wrong. I do not think that is legislation in favor of the citizen and the settler who has gone and occupied these wild lands in advance of the building of railroads.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to make in this connection one further remark.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the Senator will proceed.

Mr. CONGER. While I am willing to vote for an amendment of the general law or to change its provisions so as to avoid abuses, I shall vote against the amendment of the Senator from Kansas on this almost private local bill.

Mr. PLUMB. I think if the Senator from Indiana——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas will allow the Chair to lay before the Senate the pending bill, the title of which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The unfinished business is the bill (S. 1682) to enable the people of that part of the Territory of Dakota south of the forty-sixth parallel of north latitude to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of the State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask the Senator from Indiana if he will not consent to have the special order laid aside, if that suits the convenience of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], who, I believe, is entitled to the floor? I think we shall vote on this land bill in the course of fifteen or twenty minutes at the outside, or perhaps sooner.

Mr. VEST. I shall not object.

Mr. HARRISON. I would not care to do that without some limit as to the time which this railroad bill is to have.

Mr. PLUMB. Say not later than half past 2 o'clock. I think it can be disposed of in ten or fifteen minutes.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Debate is by unanimous consent.

Mr. BECK. I have a right, I suppose, to object to unanimous consent being given to continue this matter; and, if I may be allowed to give the reason why, I will state that I desire to hear a little more fully the effect of the amendment now offered by the Senator from Kansas, and I do not think it can be disposed of in ten minutes. Therefore I would like it to go over until it can be discussed. I think that every word the Senator from Kansas said is true about allowing the men who have paid for land inside the grant to get scrip and enter land wherever they can. They will locate land where the scrip is worth a hundred dollars an acre, for scrip of that character is being sought for all over the country. This amendment, or something like it, ought to be passed. I would rather give the settlers money for their land than to give them scrip, which can be located on a military reservation or elsewhere. I believe the whole Fort Snelling reservation, which embraces much of the city of Minneapolis, was taken up by just that character of scrip.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent to continue the consideration of the railroad bill. Is there objection?

Mr. CONGER. I think on further consideration I must object.

Mr. BECK. I have objected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the Dakota bill is before the Senate.

Mr. GARLAND. Let the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas be printed.

Mr. PLUMB. This matter has been the subject of some discussion now, and I want to ask the Senate to proceed with the consideration of the bill at this time. It is an important measure. It has to receive the concurrence of the House of Representatives to become a law. The objection which the Senator from Michigan has made I can dispose of in a moment, I think, to his own satisfaction. The class about whom we are so solicitous are not concerned in the matter, because no soldier was ever prevented taking one hundred and sixty acres within railroad limits. I move now that the Senate proceed with the consideration of this bill.

Mr. HARRISON. I hope the Senator from Kansas will not undertake to displace the Dakota bill by a vote of the Senate at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask the Chair when the bill will come up again?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. With the leave of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] the Senator from Kansas can gain the floor and submit a motion to postpone the pending bill and take up another bill.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not wish to inconvenience the Senator from Missouri at all, but I wish to know when this bill will come up next in order as the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that it has no priority.

Mr. PLUMB. Then I will not consent, so far as I am concerned, that it shall be permanently displaced. I must, therefore, move to lay aside the pending business.

Mr. BECK. I made the objection. I thought it would come up to-morrow, and I desired time until to-morrow to look into the amendment. If it does not come up to-morrow I shall withdraw my objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that the railroad bill can only come up on motion to-morrow during the morning hour as it did this morning. It has no priority; but it may be called up on motion at any time during the consideration of bills under Rule VIII.

Mr. HOAR. I inquire of the Chair whether it would not be in the power of a majority of the Senate to take this bill up at any time to-morrow after the reading of the Journal?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Certainly, on motion.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask that this be the order on the conclusion of the morning business to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas asks that the bill (H. R. 181) to declare forfeiture of certain lands granted to aid in the construction of a railroad in Oregon be made the special order at the conclusion of the morning business to-morrow. Is there objection to that proposition? The Chair hears none, and that will be the order of the Senate.

Mr. GARLAND. Let the pending amendment be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed.

CAPTURED AND ABANDONED PROPERTY SUITS.

Mr. BROWN. Before the regular order is proceeded with I ask the indulgence of the Senator from Missouri for a moment while I make a motion. Yesterday a bill introduced by me (S. 64) to authorize suits in the Court of Claims in certain cases therein mentioned was postponed indefinitely. I rose and asked for the yeas and nays on that motion, but I was too hoarse to be heard over the Chamber, and the indefinite postponement took place. I desire to be heard on that bill, and I ask unanimous consent that the action of the Senate taken yesterday be reconsidered and that the bill be placed on the Calendar to be called up at another time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia asks unanimous consent of the Senate that the vote indefinitely postponing the bill named by him be reconsidered and that the bill be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. CONGER. Let the title of the bill be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The title of the bill will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 64) to authorize suits in the Court of Claims in certain cases therein mentioned.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the request of the Senator from Georgia will be considered as agreed to.

Mr. GARLAND. It was on my motion that this bill was postponed indefinitely, and I called the attention of the Senator from Georgia at the time. I am perfectly willing that the whole matter shall be reconsidered and the bill stand on the Calendar.

Mr. BROWN. That is all I ask.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order is made.

GALVESTON HARBOR IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. COKE. I desire to give notice that to-morrow I shall ask the Senate to take up the bill (S. 1652) to provide for the improvement of the channel between Galveston Harbor and the Gulf of Mexico, with a view to make it the special order for Thursday, January 8, at 2 o'clock.

Mr. CULLOM. What is the Senator's motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas gives notice of a motion in regard to a certain bill.

Mr. CULLOM. I only rise to state that I shall not allow anything to interfere with the consideration of the special order for to-morrow at 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri is entitled to the floor on the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 1682.

ADMISSION OF DAKOTA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1682) to enable the people of that part of the Territory of Dakota south of the forty-sixth parallel of north latitude to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of the State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I do not propose, induced or tempted by any intimation or insinuation coming from any quarter, to be swerved from my honest judgment and conscientious conviction in regard to the bill pending before the Senate. The intimation that the motives which influence myself or any of my colleagues in opposition to this bill arise from partisan feeling is not sustained by anything that has happened in the history of this measure, which has been continuously before the Senate for thirteen years.

I do not pretend that I am not a partisan. I am devoted to the principles and the organization of the Democratic party, to which I belong. I would assert nothing unusual—I would confess to nothing that has ever been held disgraceful in the history of the admission of States into this Union—if I did state to-day that I come into this discussion as a member of the Democratic party and as a Democratic Senator. Even in the better days of the Republic, when men whose names are now historic and whose fame belongs to the world, not to this nation, were members of this body, no State was admitted, with but a few exceptions, except after a partisan struggle and after partisan debate.

But I have not considered this measure either as a member of the Committee on Territories or as a Senator from a partisan standpoint. I am here to discuss it without reference to its effect upon parties. I might fairly and honestly and logically answer any such insinuation or intimation by the simple statement that for twenty-four years Dakota and the other Territories of the Union have been under the tutelage, the political influences, of the Republican party exclusively; that Federal patronage, the prestige of success, almost historical success, has had its influence upon those Territories. I say what every public man now knows to be the truth when I assert that every Territory is influenced by the political complexion of the administration under which it exists. Under Democratic administrations the Territories have been Democratic; under Republican administrations they have been Republican. If I as a Democrat should openly avow here to-day that after twenty-four years of Republican rule, when the people of the United States have declared in favor of the party to which I belong, it would be only fair and just that for a few years Democratic influences and teaching should be permitted before this Territory should be admitted as a State, I would say that of which no honest man need be ashamed. But, sir, I am here to discuss this question which I have considered from almost the day I came into the Senate and went into the Committee on Territories upon facts and upon legitimate deductions and conclusions from those facts.

There is no limitation in the Constitution of the United States upon the power of Congress in regard to the admission of new States into the Union. The framers of the Constitution put no limitation upon our power. I believe that the spirit and intent of the Constitution is that no State should be admitted into the Union unless it has at least the ratio of population which would give it a Representative in the popular branch of Congress. When the Constitution says that population and representation shall be in a just ratio to each other, I hold that although there is no express limitation upon the power of Congress, the spirit and intent of that provision is as I have stated. It is absolute injustice to the people of the rest of the Union when a State is admitted with two Senators upon this floor and at least one Representative in the House of Representatives, if it has not at the time the ratio which would give it a Representative in the popular branch of Congress.

In the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress, on behalf of the minority of the Committee on Territories, I had the honor to submit a report in regard to a bill which is identical, with one or two exceptions, with the measure now pending before the Senate. The reasons which the minority gave then in opposition to that measure apply equally to the bill pending before the Senate to-day, and I ask the Chief Clerk to read what I have marked in that report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GARLAND in the chair). The Chief Clerk will read from the report as indicated by the Senator from Missouri.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

It is certainly the theory and object of our Constitution that representation should be equal, so far as possible, between the citizens of the United States. In section 2 of the Constitution it is provided that "Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within the Union according to their respective numbers," &c., and in section 2 of article 14 of the amendments to the Constitution it is provided that "Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers," &c. These provisions manifestly apply to representation in the House of Representatives, and to States after they are admitted into the Union. Section 3 of article 4 of the Constitution provides that "new States may be admitted by the Congress into the Union," and this enactment leaves to the absolute and unlimited discretion of Congress the decision when the people within a certain Territory shall receive not only their equal representation with other citizens of the Union in the House of Representatives and coequal representation with the other States in the Senate, but also the right to appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress.

While no other provision is found in the Constitution as to the admission of new States than that before quoted, and no law or rule binds or limits the action of Congress, it would be a manifest violation of the spirit and intendment of the Constitution to admit a State into the Union without at least the population requisite under the existing law of apportionment for a Representative in the lower House of Congress.

To give to a smaller number of people than that fixed by the general law of apportionment a representation in the House would be to establish unequal representation; nor is the number of people in a Territory applying for admission as a State the only question to be considered by Congress. While there should be at least the population required by the general apportionment, and this without question, justice to the other States and other citizens of the United States requires that Congress should consider the necessity for creating a new State, the character of the population, and its probable future.

To ignore these considerations would be simply an abdication by Congress of its high constitutional discretion, and the placing in its stead the enumeration of a census. In our representative Government, based upon universal suffrage, every State and every citizen is directly interested in the question of admitting a new State into the Union—not only as to the simple inquiry in regard to the aggregate of population so admitted, but as to its character and probable influence upon the common destiny of all the States; for it is manifest that the danger to free institutions lies after all in vicious suffrage and its corollary of vicious representation. Besides, if Congress should look only to the amount of population, it is evident how shamefully party greed and ambition could, by filling up the sparsely settled Territories, swell the vote of the electoral college to any number required for party purposes.

In the earlier days of our history, when the great necessity seemed to be population, and when a continent offered its vast domain for settlement, precedents in Congressional action as to the admission of new States can be found at variance with the principles here stated. Out of the twenty-five States admitted into the Union since the adoption of the Constitution, six have been admitted without the ratio of population demanded by the existing apportionment for a member in the House of Representatives, but it must be remembered that the generally accepted proverb that "in numbers there is strength" then governed the action of Congress over and above all other considerations. Our vast domain seemed illimitable in its capacity for population, and it was only natural that Congress should regard with favor every proposition looking to the increase of the number of those who could develop the resources of the immense territory only awaiting the enterprise and toil of the pioneer. The tide of immigration now pouring upon us from all portions of the world has made the matter of population simply one of conjecture, and we must regard it only as a question of time when every foot of our vast possessions will be occupied and utilized.

There is no necessity now for rushing new States into the Union, unless that necessity is one of party. The welfare of the country does not require it, and unless there are exceptional reasons for admitting into the Union a sparsely settled Territory, the number of its population a matter of surmise, Congress should at least look with suspicion upon the hot haste with which the measure is being urged.

The area of the proposed State is 80,000 square miles, or 320,000 quarter sections of 160 acres each, or 51,200,000 acres; and upon this immense territory the friends of the measure claim that there is now a population of 175,000.

In 1880 the census enumeration showed within the limits of the proposed State a population of 100,500, including Indians, and as there has been no enumeration since, the increase to "175,000" is simply a matter of computation, based upon land office entries and the assessed value of property.

Mr. VEST. I have had this portion of the report of the minority of the Committee on Territories read principally in answer to the position of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON], that the precedents existing in the legislation of the American Congress on the admission of new States were in favor of his declaration and his argument, that not even the ratio of representation required for a member of Congress in the popular branch was necessary or should be adopted as a rule in regard to the admission of new States into the Union.

Not even the spirit of prophecy, if it had been given our fathers when they made the Constitution of '89, could have forecast or foreseen the wonderful development of the country west of the Mississippi River, the unequaled rapidity with which that vast area has been settled up, and new communities brought into existence as if by magic. Conditions and circumstances have changed so radically since the past action of Congress in regard to the admission of States east of the Mississippi that no rule can be properly or logically instituted upon these precedents. As stated in the report which has just been read, the great idea then of the men who were upon the Atlantic seaboard was that centuries must elapse before the unbroken wilderness in the West could be populated and civilized. It requires a stretch of imagination to place ourselves in the position of the men who were legislating then for this virgin continent, whose conditions and circumstances have altered so much to-day. They did not dream, and could not have dreamed, that in a century 800,000 emigrants would yearly be poured from the continent of Europe upon our shores. They did not dream of the discovery of gold; they did not imagine even the existence of the great area of country now given over to the grazing of cattle, and the great American desert to-day blooming and blossoming like the rose.

All these things render the precedents quoted by the Senator from Indiana utterly inapplicable and illogical. To-day we do not need new States in order to strengthen the Union, in order to give us power at home or prestige abroad. To-day the great problem of the people and statesmen of the United States is how to meet the vast increase of population that is coming to us and the strain necessarily put upon our peculiar form of government, a form of government composite between State and Federal power, and without any precedent in the history of the entire world.

The circumstances surrounding our fathers were altogether different from those which surround us to-day. Now the question before us is what is the necessity for rushing new States into the Union? Ay, Mr. President, and more, what is the necessity, with thirty-eight sovereign States already in existence, of dividing up a Territory across which there is no natural dividing line, no range of impassable mountains, no deep or navigable river, a country which God has cemented together, and which is as much homogeneous as He has made any portion of the American continent.

The proposition here to-day is to divide the Territory of Dakota, to cut it in two, under some great and overruling necessity which I have never yet heard explained either in committee-room or upon this floor, to make two States, when there are already States of the Union larger in area than that of this entire Territory.

This proposition was brought into Congress in 1871. It has been pressed at every session with all sorts of argument and with all sorts of rhetoric. In 1876 the proposition passed the Senate, and it passed it by no party vote. The very same reasons that influenced Republican Senators then to vote against this bill exists to-day, the anomaly of dividing a Territory sparsely settled, with barely, if at all, the requisite population for a Representative in Congress. The bill passed the Senate in 1876 by no party vote, as I shall proceed to show. The vote in the Senate at that time, in 1876, in favor of the bill was Messrs. ALLISON, Bogy, Burnside, CAMERON of Wisconsin, Christiancy, COCKRELL, Cragin, Ferry, Hamilton, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, McCreery, McDonald, MCMILLAN, Mitchell, MORRILL, Oglesby, Paddock, Patterson, RANSOM, SHERMAN, Spencer, West, Windom, Withers, and Wright. Those voting in the negative were Messrs. Anthony, BAYARD, Boutwell, Conkling, Cooper, Davis, DAWES, Eaton, EDMUNDS, Frelinghuysen, Kernan, Key, Merrimon, Sargent, SAULSBURY, Stevenson, Thurman, Wallace, and Whyte. The Senate did not divide on party lines.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me to interrupt him? I did not hear his statement as to what the bill was on which the vote he has just read was taken. My attention was diverted.

Mr. VEST. It was a bill dividing the Territory of Dakota and admitting the southern portion of it, the proposition which is now pending before the Senate. Of course the provisions were not identical in the different sections, but that was the leading and salient idea of the bill, and it passed in 1876 by the vote which I have read. The opposition to it then on the part of leading Republican Senators in this body was the idea of dividing the Territory, when no good or valid reason could be shown for it. The very same influences were at work then that are at work here to-day, and they have been at work during the six years I have been in the Senate of the United States. Dakota labored then under the difficulty of Senators on this side of the Chamber to-day. There were more pegs than there were holes to put them in. In the southern part of the Territory was the city or town of Yankton, filled with adventurous politicians, who had been sent there by the Federal Government to hold Territorial offices. Fargo sprang up under the wheat emigration to the Red River of the North and became the rival to Yankton, and it became the nucleus of another set of ambitious politicians sent there to hold office in that portion of the Territory. The actual influx of emigration had not filled up the intermediate space between the projected North Pacific Railroad and the territory around Yankton and the Black Hills, and the result was that men ambitious to locate the government upon conjectural town sites, men who were rivals of each other both in the race for political power and wealth, men who were anxious to cut each other's throats politically and physically, in order to reach their own ambitious and personal ends, clutched each other by the throat; and they have been struggling and fighting from 1870 down to this hour as to whether one or the other faction should control that Territory and hold the offices.

General Grant is credited with a remark in regard to Dakota which I have from a gentleman who heard it from his own lips. When the secretary of state of Dakota was killed by a rival politician in a contest over a State or Territorial office, General Grant is credited with having said that Dakota gave him more trouble than all the other Territories in the Union put together; that the trouble was there were two streets in Yankton, and when one street got through a measure the other street rebelled; that the Territory divided upon those two streets, and that it required the Army and the civic power of the United States to preserve peace between the warring factions. That is the simple and the entire trouble to-day. There is not upon this continent a more homogeneous tract of territory than the Territory of Dakota. It is homogeneous in climate, homogeneous in soil, homogeneous in population. There is no line of mountains, there is no river, there is nothing to divide them except political ambition and personal rivalry.

Why, sir, take the State of Missouri. Missouri has running through its center a great river, the Missouri River, from east to west, dividing it absolutely and geographically from one side to the other. Missouri was admitted as one State; and to-day is there any North Missouri or South Missouri? To-day is there any division which engenders antagonistic feeling or interest between the two sections of the great State in which I live? Yet here is a Territory proposed to be a State which asks Congress to run an imaginary line through its middle at the behest of a lot of politicians, with no honest demand as I really believe on the part of the people of that Territory; and the governor of the Territory says to the people of the United States that sentiment and feeling all run from east to west and not from north to south.

It has been asserted by the Senator from Indiana that no feeling, no opinion, existed in the Territory against this division, and he has said here in the most emphatic and aggressive manner that if any Senator proposed to complain on the part of anybody, either of the division or of the burdens of Statehood, it would puzzle that Senator to find any such expression on the part of any one within the Territory. The Senator further said that he was astonished to hear at the last session of Congress from some gentlemen living in Bismarck a feeble protest against the division of the Territory. I desire the Chief Clerk to read a document placed before the Committee on Territories by as respectable a delegation of influential and intellectual citizens as exist in the Territory. It is the statement, as I honestly believe, of a large majority of the people of the northern portion of the Territory in regard to the matter of a division, and, without supplementing a single remark, I will leave the Senate to say whether that instrument is a feeble protest or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the paper.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

To the honorable Committee on Territories of the Senate and House of Representatives:

Your attention is respectfully invited to the bill introduced in the Senate by Hon. ANGUS CAMERON, of Wisconsin, and in the House by Mr. MAGINNIS, entitled "A bill to enable the people of the Territory of Dakota to form a constitution."

Dakota is attracting more general attention than any of the other of the great Territories. This is due to various causes, among which may be mentioned her unprecedented development, caused by the large immigration during the last five years, and especially the past two years, and her applications to Congress to divide the Territory and admit a portion to Statehood, or to give some additional legislation necessary to protect and secure the personal and property rights of her citizens.

The question of the division of Dakota has been before Congress since 1871, when the bill was first introduced. At every session from that day to this the subject has been canvassed and decided adversely in one House or the other, although the strongest possible arguments have been presented in its favor. In 1876 the bill passed in the Senate by a vote of 31 to 19. Those voting in its favor were Messrs. ALLISON, Bogy, Burnside, CAMERON of Wisconsin, Christiancy, COCKRELL, Cragin, Ferry, Hamilton, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, JONES of Nevada, Kelly, McCreery, McDonald, MCMILLAN, Mitchell, MORRILL, Oglesby, Paddock, Patterson, RANSOM, SHERMAN, Spencer, West, Windom, Withers, and Wright.

Those voting "no" were Messrs. ANTHONY, BAYARD, Boutwell, Conkling, Cooper, Davis, DAWES, EATON, EDMUNDS, Frelinghuysen, Kernan, Key, Merrimon, Sargent, SAULSBURY, Stevenson, Thurman, Wallace, and Whyte.

Senator EDMUNDS was one of the leading opponents of the bill, and it will be seen it met with the almost solid opposition of the older States in the Union. The opposition was not on political grounds. Senators EDMUNDS, DAWES, Boutwell, and Conkling were found voting with Senators SAULSBURY, BAYARD, Thurman, EATON, and Kernan. They based their opposition upon higher ground than party or sectional advantage, and the causes that led them to oppose still exist.

The people have been, and now are, divided in their views as to whether the best interests of the Territory will be advanced by a division, and ultimately two States, or by admission as a whole as one State.

While the right of Congress to do what to them may seem best in regard to this matter is not questioned, it is believed that under the peculiar circumstances of this Territory it would be but justice to the 400,000 people, holding in the aggregate one hundred million dollars' worth of property, to give them an opportunity to express their sentiments upon a question which affects their interests so materially.

There are many questions bearing directly upon the matter which the citizens of the Territory ought to be permitted to settle for themselves, among which may be stated the just apportionment of the public debt, amounting to $400,000.

If the Territory is divided by Congress, what will be done with this? Will Congress apportion it? If so, upon what basis? Then there are seventy-two sections of land granted to the Territory for the university and the land granted for an agricultural college. These grants are to the whole Territory. Will Congress divide them or leave all to the old Territory? The question of boundary, if it is divided, will also be raised, and as an arbitrary line on the forty-sixth parallel will divide counties and farms, questions will arise in that respect. These are some of the questions which are of great interest to the people that should be left to them to settle for themselves. The bill now before you has this in view. It submits the whole subject to the people by giving authority to elect delegates to a convention, which will have authority to settle these questions so far as the people themselves are concerned.

If the bill is amended so as to provide that if the convention shall determine to divide the Territory, then only those delegates from that portion proposed to be erected into a State shall participate in the formation of the constitution for such State, and that the duties of the other delegates shall cease upon such decision, it will be fair and just, and it is believed the best settlement of this question, because it will give the people an opportunity to be heard for their own interest; and when they have given an expression of their views through the formation of a constitution for the whole or a part of the Territory, their action, whatever it may be, will be returned to Congress for approval, change, or modification, and the views of the people expressed in an authoritative manner will have been obtained.

Those believing in division have been represented in Washington at every session of Congress since the first introduction of the measure in Congress, and although every effort has been made by the friends of the measure it has failed, not because of opposition from those opposed to division in the Territory, but because of the opposition encountered in Congress, many of the leading men of both political parties opposing and voting against it. Although there has been at all times an earnest opposition to division in the Territory, those holding such views were willing to accept relief from the present condition of affairs in that form rather than not at all; but that having failed, they now ask that the voice of the people be heard upon this to them all-important question. But the causes that seemed to require division a few years ago have almost wholly disappeared.

When the division bill passed the Senate in 1876 it was shown that the average expense of the Territorial governments was but $27,266.87, and that 10,000 people in the north and 15,000 in the south demanded this consideration. It was shown that Mississippi with a population of but 8,850 was granted a Territorial organization; that Indiana had but 5,641 when organized; Michigan but 7,000; Wisconsin but 6,077; Washington but 1,201; Dakota but 4,837; Nevada but 6,857, and Arizona but 5,000

It was claimed that our population was sufficient in the light of these precedents to justify division. It was shown by the report of the committee and the speeches of the advocates of the measure that an uninhabited and, it was believed, uninhabitable region divided the two sections; that there were no wagon-roads or mail-routes connecting them, and no prospective railways; that members of the Legislature, United States marshals, and judges were compelled to go via Saint Paul, and even Chicago and Dubuque in many instances, in traveling from the north to the south; that it required a less amount of time and expense to reach Washington than to reach the capital of Dakota. Two years ago it was shown that the population of the southern section had reached 175,000 and of the northern 90,000, and that the people still almost with one voice demanded division; but still division failed, because Congress doubted the policy of multiplying States and said that the causes that were then urged for division would pass away and that we would soon be a united people—united in common interests and by bands of iron in bonds of commerce.

Two years ago it was a fact that there was a large tract of country along the forty-sixth parallel which was uninhabited, which practically separated the settled portions of the Territory. But this is not the case now. Nearly if not quite 100,000 people have settled in Central Dakota during the past two years, and now there is no portion of the Territory lying east of the Missouri River, between what has heretofore been called North and South Dakota, that is unsettled or not rapidly being settled, and instead of the unbroken prairie of two years ago thriving villages and industrious farmers may be found in all portions of this section. It was also a fact that to go from the north to the south it was necessary to go outside of the Territory and travel through two States, namely, Minnesota and Iowa, because all the railroads in the Territory ran east and west. Such is not the fact now, because nearly all railroad building done in 1882 and 1883 was upon northerly and southerly lines, and at present, excepting twenty-seven miles' staging, you can go by rail from the extreme southern portion of the Territory to Devil's Lake or Pembina, in the extreme northern part, and by the completion of the Fargo Southern, which is all graded and partially ironed, the Jamestown Southern, which is nearly all graded, and the Bismarck extension of the Milwaukee and Saint Paul, partially completed, which will be accomplished early the coming season, the systems of railroads from the extreme southern part to the northern will be as complete as those running east and west, and every vestige of the difficulties in going from the north to the south not already removed will have been overcome.

All the various efforts for the division of the Territory, so far as the people are concerned, may be said to have culminated in the abortive attempt of those in the south favoring it to form, without authority of Congress, a constitution for South Dakota. This constitution was submitted to the people south of the forty-sixth parallel at the last annual election, and, if the active canvass of its promoters for weeks before the election, the indifference of the people shown by not voting, and the opposition of those who did vote may be taken as a criterion of the wishes of the people, they certainly were not very enthusiastic, to say the least, for division.

If no allowance is made for the increase of population during the year, but we compare the vote upon the constitution with the vote for Delegate in 1882, we will find that there were but 19,150 votes cast for and against the constitution, of which 12,336 were in favor of and 6,814 against, while the same counties in 1882 cast 30,972 votes; it will be seen that there were nearly as many persons who did not vote at all as there were in favor of the constitution, and in fact there were a great many more, because the immigration to this part of the Territory was very large during the year 1883. It is worthy of note that many of the oldest and most populous counties in the Territory voted against the adoption of the constitution, among which may be mentioned Union, which cast 969 votes against and 31 in favor; Clay, which cast 367 against and 210 in favor; Lincoln, which cast 668 against and 196 in favor; Minnehaha, which cast 863 against and 304 in favor. All of these counties are in the extreme southeastern portion of the Territory.

Nor is there anything in the character of the country or people which would tend in any way to make division desirable or necessary. There is no natural boundary which divides the north from the south. It is the same character of country for many miles upon both sides of the forty-sixth parallel, settled by the same people, mostly immigrants from the older States. The country is well adapted in soil and climate to remain together as one great State, possessing within its borders the elements necessary to support a dense population.

In view, however, of the sentiment so often expressed in favor of division on the part of Dakota, and the many interests involved by division, it would certainly be wise to give the people an opportunity to elect delegates to a constitutional convention, who shall have authority from Congress to consider that question. It will bring the wisdom and experience of the people to bear upon the framework of the proposed new government, whether it be for a part or the whole of the Territory. This framework will be returned to the two Houses of Congress to be corrected, strengthened, or adorned, as may appear necessary.

All of the safeguards may then be added which the accumulated wisdom of Congress can suggest, with a view to the protection of the interests of the people or to prevent the dissipation, as has been the case in some of the newer States, of the immense grants of the lands to be turned over to the State for educational and internal improvement purposes. If it is determined that division is not desired, the adoption of this or a similar bill will hasten the admission of the whole.

The agitation of the subject of division in Congress delays the admission of the whole and withholds self-government from our people. It withholds when most needed the use of the school funds arising from the sale of school lands, valued at $20,000,000, and prevents the application to the people's use of the internal-improvement funds which will accrue to the State (but not the Territory), amounting to about $3,000,000.

It keeps our people in an unsettled state and brings discredit upon the Territory, forcing high rates of interest, and robs us of all the advantages of State government.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

Mr. VEST. That argument was presented to the Committee on Territories by as intelligent and reputable a delegation of citizens as ever came before that committee from the Territory of Dakota or any other Territory, gentlemen who represent the wealth, the social position, and influence of the northern portion of the Territory of Dakota. It asserts what is absolutely true, and that is that the intermediate territory between Northern and Southern Dakota has received the largest amount of population in the last five years; that the system of railroads now projected and being built in the Territory runs from north to south; that great corporations, such as the Milwaukee road, the Saint Paul, the Northwestern, the Illinois Central are competing with each other in building railroads running from north to south and connecting together these two sections of Dakota. The old argument which has been made for the last ten years that persons wishing to come from Fargo to Yankton were compelled to go on the North Pacific to Saint Paul, and then on the Union Pacific in order to get to the southern portion of Dakota, has been exploded; it has disappeared under these railroad projects and under the increased immigration to the central portion of the Territory. Not one shadow exists for any such pretext to-day.

The Senator from Indiana spoke of what is known as the Huron convention, held in 1883, upon the 19th day of June, when four hundred delegates came together, adopted a State constitution out of hand, and declared that Southern Dakota should become a State, and that its admission into the Union should be demanded of Congress; but the Senator from Indiana did not read in this connection the proceedings and the unanimous resolutions of a convention larger than that, held at Fargo on the 11th of September following, which protested against the project of dividing the Territory and making a State government in the southern portion of it. I know that a so-called compromise has since been made between the politicians in Northern and Southern Dakota. I know that an agreement has been entered into, and that Northern Dakota is now in a sort of quasi-way willing that this bill should be enacted by Congress; but I do not believe, as the statement which has just been read by the Chief Clerk says, that the people of Dakota desire any such separation. If so, it is the first instance in the history of the States or of the people of the States of this Union. Texas was admitted into the Union with a territory sufficient to make five States. The public man can not live to-day in Texas who wants to divide that vast domain. There could not be enough votes obtained in Texas to divide its territory to elect a justice of the peace in the smallest township in the State. The people of Texas have learned what the people of this whole country know, that the power is with the large States, and that the area of territory and the amount of population give to a State political influence and prestige with sister States and in the councils of the nations. I do not believe the people of Dakota desire any such separation.

The Senator from Indiana commenced his argument by saying that the movement for a new State should originate with the people. I have in my possession letters from the people, not from politicians, but from persons without ambition politically so far as I know, who come to me accredited as persons of intelligence and respectability. Our late colleague in the Senate Judge Davis, of Illinois, handed to me a letter coming from a person whom he vouched for as a man of influence, respectability, and intelligence, and I ask the Chief Clerk to read it from the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the letter.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

TYNDALL, BON HOMME COUNTY, DAKOTA TERRITORY,
January 24, 1883.

MY DEAR SIR: I do not know that you will remember me as a member of the Senate of Illinois up to the commencement of the war. It matters not, but I am tolerably acquainted with your history. I know that you are a native of Maryland, as well as myself. I have been a resident of Dakota for the last nine years. I claim to have a right to be heard in regard to the division and admission of the southern part as a State into the Union. You know that our Territory is sufficiently large for three States larger than Illinois. If it be divided on the line of forty-sixth degree north latitude it will furnish two large States. As to its division I have no objection to offer, but as to the admission of the southern half into the Union as a State at the present time I believe would be entirely premature, for the following reasons:

First. The population is not sufficient to entitle it to two Senators to equipoise such States as New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Illinois, nor even to one full Representative in the lower House.

Second. The population is too poor at present to bear the expenses of Statehood. Many of the counties are burdened with heavy indebtedness, caused by the fraudulent bonds and consequent heavy taxation.

Third. The people are opposed to admission. The only persons urging it are aspirants for Senatorial and Representative and gubernatorial honors, as well as other distinctions of place and profit.

These are the self-constituted representatives appearing at Washington urging admission. As far as my knowledge extends, I know of no person of any party besides those mentioned who is in favor of Statehood. The people of Dakota do not wish Statehood at present. The majority of voters here are foreign-born, and do not yet understand the nature of our institutions, indeed not more than the colored people of the South. I trust that your influence and vote will be against admission. Will you show this note to Mr. VEST, of Missouri.

Yours, truly,

J. P. RICHMOND.

Judge DAVIS.

Mr. VEST. I have here another letter coming from a lady with whom I have no acquaintance, but when she declares in the first line of it that she is a Republican, I hope that it will meet with the respectful and serious attention of my friend from Indiana, the chairman of the Committee on Territories. I ask the Chief Clerk to read the letter It comes from another portion of the Territory, and from a person certainly of intelligence, whatever I may think of certain opinions which she expresses in regard to woman suffrage.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WEBSTER, March 30, 1884.

SIR: Will you please do a Dakota (Republican) citizen the favor of presenting to the United States Senate reasons why our Territory should not be admitted to the Union as a State, believing such action would be in direct opposition to every interest of our settlers.

First. It is not the voice of our people who are asking admission, which was clearly proven in the fact that so little interest was manifested at elections upon that subject. Many of the polling places were not opened at all; three in my own county (Day) were not, and as nearly as could be ascertained this was the average interest upon that occasion throughout the Territory.

Our country as yet is too new and sparsely settled, such wide distances between towns, that our people are comparative strangers to each other; besides, our actual residents are too poor to support any more officers than we now have, notwithstanding the assistance we have from the General Government.

As an illustration of officers to be supported by this poor struggling people, in this town (Webster, the county seat of Day County), which has not one hundred and fifty inhabitants, there are nine notaries public; six of these nine have all the following titles: land locating, loan agents, and notary public.

Any man, it matters not what his character may be, by sending $2 (and $4 for a seal) to our governor can be commissioned a notary public; then this worthy (?) officer (through the extraordinary ruling of the Commissioner of the General Land Office) is armed with authority to take the testimony of witnesses in final-proof land cases (in many instances the witnesses never having seen the testimony they have sworn to).

This is irrelevant to the subject, and is merely to show you that Dakota's best interest would be served in having fewer officers instead of more.

In fact it is our politicians and not our people who are so anxious for Statehood; and, all things considered, they are really more to be pitied than to be blamed, because the Presidents have seen fit to use Dakota as a field for the appointment of unemployed politicians of the East to all of our Territorial offices, which gives to us a surplus of that class of ambitious, intelligent, and politician citizens, who should not be allowed to inveigle the unwary settlers into subserving their interests by forcing us into Statehood.

The tillers of the soil—our actual settlers—are all poor people; we can not afford the additional expense. Those of this class who favor admission positively do not understand their own interests any more than do poor people who advocate high tariff.

Division of our Territory upon the forty-sixth parallel would be desirable, and probably a benefit to our people.

The greatest detriment in making us a State at the present time would be in turning the tide of immigration to Territories beyond, where settlers would avoid the expense of State and the support of State officers.

We have not enough people here. In many places "Poor Los" are far more numerous than settlers.

Here is an illustration of how inhabitants are usually counted in this country: Time and again I have read in our town paper, "Webster, 600 inhabitants." Doubting this statement somewhat, I have counted every man, woman, and child who is an actual resident, and the exact number is 141 persons. My observation has taught me that this is the way other towns' inhabitants here have been estimated.

Yet with all the eagerness of our politicians to rush us into the Union unprepared, at their (not the people's) State constitutional convention they absolutely refused to acknowledge "as equal before the law" our most sober and industrious citizens—women.

For this and other good reasons herein assigned I pray your honorable body to deny them admission as a State until we are older and they are wise enough to know that a State constitution must be founded upon the true principles of right and justice to her most humble citizen as it does to her highest.

Yours, very respectfully,

MARIETTA M. BONES.

Hon. GEO. G. VEST, United States Senator.

Mr. VEST. I caused these letters to be read because they come from persons who are not members of the party to which I belong, because they are not politicians, but citizens of Dakota, and because they show in my judgment the real sentiment and opinion of the people of that Territory who are not influenced by political or personal considerations. As I said, it would require a vast amount of proof to make me believe that the non-political citizens of any State or Territory in this Union, in the light of the past history of the States of the Union, desire a division of their State or Territory.

Mr. MAXEY. Will the Senator from Missouri permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. MAXEY. It has been stated very often that the physical obstruction between the north and south portions of Dakota Territory would naturally divide that Territory into two divisions. How is that?

Mr. VEST. It is not at all true. As I said a few minutes ago, there is not a tract of territory upon this continent more homogeneous than the Territory of Dakota, including in the whole Territory this proposed State.

Mr. MAXEY. I believe that to be true, but I want it to go on record.

Mr. VEST. There is not a range of mountains running from east to west. There is not a great river running from east to west. There is no inland sea or lake which divides it or divides any two parts of it. The only river of any magnitude is a tributary of the Missouri, the Platte River, and that runs from northwest to southeast. There is no pretext for this division except political ambition. It is the desire of ruling political spirits of the northern and southern portions of Dakota to have the division in order to make more offices. That is the naked, the simple, and the absolute truth.

The Senator from Indiana indorsed the last governor of that Territory by quoting from his message. The preceding governor, Governor Ordway, who has engineered this matter since I have been a member of the Committee on Territories with an anxiety, a solicitude, and an industry which (and I attack not his motives) did him great credit, went out of office in the midst of a storm and tempest originating over the movement or rather the location of the capital, and I have not recently followed the course of the proceedings against him.

Mr. HARRISON. Do I understand the Senator from Missouri to say that Governor Ordway had been urging a division and the admission of the southern part of the Territory?

Mr. VEST. He urged the admission of the Territory.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator had noticed my remarks yesterday he would have seen that Governor Ordway refused to approve a bill passed by a majority of 22 to 2 in the house, and by a proportionate majority in the council, for the calling of a constitutional convention.

Mr. VEST. I understand that very well, and that was a portion of the conflict that was going on in regard to the location of the capital. I say that Governor Ordway has appeared before the Committee on Territories over and over again in favor of a bill admitting the Territory into the Union. Before the Senator from Indiana was the chairman of that committee Governor Ordway made repeated visits here. Afterward he became involved in the interterritorial strife and almost civil war over the location of the capital, and out of that arose his action when he vetoed the bill to which the Senator referred. I do not undertake to locate Governor Ordway upon this question in all its different phases, but I say emphatically that he has appeared before the Committee on Territories and has urged a bill for the admission of Dakota into the Union.

Mr. HARRISON. In that I think the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. VEST. Well, I think not. Here are my colleagues on the committee who can state whether it is so or not.

Mr. BUTLER. I certainly have seen the governor of Dakota before the committee.

Mr. HARRISON. Undoubtedly he has been before the committee several times; the Senator from South Carolina is right; but my recollection is that he was not taking part in this question at all. It was in relation to some other matter that he appeared before the committee, and my impression of his disposition was that he was not urging the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly, the impression made upon myself as a member of the committee was that he was there as one of the representatives from that Territory in that interest. Perhaps I may have been mistaken; I do not think I was.

Mr. VEST. Not only that, but if my memory has not failed entirely Governor Ordway has called upon me personally in regard to this matter of the admission of Dakota as a State. But the trouble has been in Dakota that no one measure has met with the support of the politicians of that Territory. There are too many statesmen there for the welfare and the quiet of the community and the people, and when a bill has originated with one faction it has been stabbed to death by another.

Governor Ordway—coming back to my line of argument—went out of his administration as governor of the Territory amidst a tempest of invective leading even to criminal prosecution. The incoming governor, who takes upon himself the exposition of the views of the entire Territory in which he has been but a short time, says:

> The sentiment in favor of division is practically unanimous; but very few in either section of the Territory oppose it.

And that in the face of the largest convention ever held in Fargo, in 1883, which passed resolutions against the measure now before the Senate bringing about the division. But the next declaration is even more remarkable. Says this gentleman:

> Whether this desire is wise or unwise is not a question it seems necessary to discuss.

Why, that is the very question now before the Congress of the United States. Are we here to record the edicts of a junta of politicians in a Territory of this Union, or are we here the representatives of sovereign States to declare whether a new State shall enter into the sisterhood of States and assume the sovereignty that becomes her? Are we here representing the States which have sent us to this Chamber, or are we here to record the edicts of a governor in a Territory and of a lot of politicians assembled in convention? This gentleman further says:

> Whether it will disappear under the effect of a closer acquaintance and relationship, engendered and promoted by the various lines of railway north and south now being built or surveyed, is a probability or contingency that can be estimated by others as well as myself; but it seems to be a rule that latitudinal and not longitudinal lines are the cementing and binding ones.

Mr. President, I have heard that declaration before on this floor from a higher authority. I heard the statement made here once by a distinguished Senator, one of the most eminent in this body, that railroads upon this continent, by force of nature, must be constructed from east to west, and could not run from north to south. Sir, I believe no such nonsense. I do not believe that nature has inflicted any such monstrosity upon the human family, or upon commerce, or commercial intercourse. Where is the authority for the statement that railroads running from east to west alone bind a people together? Is there nothing in the great lines of road which to-day run from the North to the South, and bring together the people of the respective sections? Is there nothing in the commercial intercourse that comes from the great river, the Father of Waters, that flows through Northern and Southern territory alike? Where is this law of nature? Where does it exist either upon this continent or elsewhere?

Sir, the statesman who makes this declaration mistakes the ephemeral and evanescent passions that came from an unfortunate war for permanent results, which will not and do not and can not, thank God, exist. The time will come, it is fast approaching and will come in a few years to the people of this country, when the great railroads of the country will cement and bind together with iron bands the North and South as much as the East and the West. To-day in a Southern State, in my judgment, is an enterprise now being inaugurated which will do more to bind together in common interest the people not only North and South in this Union, but the people of the northern and southern continents of this hemisphere, than anything else which has been inaugurated in this entire century.

The governor of Dakota says that a railroad running north and south by some magic and mysterious process does not convey human beings in common sympathy from one section to another; that only in railroads running from east to west is there any sympathetic or social connection. Where is the authority for this statement? Where is the proof of it? It does not exist. It is the dream simply of a politician, who seeks to bring about his own results.

The Senator from Indiana speaks of the area of this Territory, and says that it should be divided on account of the large number of square miles in the entire Territory, there being in the new State as proposed 77,000, against 149,000 square miles in the Territory. I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that California and Texas have both a larger area than this Territory united. I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that Colorado was admitted into the Union in 1876 with 103,925 square miles of territory. According to the census report Colorado has made a phenomenal advance in population, in resources, in civilization. The census report for 1880 puts Colorado at the head of the new States and Territories of the Union. Colorado was admitted, I grant, with 40,000 square miles less than the Territory of Dakota, but with the enormous amount still of 103,000 in 1876. It has the same sort of soil, the same sort of population, with this proposed State and with the Territory of Dakota as it now exists. Colorado to-day has only one Representative in the lower branch of the Congress of the United States. Her ratio of population has not increased so as to give her more than the original Representative that she had at the time she was admitted into the Union.

Take another Territory or State, that of Nevada. Nevada has now 116,700 square miles of Territory. Nevada was admitted before Colorado. Nevada to-day has about 60,000 inhabitants, a decrease in the number of inhabitants, with one Representative, of course, in the lower branch of Congress.

Here are two States that were located as Territories, with about the same surroundings, soil, climate, and beginning as this proposed State of Dakota, and to-day one of these has but one Representative still in the lower House of Congress, and the other falls below the ratio nearly one hundred thousand. Now, Mr. President, what assurance have we that this new State is to go on in its phenomenal progress, as it has been termed on this floor and in the petitions of its citizens? What assurance have we that it will prove an exception to the same geographical and climatic influences which have brought about the results I have named in several States of the West?

To listen to my friend from Indiana one would imagine that the Territory of Dakota, and especially the southern portion of it, rivaled the fabled dreams of poesy in all that makes a state delightful as a residence or great in power and in wealth. Why, sir, it is the ordinary and average State that we find at the base of the Rocky Mountains and upon the great cattle plains of the West. It is simply this and nothing more. The southwestern portion of the Territory comprises the mining region of the Black Hills. It can never become thickly populated in the very nature of geographical logic. It is impossible that it should be so.

Where is the immense population to come from that the Senator from Indiana thinks in a very few years will cover all the cattle plains and all the wheat regions of Dakota? Dakota is even phenomenal in the fact that larger tracts of land are owned there than in any other of the Territories of the Union. The immense wheat farms, like the Dalrymple farm, which many Senators here visited, are found all over the Red River region of the North, and immense cattle ranches are found all over the southern portion of Dakota. It can never become the region of small farms and dense population like the States of the Atlantic seaboard or even the Western States upon the edge of the Mississippi. It has not the soil, it has not the climate, it has not the production, it will never have the population. Yet we are told to-day that Dakota should be divided, and the northern portion of it constructed into a Territory, which in a very few years will apply, like the southern portion does to-day, for admission into the Union.

There is no necessity for any such division. Even if the unanimity of sentiment exists in the Territory which has been spoken of here, that would be no warrant for us to divide the Territory under the circumstances presented to the Senate.

The Senator from Indiana has made an argument in regard to population based upon the increase of vote as shown by the recent election for Delegate in that Territory, showing an increase of some 56,000 or 58,000, and the Senator says that the ratio to be admitted in the calculation of population ought to be a family of four in population to each vote cast. The ratio adopted in all the States of the Union in the calculation of population is 5 to 1, but I submit with all deference to the Senator from Indiana that this rule should not and can not obtain in a calculation as to population in a Territory like Dakota. The census states (and it required no statement from even as high a source as that to make good what every Senator knows upon this floor to be true) that in the Western States and Territories there is a large excess of males over females. The immigration that goes there is in the main constituted of young adventurers, miners, cattle-men, and speculators. It is not men of families. This is mainly shown by the fact that while the proportion of females by the census of 1880 in the whole United States is 96,544 women to each 100,000 men, in the Territory of Dakota there are but 64,257 females to 100,000 men. In other words, there is in that Territory a difference of 30 per cent. between the males and females. I state what no one knows better than my friend from Indiana, for he has personally visited the West and knows as well I can what I state to be true, that the ratio of 4 to 1 is not a just ratio.

Mr. HARRISON. The vote in Dakota in 1880 shows a ratio of 4.82.

Mr. VEST. Yes, I understand, Mr. President, it shows that ratio because the immigration then going into that Territory was upon the lines of railroads and to the cities; but the immigration now is to the cattle ranches; the immigration now is to the interior portion of the country. The paper that I caused to be read from the desk to-day speaks of the large immigration to Middle Dakota. One hundred thousand people, according to the statement made before our committee and placed to-day before the Senate, have gone—not to Fargo, not to the towns and cities, but they have moved on to the cattle ranches of the interior portions of Dakota, and they are not people with families; they are young men. There was a time when the ocean invited the enterprise and the energy and the adventure of the young men of the United States; but now enterprise and adventure have gone to the plains of the West, and the adventurers are not men with families. The want of luxuries, the want of comforts, prevents females from seeking homes there as a rule, but men of adventure, in order to accumulate wealth rapidly, engage in the avocations and submit to the privations that are peculiar to that region.

But, Mr. President, one would imagine from the remarks of the Senator from Indiana yesterday that I had mainly opposed this measure in committee and that I had been one of the chief opponents to the passage of this bill in the Senate. The Senator delivered panegyrics eloquent, incisive, rhetorical, upon the blessings of American citizenship, and was pleased to say that in my lighter moods I had indulged in some facetiousness at the idea of admitting the people of the southern portion of Dakota to citizenship, and that he knew that my better nature would repudiate any such outrage.

Mr. President, if this boon of American citizenship is so valuable, if the people of this country are practically being disfranchised, if it is necessary for their happiness, their comfort, their respectability, that they should be citizens of the United States, why is it that for four long years with absolute political control of this body the Senator from Indiana and his colleagues have been unable to pass this bill, or even a bill which submitted to the people of that Territory the question whether they should separate or not? Why is it that since 1871, with delegation after delegation, with argument after argument, with all sorts of appeals coming from the oppressed people of Dakota, they have been refused any sort of relief in the direction indicated now by the Senator from Indiana? Mr. President, the objections to the admission of Dakota as a State have come from the Republican side of the Senate. The objections here made would have been impotent without the assistance we derived from the Republican side of the Chamber. The Senator from Indiana has not been properly giving the reasons why this State has not been admitted. The Republicans are in the absolute control of this Senate, and for a large portion of the time of the popular branch of Congress, and of the executive department, and let them answer why this great wrong has been committed on the suffering and oppressed people of this Territory. I repeat, the objections have come from the Republican side of this Chamber.

The Senator drew the picture of 300,000 American people practically disfranchised, and appealed to me to know why in my better moments I do not agree to the bill of the committee. Sir, it was stated by a Republican Senator that when these people learned the first lesson of common honesty and paid their just obligations they could then be admitted into the sisterhood of States, and not before. The opposition came from a Senator on that side of the Chamber, who declared that until these people paid their honest debts, until they learned the first principles of American citizenship and practically showed their respect for them, they could not be admitted into the American Union. A people whom the Senator represents to be practically disfranchised and who are panting to come into the Union for the glorious privileges of American citizenship even "as the hart panteth after the water brooks," these same American citizens repudiated a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, trampled it under foot, and by legislative enactments of their own Territory sought to render it nugatory and void. Let any Senator look at the record, and he will find it put down in extenso and in detail in the minority report of the Committee on Territories.

Under senatorial coercion these people, who have so much regard for American citizenship—these gentlemen who can not live in the air of a Territory any longer, but must be clothed and dignified with the high attributes which the Constitution and laws give to every human being within the dominion of our States—these gentlemen in their Territorial Legislature did all that could be done to strike down a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States and to evade their honorable and just obligations, and it was not until they discovered that the only way to secure recognition at the hands of the Senate was by the payment of their bonds that they ever came to the conclusion that the debt should be discharged. It has not been any opposition on this side of the Chamber that has kept Dakota out of the Union. We were unable of ourselves to have done it without the assistance that was derived from the motive that I have stated.

Now, Mr. President, having said this much, I shall leave this question to the Senate with the single remark that I will never vote for any bill which attemps to divide this Territory upon the arguments and for the reasons which have hitherto been presented.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

Mr. MORRILL. I presume at this hour the Senator from Indiana will give way to a motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to that motion?

Mr. HARRISON. I am entirely ready to go on now, but I have no disposition to press my own wishes against those of the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and nine minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECIPROCITY CONVENTION WITH SPAIN.

In executive session the convention for commercial reciprocity between the United States and Spain, providing for an intimate and favored exchange of products with the islands of Cuba and Porto Rico, signed at Madrid November 18, 1884, was read the first time.

On motion of Mr. MILLER, of California, it was Ordered, That the injunction of secrecy be removed from the text of the said convention, and that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and, together with the message, be printed for the use of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. ALLISON, it was Ordered, That the said convention be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. MILLER, of California, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That 2,000 extra copies of said convention be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. MANDERSON, from the Committee on Printing, reported the resolution without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

On motion of Mr. MORRILL (at 4 o'clock and 37 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

RECIPROCITY CONVENTION WITH SPAIN.

The President yesterday sent the following message to the Senate, which was read in executive session, and the injunction of secrecy was removed therefrom so far as to permit its publication, with the Convention, in the RECORD:

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit herewith, for consideration by the Senate, with a view to advising and consenting to its ratification, a convention for commercial reciprocity between the United States and Spain, providing for an intimate and favored exchange of products with the islands of Cuba and Porto Rico, which convention was signed at Madrid on the 18th ultimo.

The negotiations for this convention have been in progress since April last, in pursuance of the understanding reached by the two governments on the 2d of January, 1884, for the improvement of commercial relations between the United States and the Spanish Antilles, by the eighth article of which both governments engaged "to begin at once negotiations for a complete treaty of commerce and navigation between the United States of America and the said provinces of Cuba and Porto Rico." Although this clause was by common consent omitted from the substitutionary agreement of February 13, 1884 (now in force until replaced by this convention being carried into effect), the obligation to enter upon such a negotiation was deemed to continue. With the best desire manifest on both sides to reach a common accord, the negotiation has been necessarily protracted owing to the complexity of the details to be incorporated in order that the convention might respond to the national policy of intercourse with the neighboring communities of the American system, which is outlined in my late annual message to the Congress, in the following words:

The conditions of these treaties should be the free admission of such merchandise as this country does not produce, in return for the admission free or under a favored scheme of duties, of our own products—the benefits of such exchange to apply only to goods carried under the flag of the parties to the contract; the removal, on both sides, from the vessels so privileged of all tonnage dues and national imposts, so that those vessels may ply unhindered between our ports and those of the other contracting parties, though without infringing on the reserved home coasting trade; the removal or reduction of burdens on the exported products of those countries coming within the benefits of the treaties, and the avoidance of the technical restrictions and penalties by which our intercourse with those countries is at present hampered.

A perusal of the convention now submitted will suffice to show how fully it carries out the policy of intercourse thus announced. I commend it to you, in the confident expectation that it will receive your sanction.

It does not seem necessary to my present purpose to enter into detailed consideration of the many immediate and prospective advantages which will flow from this convention to our productions and our shipping interests.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, December 10, 1884.

The United States of America and His Majesty the King of Spain, equally animated by the desire to strengthen and perpetuate the bonds of good friendship which happily exist between those States and the Spanish nation, and recognizing particularly that by reason of the Islands and Spanish Provinces of Cuba and Porto Rico being near the shores of the United States frequent and important commercial relations exist between their territories to the benefit of their inhabitants, and both powers equally believing that the community and harmony of their interests counsel that these relations should be stimulated and favored for the greater development and encouragement of commerce and prosperity both in those islands and provinces and in the United States, have decided to celebrate a treaty of commerce to that special end. For this purpose the President of the United States of America has conferred full powers on John W. Foster, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to his Catholic Majesty, and His Majesty the King of Spain has conferred full powers on His Excellency Don Salvador de Albacete y Albert, ex-Colonial Secretary and Senator of the Kingdom.

And said Plenipotentiaries, after having exchanged their respective full powers, which were found to be in due form, have agreed to the following articles:

ARTICLE I.

The United States of America, in reciprocity for the concessions and privileges stipulated by Spain in the present treaty, and as an equivalent therefor, agree to admit into all the established ports of said States, free of import duties, or with the duties fixed in the annexed Schedule letter A, all the articles or merchandise enumerated in said Schedule, provided that the articles or merchandise named in the said Schedule A be the natural product and industry or manufacture of the Islands and Spanish Provinces of Cuba and of Porto Rico, and provided further that the said articles or merchandise be carried directly from the said Islands to the United States in vessels owned exclusively by citizens of the United States or by Spanish citizens, and whose officers are also citizens respectively of said States or of Spain.

If during the existence of this treaty any reduction shall be made in the Customs Tariff of the United States on any article or articles named in Schedule A on which duties are fixed, the duties of said Schedule A shall be proportionally reduced on the aforesaid articles.

ARTICLE II.

Spain, in reciprocity for the concessions and privileges stipulated by the United States of America in the present Treaty, and as an equivalent therefor, agrees to admit into all the established ports of the Islands and Spanish Provinces of Cuba and of Porto Rico free of import duties, or with the duties fixed in the annexed Schedules letters B and C respectively, all the articles or merchandise enumerated in said Schedules, provided that the articles or merchandise enumerated in Schedules B and C be the natural product and industry or manufacture of the United States, and provided further that said articles or merchandise be carried directly from the United States to the aforesaid Islands in vessels owned exclusively by Spanish citizens or citizens of the United States, and whose officers are also respectively Spanish citizens or citizens of the United States.

If during the existence of this Treaty any reduction shall be made in the third column of the Customs Tariffs of Cuba or of Porto Rico, or in the column in force, in case said third column shall be substituted by another, on any article or articles named in Schedules B and C, on which duties are fixed, the duties of said Schedules B and C shall be proportionally reduced on the aforesaid articles.

The articles of merchandise which are the natural product and industry or manufacture of the United States, not embraced in the said Schedules B and C, shall pay on their importation into the Islands and Spanish Provinces of Cuba and of Porto Rico the duties fixed in the third column of the respective Customs Tariff at present in force, or the duties fixed in the column of the Customs Tariff which may be in force during the existence of this Treaty, without differential flag duty.

ARTICLE III.

The goods or merchandise which may be carried directly from the established ports of the United States, and which are not the natural product, industry or manufacture of the said United States, shall pay, on their importation through the established ports of the Islands of Cuba and of Porto Rico, no other duties than those which may be imposed and collected on similar or equivalent goods or merchandise, also carried directly in Spanish vessels from the first named ports which are not the natural product of the United States.

Reciprocally, the goods or merchandise which may be carried directly from the established ports of the Islands of Cuba and of Porto Rico in Spanish vessels, and which are not the natural product, industry or manufacture of the said Islands, shall pay, on their importation through the established ports of the United States, no other duties than those which may be imposed and collected on similar or equivalent goods or merchandise, also carried directly in vessels of the said United States, which are not the natural product of the aforementioned Islands.

ARTICLE IV.

The two High Contracting Parties respectively reserve the right to adopt the laws, ordinances and regulations which they may deem proper to protect their revenues and prevent fraud in the declarations and proof that the articles or merchandise enumerated in Schedules A, B and C annexed to this Treaty are the natural product, industry or manufacture of the United States, and the natural product, industry or manufacture of the Islands of Cuba and of Porto Rico, as the case may be, and are therefore entitled to the special privileges stipulated in the present Treaty and in the said Schedules.

The Government of each one of the contracting parties shall moreover have the right to amend, modify or amplify the laws, ordinances and regulations issued in the exercise of the power reserved to it by virtue of this article.

The said High Contracting Parties, however, mutually agree that the conductors or carriers of the merchandise which may not be of the origin required to enjoy the benefits of the Treaty, or with whose importation the attempt is made to violate the rules or measures established in virtue of this article to prevent fraud, shall not incur responsibility, fine, or imprisonment, unless the complicity of the said carriers in the attempt to commit it is proved. Vessels are also exempt from responsibility and fine if complicity on the part of the captains or owners of the vessels in the commission of the fraud is not proved.

ARTICLE V.

No export duty or charge new or superior to those established by the Tariffs at present in force shall be imposed in the Islands and Spanish Provinces of Cuba and of Porto Rico.

Any reduction which may be made in said Tariffs in the export duties shall be immediately applied to the merchandise mentioned in Schedule A.

Neither shall there be imposed in the United States any export duty or charge on the articles or merchandise mentioned in Schedules B and C.

ARTICLE VI.

None of the articles or merchandise enumerated in Schedules A, B and C nor any of the other articles the product of and proceeding from the United States or from the Islands and Spanish Provinces of Cuba and of Porto Rico, which may be imported into said Islands or States respectively, shall be subject to consumption duties or internal taxes of any kind, greater than those which are or may be imposed on equal or similar articles or merchandise of natural production of each one of the two contracting parties.

ARTICLE VII.

The manufacturers and merchants, as also the commercial travellers, of the Islands of Cuba and Porto Rico who may visit the United States on account of a house of said Spanish provinces; and reciprocally the manufacturers and merchants, as also the commercial travellers of the United States who may visit the Islands of Cuba and of Porto Rico on account of a house of the said States, may make, without being subject either in the United States or in the Islands of Cuba and Porto Rico to any duty, the purchases which their industry requires and receive orders of purchase, with or without samples, but without transporting merchandise.

ARTICLE VIII.

The articles upon which an import duty is paid which are used as samples, and may be brought into the Islands of Cuba and of Porto Rico by manufacturers, merchants or commercial travellers of the United States, and into the United States by manufacturers, merchants or commercial travellers of the Islands of Cuba and of Porto Rico, shall be admitted by each one of the contracting parties with temporary freedom of duties, under the customs formalities necessary to guarantee the re-exportation of the said articles or their return to the customs wharehouses. These formalities shall be established in common accord by the two governments.

ARTICLE IX.

For reasons of public order and safety, the two contracting parties respectively reserve the right to establish rules and ordinances, in virtue of which both in the United States and in the islands of Cuba and Porto Rico, the importation and exportation, as the case may be, of gunpowder, dynamite or other explosive matters, and of arms and munitions of war, may be subject to special authorization or inspection, for the purpose of preventing the illicit transportation or use of the same.

ARTICLE X.

Vessels of the United States which proceeding directly from any port or ports of the same with cargo whether wholly of articles or merchandise the natural product, industry or manufacture of said States, or in part of foreign origin, embarked or transhipped in said port or ports of the United States, or which may go in ballast, on entering into a port or ports of the island of Cuba or of Porto Ricos shall be exempt from all tonnage dues of whatever kind; and as to light-house dues, expenses of pilotage, hospital, port and other customary local dues, they shall pay no other or higher dues than those exacted from Spanish vessels engaged in the trade between the said States and islands.

ARTICLE XI.

Reciprocally, Spanish vessels which proceeding directly from any port or ports of the island of Cuba or of Porto Rico with cargo, whether wholly of articles or merchandise the natural product, industry or manufacture of the said islands, or in part of foreign origin embarked or transhipped in said port or ports of the island of Cuba or of Porto Rico, or which may go in ballast, or entering into a port or ports of the United States shall be exempt from all tonnage dues of whatever kind; and as to light-house dues, expenses of pilotage, hospital, port and other customary local dues, they shall pay no other or higher dues than those exacted from vessels of the United States engaged in the trade of said islands and States.

ARTICLE XII.

Vessels which may have their cargo and port of departure under the conditions stated in the two preceding articles shall be free to go from one port to another in the country or island of their destination, unloading or discharging the cargo which they carry consigned in due form to such several ports, on the same terms as vessels engaged in the coasting trade of the nation to which the ports belong, provided they pay the duties of the customs tariff or of the schedule corresponding to the importation of the cargo, in accordance with the present treaty.

ARTICLE XIII.

Vessels which may come within the conditions expressed in Articles X, XI and XII, shall not have the right, whether vessels of the United States or Spanish vessels, to take on board or embark in any port of the nation of its destination any kind of cargo to be conveyed to another port of the same nation in the aforesaid States and islands; as the local coasting trade is exclusively reserved for the flag of each one of the two high contracting parties in their respective territories.

ARTICLE XIV.

Vessels of the United States with or without cargo, proceeding from foreign ports and entering into those of the Islands of Cuba and of Porto Rico, and Spanish vessels with or without cargo proceeding from foreign ports and entering into those of the United States, whatever may be the place of origin or the destination of their cargo, shall enjoy under all circumstances on their entry, during their stay and on their departure, the same treatment as national vessels and their cargo proceeding from the same countries and with similar cargo.

ARTICLE XV.

Vessels of the United States or Spanish vessels which enter into the ports of the Islands of Cuba and Porto Rico, or into the ports of the said States, as the case may be, voluntarily or in distress, with or without cargo, and depart from the said ports without having transacted any commercial operation, shall be exempt from all tonnage, navigation, port and customs clearance dues or charges.

In the case of forced arrival in distress the discharge as well as the reloading or transshipment occasioned thereby, the necessary expense for provisioning the crew, and the sale of the damaged merchandise, shall not be considered commercial operations, provided that the competent customs officials have previously and in legal form authorized them.

ARTICLE XVI.

The consular officers of the United States and those of Spain shall not exact or receive, while this treaty remains in force, any of the fees enumerated in the tariff of consular fees of the United States or of Spain as compensation for official services which may be rendered to the vessel of the United States or of Spain engaged in the trade between the said United States and the Islands of Cuba and of Porto Rico, or respecting the cargoes conveyed by said vessels.

The two powers respectively reserve the right to recompense the service rendered to the shipping, commerce and trade mentioned in this article by the consular officers, adopting for the same the measures which they may deem proper, but without any charge on the said shipping and commerce, or the cargoes.

ARTICLE XVII.

The two high contracting parties mutually stipulate by the present treaty that the fines and pecuniary penalties which may be imposed, and the product of the forfeitures which may result from violations of the laws and of the customs ordinances of the United States and of the Islands of Cuba and of Porto Rico, when the fines, penalties and forfeitures proceed from violations of said laws and ordinances committed in the commerce of importation or exportation of said States and Islands, shall be paid in full into the public treasury of said States and Islands and shall remain absolutely under the control of the respective governments, without being received directly and with any preferred or any other kind of right by any informer or by any other individual.

The laws and regulations of each one of the two contracting parties shall establish the manner of recompensing individually the services rendered by public officials in the prosecution of fraud.

ARTICLE XVIII.

The two high contracting parties mutually agree that no fines or penalties shall be imposed either in the custom-houses of the United States or in those of the Islands of Cuba and of Porto Rico on the vessels of Spain or of the United States or on the captains thereof, engaged in the commerce of importation or exportation between said States and Islands, on account of errors or omissions in the manifests of any part of the cargo of said vessels, if it shall appear that said manifests agree with the bills of lading of said cargo, unless it is proved that there has been complicity on the part of the captains or owners of the vessels in the attempt to defraud the Treasury by said omissions or errors.

ARTICLE XIX.

Vessels of the United States and Spanish vessels whenever referred to in this treaty shall be understood to be vessels bona fide owned exclusively by citizens of the United States, or by Spanish citizens, and it shall also be understood that their captains and officers or pilots are also citizens of the United States and of Spain respectively, and no excuse or pretext whatever shall be admitted for failing to comply with these conditions for the benefit of other vessels or other ship-owners.

ARTICLE XX.

The citizens of the United States in the Islands of Cuba and of Porto Rico, and reciprocally Spanish citizens in said States, shall enjoy for their professions, industries and business of whatever character it may be, whether individually or in the quality of associates or in a coöperative capacity, the same rights and privileges which the citizens of the territory of their residence enjoy, under the conditions, however, of their being subject to the laws of the country in which they reside.

They shall also have free and easy access to the tribunals of justice to maintain their suits and defend their rights and claims; and the high contracting parties ratify by the present treaty the principles and provisions set forth in the Protocol signed at Madrid on the 12th of January, 1877, it being understood that it shall be applied in all its effects to cases in which the accused are not more favored in respect to their defence and rights by the law for the application of the penal code in the Island of Cuba promulgated on the 23d of May, 1879, and that it shall be applied in the same manner provided that they are submitted to the military jurisdiction in virtue of the stipulation of said Protocol herein ratified.

ARTICLE XXI.

The citizens of the United States resident or temporarily residing in the Islands of Cuba and of Porto Rico, and reciprocally Spanish citizens resident or temporarily residing in the United States shall not be subject to other or greater taxes than those which may be exacted of the citizens of the nation to which the territory of their residence belongs. They shall be exempt from all personal service in the army, in the navy and in the national militia and exempt from all war tax, forced loans, charges and military contributions of whatever kind and their vessels, cargoes, merchandise or other property shall not be detained for any public use whatever, without previous indemnification fixed upon a just and equitable basis by experts designated by the parties and an umpire. They shall also reciprocally enjoy in said territories the privileges, immunities and favors of whatever kind granted or which may be granted to the citizens of a third power.

ARTICLE XXII.

Each one of the high contracting parties reserves exclusively for its nationality the right of fishing in their respective territorial waters; but fish procured by the vessels of one or the other power on the high sea or within the jurisdiction of a third power shall be held to be the product of the nation to which the vessel belongs.

ARTICLE XXIII.

Each one of the two high contracting parties binds itself to make extensive to the other in the United States and in the Spanish provinces of Cuba and of Porto Rico, reciprocally, all favors and concessions in regard to customs tariffs, commerce, navigation, property and persons, which either one of them may have conceded or may concede to a third power; it being understood that the favors and concessions granted to said third power shall be enjoyed gratuitously, if the concession shall have been gratuitous, or said other contracting party giving the same or other equivalent compensation if the concession be conditional.

ARTICLE XXIV.

The stipulations contained in this treaty shall not prevent either of the high contracting parties from making such changes in their customs tariffs and navigation dues as they may see proper, nor limit the liberty of action of either of the contracting parties to treat and agree with other powers as it may deem its interests require, in order to extend to the said powers by means of treaties, protocols or other international compacts, freedom of duties, reductions and favors equal or similar to those stipulated in the present treaty, under the same or similar conditions.

ARTICLE XXV.

The two high contracting parties agree that the doubts which may arise on the interpretation or execution of this treaty, or the claims which may be made in consequence of any violation of the same, shall be submitted, when the means to adjust them directly by friendly accord may have failed, to the arbitration of a single arbitrator who shall be a citizen of one or the other of the two nations chosen by common consent by the respective governments, or, in case of disagreement, a citizen of a third power selected by common accord by the said governments, and on failure of this accord, the nomination of the arbitrator shall be entrusted to the President of the Swiss Confederation.

Both contracting parties bind themselves to furnish to said arbitrator all the antecedents, data and evidence which may be pertinent to the facts and to the law of the case submitted to arbitration. The decision which is given by the arbitrator shall be binding and conclusive, and shall be complied with without evasion or delay. The expenses occasioned by the arbitration shall be paid conjointly in equal moities by the contracting parties.

ARTICLE XXVI.

This treaty shall be ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by Spain, in accordance with the law which authorizes its government to celebrate it, and it shall go into effect thirty days after having been officially published by the two governments by mutual agreement on the same day.

The publication shall not be made, however, until after the Congress of the United States shall have passed the laws necessary to carry it into effect and both governments shall have adopted regulations accordingly, which shall take place within six months from the date of signature.

ARTICLE XXVII.

The duration of the present treaty shall be for seven years, from the date on which it is put into force by both contracting parties in accordance with the preceding article, and shall remain in force so long as neither of the said contracting parties shall definitely, one year in advance, inform the other of its intention and decision to consider it at an end—at the expiration of the term of twelve months from the date when it may make known its resolution.

Each one of the contracting parties shall have the right, at the expiration of seven years, or at any time thereafter, to notify the other of the resolution to which the preceding paragraph refers.

ARTICLE XXVIII.

The ratifications of the present treaty shall be exchanged at Madrid as soon as possible after the approbation to which the preceding article refers.

In faith whereof the respective Plenipotentiaries have signed the present treaty, and have affixed thereto their respective seals.

Done in duplicate at Madrid the eighteenth of November, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-four.

NOTE to item Number 142 of Schedule C.—During the time this Schedule is in force, for the fulfilment of the Treaty to which it is annexed, and as soon as item Number 142 in regard to wheat flour reaches the duty of one dollar and sixty five cents per one hundred Kilograms, all reduction which may be made on the duty which foreign flour now pays on its introduction into the ports of the Peninsula, shall be extended ipso facto to the duties of the Schedule C fixed for the fourth year in the aforesaid number 142.

The reduction of duties in the Peninsula, which may be of a transitory character and made for a brief period on account of the failure of the crops, is excepted from the foregoing rule and from the application to Porto Rico of the reduction of duties on flour imported from foreign countries into the Peninsula. It shall be understood that the transitory reductions in such case and circumstances are those whose duration does not exceed the period of six months.

FINAL PROTOCOL ANNEXED TO THE TREATY OF COMMERCE AND NAVIGATION CONCLUDED THE [18TH] DAY OF NOVEMBER EIGHTEEN HUNDRED AND EIGHTY-FOUR.

In the act of proceeding to sign the Treaty of Commerce and navigation concluded for the United States and the Islands and Spanish provinces of Cuba and Porto Rico between the said States and Spain, the undersigned Plenipotentiaries of the President of the United States and of His Majesty the King of Spain, have made the following reservations and declarations, which shall form an integral part of said treaty.

1. By the present addition to the foregoing instrument it is agreed that the provisions and stipulations in article XXV of the Treaty which the undersigned Plenipotentiaries this day sign shall not apply to the decision of the questions which may arise while the said Treaty is in force, in respect to the understanding, fulfilment and effects of its articles XXIII and XXIV which shall be decided in a friendly manner between the two High Contracting Parties or with the third powers interested therein.

2. It is further agreed that, on the treaty which is this day signed going into effect, the Agreement of the thirteenth of February, eighteen hundred and eighty four, signed by the undersigned Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States and His Excellency the Marquis del Pazo de la Merced, Minister of State of Spain, shall terminate in all its legal effects, said effects ceasing both as to the High contracting Parties and as to the third powers to whom it was applied while in force.

Signed in duplicate at Madrid this eighteenth day of November, eighteen hundred and eighty four.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 10, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Chair will lay before the House some executive communications.

There was no objection.

REMOVAL AND STORAGE OF PRINTING MATERIAL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, asking an immediate appropriation for the removal and storage of material at the Government Printing Office, as provided for by joint resolution of February 6, 1883; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PRINTING LAWS OF WYOMING TERRITORY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the First Comptroller of the Treasury, with inclosures, relating to estimate of appropriation for printing revised laws of Wyoming Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

DAMAGES TO STEAMER DRUID.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate from the Secretary of the Navy of the appropriation required to pay owners of the steamer Druid for damages sustained by collision with United States steamer Powhatan; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

CLAIM OF GEORGE BAGGS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs inclosing additional evidence in the case of the claim of George Baggs on account of alleged depredations by Ute Indians in 1879; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

RESIGNATION OF HON. A. M. SCALES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following communication; which was read and laid on the table:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., December 5, 1884.

SIR: Having been elected governor of the State of North Carolina, I have this day forwarded to his excellency the governor of that State my resignation of the office of Representative in the Forty-eighth Congress of the United States from the fifth district of North Carolina, to take effect on the 30th of December next.

With assurances of my high respect, I am, your obedient servant,

A. M. SCALES.

Hon. JOHN G. CARLISLE,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

COMMANDER JOHN W. QUACKENBUSH.

Mr. JORDAN. I desire unanimous consent to present for immediate consideration a bill which I ask may be read.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read subject to objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill touching the grade of commander in the Navy, and to correct an error in relation to an appointment therein.

Whereas John N. Quackenbush, a commander in the Navy of the United States, was on the 9th day of June, 1874, in pursuance and in mitigation of the sentence of a court-martial, suspended by the President of the United States for six years on furlough pay; and,

Whereas W. S. Schley was on June 10, 1874, nominated by the President of the United States as commander, instead of the said Quackenbush, and was by and with the advice and consent of the Senate appointed such commander, and the said Quackenbush was thereby deprived of his rank and position in the Navy; and

Whereas it was not the intention to deprive said Quackenbush of his rank or position in the Navy or dismiss him therefrom, and said action was taken and said dismissal made by inadvertence and mistake and great injustice was thereby done to said Quackenbush, and provision ought to be made authorizing the correction thereof: Now, therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States shall nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint a commander, who shall take rank and position in the Navy as and of the time of the suspension of said Quackenbush, any law now in force enacted since the date of said suspension notwithstanding; and such commander so appointed shall receive pay from the date when said suspension took place: Provided, however, That if the President shall nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint said Quackenbush as said commander he shall not receive any greater compensation for the period he was suspended than he did in fact receive during that time, but his rank and position shall be the same as if said dismissal had not been made.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. In the absence of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LYMAN], and in order to give him an opportunity of being heard on this matter, I am compelled to object.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not desire to cut off applications for unanimous consent, but when such requests have been disposed of I desire to be recognized to make a motion with the view to bringing up for consideration the Military Academy appropriation bill.

POLICE FORCE OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. POLAND. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for present consideration the bill (S. 1432) for the relief of the Metropolitan police force of the District of Columbia.

Mr. RANDALL. I must ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded, which is equivalent to an objection.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire not to lose the opportunity for the consideration of the Military Academy appropriation bill.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KEIFER. I move to dispense with the morning hour.

The motion was agreed to (two-thirds voting in favor thereof).

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of taking up for consideration the Military Academy appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. COX, of New York, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in committee, and the bill (H. R. 7577) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes, will be read the first time for information.

Mr. KEIFER. I move by unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the first reading of the bill for information be dispensed with.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not desire to occupy the time of the committee in any general discussion of this Military Academy appropriation bill. The appropriation I might say for this year, as reported by the Committee on Appropriations, is about $5,000 less than the bill which passed for the present fiscal year. The total appropriation for the year ending June 30, 1885, was $314,563.50, and the total amount reported in the pending bill is $309,771.64. I will observe further, Mr. Chairman, that the committee has reported an appropriation in this bill of $170,000 for the pay of cadets. This sum will provide for the pay of three hundred and fourteen cadets with a fraction over, but not sufficient for the pay of three hundred and fifteen cadets. The total number of cadets possible to be at the Military Academy is three hundred and forty-four. On the 1st day of September of the present year there were three hundred and fourteen cadets at the Military Academy. From various causes, failures, resignations, deaths, or otherwise, that number is always being reduced during the academic year. While there were three hundred and forty-four cadets at the beginning of the year, there is not likely to be that number during the year. The committee, therefore, from all circumstances were satisfied that the sum of $170,000 was sufficient for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886.

A MEMBER. How much is paid to the cadets?

Mr. KEIFER. The amount that is paid to each cadet each year is $540.

Now, Mr. Chairman, unless some gentleman on either side of the House desires to submit some general remarks on the subjects embraced in this bill, I will ask that the bill be read by paragraphs for amendment under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

For pay of cadets, $170,000; and no cadet shall receive more than at the rate of $540 a year.

Mr. KEIFER. At that point in the bill I desire to offer an amendment, which I desire the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And hereafter all appointments to the grade of second lieutenant in the Army shall be confined to the graduates of the Military Academy and to meritorious non-commissioned officers recommended for promotion in the manner now provided by law.

Mr. KEIFER. This amendment I will premise by saying, Mr. Chairman, has not been recommended by the Committee on Appropriations, from which this bill has come, but it has been recommended not only by the Superintendent of the West Point Academy, but also by the Secretary of War. In the report of the Superintendent of the Military Academy we find a statement made representing to the Committee on Appropriations that unless some change be made in the existing law there will be more graduates in the coming year than there will be vacancies in the Army to which they can be appointed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest that the gentleman from Ohio send up to the Clerk's desk and have read the amendment which he proposes.

Mr. KEIFER. It has already been read at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. HOLMAN. There has been so much confusion in the House that I was unable to hear, and I ask that it be again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again read the amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. That proposition is subject to a point of order, which I desire to reserve until the gentleman from Ohio is heard.

The CHAIRMAN. It is too late to reserve the point of order on the amendment, as it was offered and the gentleman from Ohio had proceeded to debate it for two or three minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust hereafter there will be a little more order in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Indiana that the disorder was in his immediate neighborhood. The Chair endeavored to call the House to order, but hereafter will see that better order and decorum are observed in that neighborhood. [Laughter.]

Mr. KEIFER. Let me say to the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. Chairman, that on examination he will find this amendment reduces the expenditures of the Government, and in that way is relieved from being subject to the point of order.

Now, the Superintendent of the academy calls attention to the large number of cadets, as we are told by the Secretary of War, in the class which will be graduated in June, 1886, the class now having eighty-three members, and he expresses the opinion that probably eighty will be graduated. Unless there shall be a change in the law it will not probably be possible for all of the class of 1886 to be appointed in the Army if any civilian appointments are made before their graduation, as the members of that class and the one which will be graduated next June, together with the non-commissioned officers to be appointed under existing laws, will probably be sufficient to take up all the vacancies which will occur in the two years. I will read from the report of the Superintendent of the Military Academy:

The class has now eighty-three members. Of these, making the usual allowances for casualties, from seventy-five to eighty, probably the latter number, will graduate and be for promotion. Unless something is done to hold open the vacancies in the Army from this time forward for the graduates of the academy a number of the class of 1886 will be required to go into civil life. If this were usual or necessary every year it could scarcely be considered a hardship, but occurring as it does once in a great length of time, through no fault of the class, but rather owing to ability, energy, and continuous application on the part of its members, something should be done to prevent their being unjustly affected by the law. A law permitting them to be attached to the Army as additional second lieutenants, provided that vacancies can not be reserved for them, would mitigate the hardship of the case.

The Secretary of War, calling attention to the same matter, says:

Under existing laws those cadets for whom there may be no vacancies existing in the Army at the time of their graduation must be discharged from the military service. For the last few years the law requiring that there shall be no civilian appointments into the Army until a sufficient number of vacancies exist to provide for the next graduating class has been literally complied with, civilian appointments into the Army having only been made to fill such vacancies as remained on July 1 of each year after the appointment of the graduating class of cadets and of meritorious non-commissioned officers recommended according to law, vacancies occurring on and after July 1 of each year being kept open. The Superintendent of the academy calls attention to the large number of cadets in the class which will be graduated in June, 1886, the class now having eighty-three members, and he expresses the opinion that probably eighty will be graduated. Unless there shall be a change in the law it will not probably be possible for all of the class of 1886 to be appointed into the Army if any civilian appointments are made before their graduation, as the members of that class and the one which will be graduated next June, together with non-commissioned officers to be appointed under existing laws, will probably be sufficient to take up all the vacancies which will occur in the two years.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the committee will observe it is not proposed to cut off from appointments to the Army non-commissioned officers now in the Army and who are recommended for promotion. But it is proposed to cut off by this amendment appointments purely from civil life, and to supply whatever vacancy hereafter may occur by graduates from the Military Academy at West Point. I wish to say these persons are graduated at a cost to the Government of the United States of $4,000 each, and it seems to me quite proper the Government of the United States should be entitled to their services by appointments in the Army.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, it is proper I should say that this amendment was not considered by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. KEIFER. That is true.

Mr. RANDALL. And it is all the more necessary I should say so from the fact that it is offered in the House by the gentleman from Ohio who is in charge of the Military Academy appropriation bill under the direction of the Appropriations Committee. I should much prefer the committee should have full time to consider the precise effect of such a change in the law than to have the whole subject precipitated in this informal way upon the House. I have no doubt in the world the gentleman's convictions prompt him to move action in this direction. The effect of this amendment, as he states it, is to cut off what no doubt has been maladministration in the past in respect to the character of men from civil life who have been appointed to positions in the Army to the exclusion, I believe, of the graduates from West Point.

It is a very delicate subject to deal with, taking away as it does from the President the power which he has heretofore exercised in the appointment of civilians to fill vacancies which may happen in the Army. Now, if that amendment had been considered by the Military Committee and we had had their judgment upon it, or even if it had been considered by the Committee on Appropriations, whence the bill comes, it might be moved with some propriety by them, but I think we should go slow in the matter of legislating as to the Army, and especially without some full understanding of the exact effect of the proposed legislation.

Mr. KEIFER. I suppose the debate is exhausted on the pending amendment, and for the purpose of adding a word to what I have already said I will move pro forma to strike out the last word.

It is true, as stated by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], that this matter was not brought before the whole committee. As a matter of fact, sir, my attention was not called to it until yesterday, and since then the committee had no meeting, so that it was impossible for me to submit it to them. The proposition is a plain and simple one, and therefore I felt at liberty to present it on my own motion to this committee. There is now a limitation of the right of the President to make appointments to the Army from civil life, and that is to fill vacancies in second lieutenancies in the Army existing on the 1st of July of each year by appointments from civil life. This is to take away that power, so that such vacancies hereafter shall be allowed to continue until the graduating class from West Point can supply them. And that is the whole of the proposition. If the graduating class is not sufficient, heretofore these positions have been filled by appointments from civil life; but it now appears that the cases are reversed, and that there are more graduates than there are vacancies to be filled. The amendment is recommended by the Superintendent of the West Point Military Academy and is also recommended by the Secretary of War. It is to avoid what may be humiliating to the cadets who may be graduated of being discharged at the very time when they have succeeded in passing their examination. It is to relieve them from any such humiliation of being discharged from the great military institution of the United States at the very moment they have passed all their trials and received their diplomas. The whole scope of the amendment is to prevent any such thing happening.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the pending proposition may be again read.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I rose when I first heard this proposition read for the purpose of making the point of order on it that it was not in order to this bill. Now that it is before the Committee of the Whole House I only desire to say this, that, as stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, this matter was not considered by the Committee on Appropriations when this bill was considered by that committee. It was for that reason, and that only, I desired to reserve the point of order on the proposition. As the subject is now before the Committee of the Whole House, however, I am not prepared to say, from a want of information on military questions of this kind and as the subject has not been heretofore considered, whether it is a measure which would be recommended by any committee of the House, the Committee on Military Affairs or the Committee on Appropriations, which reported this bill. But I trust, as the question is now up and inasmuch as it seems to be a fair and reasonable proposition, that gentlemen familiar with the subject, those familiar with the military organizations of the country and understanding the relations of the West Point Academy to the Army, will take occasion to express their views on the subject.

If it shall be found that this measure is in harmony with the views entertained by those familiar with this subject, although it has not been considered by the Committee on Appropriations, it might be found proper to give it a favorable consideration at this time. On its face it seems to be a reasonable proposition, but, as has been already intimated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania at the time the question of order was raised, because of the fact that it had not been considered by the committee having charge of the bill.

Mr. KEIFER. I withdraw my formal amendment.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I renew it; and I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that the effect of this amendment will be to limit the appointing power of the President of the United States from civil life to the Army, so that whatever vacancies may occur shall hereafter be filled by appointments of graduates from West Point. I see no great disadvantage in that limitation in time of peace. As a matter of fact appointments which have been made from civil life have been generally favorites of wealthy men and of influential men and of those who in no manner have been particularly distinguished or gifted for the discharge of the duties of army life. Inasmuch as the prospect now seems to be that the academy hereafter will graduate a sufficient number to supply all vacancies, in my judgment the amendment is one which ought to be adopted.

It will be noticed that ample provision is made by the amendment for the promotion of meritorious non-commissioned officers and soldiers who are recommended for promotion in the Army.

Mr. MAGINNIS. It ought to provide also for the promotion of privates.

Mr. RANDALL. I find the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs favors this amendment. I would like to know from him whether the subject has been formally considered by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. ROSECRANS. This matter has never been brought formally before our committee in any way. There has not been much conversation about it, but I was president of the Board of Visitors to the Military Academy when it was considered.

I do not remember any who dissented from the idea that it would be well, in view of the probable number of the next graduating classes of 1885–'86, that some provision should be made to cut off these civil appointments until the young men who had been prepared for the service had graduated and gone into service. The Military Committee, I will say to my honorable friend from Pennsylvania in response to his question, never had any formal consideration of the subject; but there were three members of the House, two of the Senate, and quite a number of distinguished gentlemen who were members of the Board of Visitors who did take into consideration the subject, and expressed the opinion that I now entertain.

I should like to move an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio by inserting also after the words "non-commissioned officers" the words "and enlisted men," so that it will embrace meritorious privates; and also the words "except during a foreign war," to be incorporated at the proper place.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment proposed by the gentleman from California.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the words "non-commissioned officers" the words "and enlisted men;" and insert at the end of the amendment the words "except during a foreign war;" so that as amended the proposed amendment will read:

"And hereafter all appointments to the grade of second lieutenant in the Army shall be confined to graduates of the Military Academy and to meritorious non-commissioned officers and enlisted men, recommended for promotion in the manner now provided by law, except during a foreign war."

Mr. KEIFER. I have certainly no objection to accepting the proposed modification of the gentleman from California.

The CHAIRMAN. The question then will be taken upon the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio as now modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For clerk to the disbursing officer and quartermaster, $1,200.

Mr. BEACH. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 75 strike out the words "two hundred dollars" and insert "$650;" so that it will read:

"For clerk to the disbursing officer and quartermaster, $1,650."

Mr. KEIFER. I make the point of order against that amendment.

Mr. BEACH. I hope the gentleman in charge of the bill will reserve the point of order until I have an opportunity of making a very brief statement in reference to this amendment.

Mr. KEIFER. I have no objection to hearing a statement, but reserve the right to make the point of order.

Mr. BEACH. I would like to take the sense of the full committee upon the simple act of justice involved in this amendment. Here we have a clerk who has filled the same position in the service of the Government for thirty-seven years, and he has filled it honestly and faithfully. His services are so efficient and his duties are so arduous and so responsible that I doubt very much if there can be found in the country to-day another person who would fill his place.

In 1877 his compensation was reduced from $1,650 to $1,200. I now want to restore it by this amendment, and I wish to say that I am always opposed to any increase of salaries, because I think as a general thing the Government is paying for its services more than they are worth; but all rules have their exceptions, and this is one of them. I doubt very much whether there is a business man in the country who would reduce the salary of so old, efficient, and faithful a clerk. This clerk, I will say for the information of the House, is the clerk to the treasurer and to the quartermaster, and for thirty-seven years he has stood guard, and so zealous has he been in the discharge of his duties to the Government that he has earned for himself and commonly goes by the name at the academy of the "old watch-dog;" and yet we are told by this Committee on Appropriations that his salary should be only $1,200 a year—not as much as we pay policemen around this building.

In view of his long, arduous, and faithful services, as well as his present and future usefulness, I think he is certainly entitled to receive, and I trust he will receive through the action of this House, his former salary. I hope, therefore, the gentleman from Ohio will not press his point of order, but will permit me to have at least a vote of the committee upon the amendment.

Mr. DUNHAM. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BEACH. Certainly.

Mr. DUNHAM. You say that we can not get along without this man?

Mr. BEACH. I said that it would be difficult for the Government to find a person to fill his place, certainly at that salary. He has been there, as I have said, for thirty-seven years, and his duties are not only of an arduous but peculiar nature.

Mr. DUNHAM. I misunderstood you, then. I thought the gentleman stated that we could not get along without this man, and I asked the question because I wanted to know in case this man should die where we would be. [Laughter.]

Mr. KEIFER. I would not object to the proposed amendment except for the precedent it would set in a large number of other cases. I feel bound, therefore, to make the point of order that it changes existing law and does not retrench expenditures.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair observes that the amount fixed in this bill is the same as that provided by the last annual appropriation bill for this purpose. The proposed amendment increases this amount. It is therefore subject to the point of order, and the Chair must sustain it.

The Clerk will report the next paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

For department of drawing: For books of reference, periodicals on art and technology, $100; models for topographical, mechanical, architectural, and free-hand drawing, $250; rules and triangles, $30; repairs to desks, models, racks, stools, stretchers, $100; drawing material for use of instructors, card-board, tacks, brushes, sponges, glue, alcohol, transfer-paper, hectograph, cloth for screens, color-diagrams, and contingent expenses, $200; stationery, $10; photographic slides for use in lectures, $175; continuing the decorated frieze, paneling, and painting wall to correspond to rest of room, $250; in all, $1,234.50.

Mr. KEIFER. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk to come in at the end of line 134.

The Clerk read as follows:

For department of law: For text-books and stationery, and for books of reference for the use of instructors, $250.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, that I believe is subject to the point of order.

Mr. KEIFER. I apprehend that there will be no objection to this amendment if it is understood.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will not press the point of order.

Mr. KEIFER. Last year there was a clause in the Military Academy appropriation bill for text-books and stationery and books of reference for the use of instructors, $250, for the department of law. That is the amendment just read by the Clerk.

The reason it was not in the bill in its original preparation, or was not put in the bill by the Committee on Appropriations, was that there was no estimate made for any appropriation for the law department at the academy. The attention of the committee was called to this fact, but for the reason I have assigned, namely, that there was no estimate, nothing was put in the bill. The Secretary of War advises me by letter that there was an accident about it somewhere—he did not know where when he wrote me the letter of the date of the 8th instant.

On yesterday I received from the Secretary of War a telegram reading thus:

I have just heard, by telegram, from the Superintendent of the Military Academy that the omission of the estimate of $250 for text-books for the law department was a clerical error.

And I am requested by the Secretary of War to have this inserted in the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. It is proper to say that, unlike the other amendment which has been agreed to, this proposition was considered in the committee; the other was not considered. This amendment was considered and was disagreed to. I hope it will be voted down. I do not think we need make that change on this bill. There is a professor there under large pay, and this is a proposition which results in making the office a permanent one.

Mr. FORNEY. I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] is under a misapprehension. This is an estimate which was overlooked in making the original estimates.

Mr. RANDALL. I did not hear the amendment distinctly, and I supposed it related to an amendment which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] has given me notice he means to offer.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the amendment be again read.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. KEIFER. It is the usual appropriation. I think there will be no objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair suggests that the total at the end of the section be changed to correspond with the amendment just adopted.

Mr. KEIFER. That can be done. I now offer an amendment to come in immediately after the amendment just adopted; and this is the amendment the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] had in his mind.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of the paragraph the following:
"Provided, That hereafter the professor of law shall be appointed in the same manner as the other professors in the Military Academy."

Mr. HOLMAN. On that proposition I reserve the point of order.

Mr. KEIFER. There are now at the Military Academy eight professors. One is a professor of the department of law, and he is the sole professor that is a detailed or assigned officer. All of the other professorships are permanent appointments. This is the only department in the Military Academy where changes must of necessity take place very frequently, as there can not be any permanent appointment under existing law.

In 1874 the department of law was provided for by statute, but an officer from the department of justice of the Army was authorized to be detailed to fill that place, and since 1874 the place has been filled by a detail. There are seven other professorships, but they are permanent appointments, and those professors hold their appointments indefinitely, so that they can organize their departments and bring them to one harmonious system, making them permanent and valuable to the Government. The Secretary of War makes a recommendation in his report this year on this very subject and in this language:

One of the most important duties of an officer is the administration of justice under the military code. I believe that it would be highly beneficial to the Army if the instruction in legal principles given at the Military Academy were placed in charge of a professor of law of the same rank and tenure as is held by the other professors, and I recommend legislation which will accomplish that result.

Now, while we have permanent officers with a permanent tenure, as professor of drawing, professor of engineering, professor of modern languages, &c., we have merely a detailed officer for the department of law, and the whole purpose of this proposed amendment is to give us a professor of law whose tenure of office is exactly like that of a professor of drawing or of modern languages. We are creating no new office. If the point of order is to be debated, I reserve the right to speak upon it. But it is exceedingly important, I think, in view of the great dignity of the place, that this department should be at least presided over by a person of equal rank to that of the men who instruct in the departments of drawing and of modern languages. I believe that all the officers of the Army should be accomplished officers, and, as far as it is possible that such instruction can be given in a public institution, that they should be accomplished in the matter of law. These officers are often obliged to determine important questions of law. They may all be required at some time or other to sit as judges, if not to act as judge-advocates, and it is important that they should receive the necessary instruction from a permanent professor.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to say, first, as to the point of order, that professors in the academy are now given the pay which attaches to the rank of a colonel, provided they have held their positions for ten years; if they have been there for less than ten years they are paid the salary of a lieutenant-colonel, which in almost every instance is an increase of pay. I say this much on the point of order to show that this is not a change in the direction of retrenchment.

As to the merits of the proposition, I wish to say in addition to what I have already said on the other amendment but pertinent to this one, that I agree that all officers of the Army should be well educated in international law. I hold that the existing provision of law is sufficient for that purpose. The officer detailed now to this professorship is, I believe, competent to give the necessary instruction to the cadets in international law.

This is a proposition, however, which goes to the extent of making, instead of a temporary detail, a permanent assignment—creating, in fact, a new professorship—making nine professors in all, instead of eight. The committee considered this matter and was adverse to the change proposed. I hope, therefore, that the amendment will not (at this time at least) prevail.

Mr. HOLMAN. Upon the point of order I wish to say that this proposition on its face appears neither to increase nor to diminish expenditures, so that as it is a change of existing law it must be subject to the point of order, because it does not retrench expenditures. In fact, however, from the statement made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] it will be seen that the tendency of this proposition is to increase expenditures, inasmuch as it makes this officer permanent, giving him the full benefit of the longevity pay provided for by general law, while now the assignment is made for a term not exceeding four years.

It is very possible that this proposition, when it comes to be thoroughly considered, may be found to be a proper one. But it has not yet been properly considered. It has received but partial consideration by any committee of the House, so far as I am informed. Up to this time the lectures on law delivered at West Point have generally been regarded as emanating from competent and sufficient professors, although they have not been permanent professors, but assigned from time to time to this duty. The very fact of a temporary assignment may indeed be beneficial. Legal study in this institution embraces, of course, a comparatively limited field. I hardly think it would extend beyond international law and the duties of courts-martial. A long experience under the present system of making temporary assignments for instruction in this branch would indicate that up to the present time the existing system in this field of learning at that institution has been satisfactory. I shall, therefore, be compelled to insist on the point of order.

Mr. KEIFER. I desire to be heard on the point of order. The suggestion made against this amendment by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. RANDALL] is, as I understand, that if an officer were permanently appointed to this professorship it would lead to an increase of salary. That was the gentleman's statement, if I understood him aright. Now, I wish to say that such can not be the fact. This bill itself, in lines 7 and 8, appropriates for the payment of a professor of law at the Military Academy at the same rate that we appropriate for the other seven professors. So that the question now is simply whether we shall create a professor of law at that institution who shall have a permanent tenure. In the present bill we appropriate for the payment of eight professors—professors respectively of engineering, drawing, chemistry, modern languages, ethics, mathematics, natural philosophy, and law. These professors, under section 1336 of the Revised Statutes, are all paid as lieutenant-colonels. So that the question now is not as to giving the officer any increased pay or establishing a new professorship, but simply as to making the professor of law a permanent officer, in accordance, as I have said, with the recommendation of the Secretary of War, the Superintendent of the Military Academy, and all other officers who have looked into this question. I am informed that the present professor of law recommends this change, although he expects himself to go out of the office; he does not desire to be continued. He suggests, however, various difficulties to which this department of study is now subjected.

If you will permit me, sir, I will call attention more particularly to the state of the law on this subject. In 1874 there was attached to the Military Academy appropriation bill a clause which read thus:

Provided, That the Secretary of War may assign one of the judge-advocates of the Army to be professor of law.

This professorship was then first created. In June, 1880, a clause in the following language was attached to the Military Academy appropriation bill:

For department of law, provided that the Secretary of War may in his discretion assign any officer of the Army as professor of law.

That opened the field so that assignments might be made otherwise than from the Department of Military Justice. The Secretary of War may now assign any officer of the Army to fill the chair of professor of law at West Point. What I desire to accomplish by my amendment is simply to give this officer a permanent tenure. He is now paid as the other professors are, under section 1336 of the Revised Statutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule on the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. On the point of order I wish to say one word in addition. It is conceded that this professor of law, if we make the professorship permanent, must be paid at least as much as the present compensation; so that though the proposition upon its face does not increase expenditure, it certainly does not diminish it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] who offers this amendment has stated that its effect is to change the tenure of this office, making it permanent. This is a change of law. By Rule XXI, third section, second paragraph, it is not necessary that an amendment offered to a bill of this nature should increase expenditures in order to be obnoxious to the point of order. If it changes existing law and does not reduce expenditures it comes within the inhibition of the rule. This amendment proposes to change the law and makes no reduction of expenditures. Therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. KEIFER. I move that the committee rise and report the bill and amendments favorably to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COX, of New York, reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7577) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back with a recommendation that it be passed with amendments.

Mr. KEIFER. I move the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 34 insert the following:
And hereafter all appointments to the grade of second lieutenant in the Army shall be confined to graduates of the Military Academy and to meritorious non-commissioned officers and enlisted men recommended for promotion in the manner now provided by law, except during a foreign war.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, there were—ayes 55, noes 89.

Mr. KEIFER. We had better have the yeas and nays on this amendment, and I therefore make the demand for them.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 88, nays 152, not voting 83; as follows:

Mr. ERMENTROUT with Mr. OCHILTREE.

Mr. WOODWARD with Mr. PHELPS, on this vote.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The remaining amendment of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was then agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. This being one of the general appropriation bills the rule requires that the vote on its passage shall be taken by yeas and nays.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 232, nays 0, not voting 91; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

During the roll-call the following additional pairs were announced from the Clerk's desk:

Mr. MILLER, of Texas, with Mr. WELLER, on this vote.

Mr. BLAND with Mr. VALENTINE.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. KEIFER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DISTRIBUTION OF THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. MORRISON. I move, Mr. Speaker, that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the President's annual message with a view of offering a resolution to the House for its distribution to the several committees.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRISON. I move the following resolution for the distribution of the President's annual message to the several committees of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That so much of the annual message of the President and the documents which accompany it as relates to the public debt and the public revenue, to the national finances, to the revenue provisions of the reciprocity treaties with Hawaii, Mexico, and Spain, and to the commercial relations with foreign countries having connection with revenue questions, be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

That so much as relates to the appropriation and expenditure of the public moneys be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

That so much as relates to the judiciary of the United States be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

That so much as relates to the currency and to national banking associations be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

That so much as relates to the coinage and to the mints of the United States be referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

That so much as relates to the regulation of interstate commerce and to the regulation of international commerce be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

That so much as relates to the improvement of rivers and harbors be referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

That so much as relates to agriculture and the preservation of the forests be referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

That so much as relates to the treaty with Nicaragua authorizing the construction by the United States of a canal, railway, and telegraph line across the Nicaraguan territory, to affairs between the Government of the United States and the governments of foreign nations, the regulation of the consular and diplomatic service, and to the violation of the laws relating to Chinese immigration be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

That so much as relates to the Army and to providing an armament for defense on the seacoast be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

That so much as relates to the Navy and the reconstruction of the naval service be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

That so much as relates to postal affairs and to the reduction of the existing rates of postage be referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

That so much as relates to the public lands be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

That so much as relates to the care, education, and management of the Indians be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

That so much as relates to the organization and government of the Territories be referred to the Committee on the Territories.

That so much as relates to the care and improvement of public buildings and grounds in the District of Columbia be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

That so much as relates to the Pacific Railroads, except as herein otherwise provided, be referred to the Committee on Pacific Railroads.

That so much as relates to illiteracy and education be referred to the Committee on Education.

That so much as relates to patents be referred to the Committee on Patents.

That so much as relates to the pensions be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

That so much as relates to the District of Columbia be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

That so much as relates to civil-service reform be referred to the Select Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

That so much as relates to the revival of American ship-building be referred to the Select Committee on American Ship-building and Ship-owning Interests.

That so much as relates to legislation in reference to Presidential succession be referred to the Select Committee on Law Respecting the Election of President and Vice-President.

Mr. MORRISON. I move the adoption of the resolutions.

The resolutions were adopted.

Mr. MORRISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WILLIE S. HOWARD.

Mr. COVINGTON, from the Committee on Accounts, reported back the following resolution with the recommendation that it do pass:

Resolved, That Willie S. Howard, authorized to be employed as page at the first session of this Congress and assigned to duty at the subcommittee room of the Committee on Appropriations, be appointed to such employment during the present session, and that he be paid out of any contingent fund of the House the same compensation as other pages of the House from December 1, 1884.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. COVINGTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COMPENSATION OF UNITED STATES ATTORNEYS, ETC.

Mr. SPRINGER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 7675) relating to the compensation and duties of the United States attorneys, marshals, and other court officials, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KEIFER. I am under the impression that bill should go to the Committee on the Judiciary, which has jurisdiction of the whole subject.

Mr. SPRINGER. No; the subject has been under investigation for a long time by the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice. At the last session on suggestion of that committee there was included in the sundry civil appropriation bill provisions covering the subject-matters of this bill.

Mr. KEIFER. I think properly under the ruling heretofore the bill should go to the Committee on the Judiciary. It certainly does not belong to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice. I ask the attention of the Chair to the subject.

Mr. SPRINGER. As I have already stated, this bill embraces precisely the same points contained in the sundry civil appropriation bill of the last session of Congress. In the distribution of the President's annual message the subject was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice.

The SPEAKER. The rule of the House provides that—

The examination of the accounts and expenditures of the several Departments of the Government and the manner of keeping the same; the economy, justness, and correctness of such expenditures; their conformity with appropriation laws; the proper application of public moneys; the security of the Government against unjust and extravagant demands; retrenchment; the enforcement of the payment of moneys due to the United States; the economy and accountability of public officers; the abolishment of useless offices; the reduction or increase of the pay of officers, shall all be subjects within the jurisdiction of the eight standing committees on the public expenditures in the several Departments, as follows.

Now, this seems to relate to the pay of district attorneys, United States marshals, and other United States officers, and the Chair thinks under the proper construction of the rule the bill should go to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice.

ANTWERP EXPOSITION.

Mr. PHELPS, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 297) to enable the people of the United States to participate in the exposition to be held at Antwerp in the year 1885; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REAR-ADMIRALS.

Mr. COX, of New York, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back the following resolution, with the recommendation that it do pass:

Resolved, That the President be requested to furnish this House, as early as convenient, with the necessary information showing the authority of law for which certain commodores of the Navy have been given rank of acting rear-admirals when, as is alleged, no vacancy existed to justify such action.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. COX, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PENSIONS TO MEXICAN SOLDIERS.

Mr. REAGAN. I now call up the interstate-commerce bill, which is the special order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Before the gentleman proceeds to the consideration of the special order I would like to inquire when he proposes to call the previous question.

Mr. REAGAN. There are four or five members of the committee who yet desire to speak on this subject, and I can not with justice demand the previous question until they shall be heard. At the furthest but little more time will be consumed in the discussion, and perhaps it may be disposed of to-morrow or the day after.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I wish to give notice, then, that after the disposition of the interstate-commerce bill to-morrow or the day after, as it shall happen, I will move to go to the Speaker's table for the purpose of taking up and passing the bill pensioning soldiers of the Mexican war.

HOLIDAY ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MORRISON. I ask by unanimous consent to submit the following resolution, for reference to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That when the two Houses adjourn on Tuesday, December 23, 1884, they adjourn until Monday, the 5th of January, 1885.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. REAGAN. I now call up the special order, which is the interstate-commerce bill.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business being called for, the House resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5461) to establish a board of commissioners of interstate commerce and to regulate such commerce, and the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. STEWART] has the floor.

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, I had supposed at this date in the nineteenth century that no question could be made as to the constitutional power of Congress to deal with the subject embraced in these bills before the House. It is too late for that. The Constitution has proved elastic enough to meet more urgent emergencies than this. The occupation of the strict constructionist is gone. If we hear anything from him now and then it comes with a qualification which yields gracefully whenever the Constitution is stretched for the benefit of his particular section. We have not only the specific clause of the Constitution under which these bills are introduced, which gives to Congress the power to regulate interstate commerce, but we have that other general clause of the Constitution, to which in emergencies we can fall back—the general-welfare clause. We have, beyond that, the doctrine to which the Supreme Court has more than hinted in a recent decision that Congress has power to do anything which the Constitution does not forbid.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is no part of my purpose to consume the time of this House in the discussion of any constitutional question, or the constitutional right of Congress to deal with this subject. It is a subject whose importance is commensurate with its magnitude, and its magnitude is as wide as the country itself. We have 125,000 miles of railway, represented by twelve hundred different corporations. With two or three exceptions, these corporations are the creatures of State Legislatures and subject to State laws.

These roads ramify and extend all over the continent. They touch the interests of every man, woman, and child in the country. There is not a producer, a manufacturer, a consumer, a laborer, however humble, that is not interested in the question before the House. Further than that, the securities of these 125,000 miles of railway, representing $7,000,000,000 of money at the actual cash value of the roads today, are in the savings institutions, in the stockings, in the depositories of securities in every hamlet in the land, and anything which affects the value of these securities, any legislation which can affect them in any way, ought to be most carefully drawn and cautiously considered.

How shall we deal with this great question? It is a most intricate problem, and though men may think otherwise, when they have come to give it careful study and investigation they will find serious difficulties involved in any attempt to regulate it by legislation.

How shall it be done? Two methods are proposed in substance by the two bills before the House. Both recognize the necessity of remedial legislation to correct existing abuses and, as far as may be, to overcome their liability to recurrence. The duty of the carrier may be expressed in a single sentence: His charges should be reasonable, and, as between his customers, just and equitable. And this comprises the whole of it.

The violation of this plain principle furnishes the only just ground of complaint. So far we all agree. The friends of the respective bills before the House are in disagreement as to the method, and as it seems to me the methods proposed by these two bills are radically different. The bill reported from the committee affirms and emphasizes the common law principle governing common carriers, forbids their violation, provides penalties, and affords sure and speedy relief therefor. It recognizes the existence of those natural principles of commercial law which antedate statutes, and which inspire all wise legislation; and it undertakes to work with and supplement them. On the other hand, the substitute bill thrusts into this intricate problem artificial, arbitrary, and inflexible rules not of universal application, and which in many cases, in my judgment, would work the very mischiefs sought to be remedied. I refer to the provisions of the substitute bill which forbid absolutely a greater charge for a short than for a long haul; which absolutely prohibit rebates and drawbacks, as well as the combinations denominated pools.

Mr. Speaker, there is no real antagonism between the carrier and the customer, and this fundamental truth should not be lost sight of. The real interest of the carrier is to stimulate production. His prosperity is but the echo of the general prosperity on his line of transportation. No man knows better than the intelligent carrier that his dividends depend upon the general thrift of the people whom he serves. If his rates are fixed so high as to depress business and discourage enterprise his next balance-sheet will make sure reminder of his error. This is the first law which applies upon this great subject and influences the result. There is a community and a reciprocity of interest—actual, real interest—between the carrier and the customer. Then come in the laws of competition, which are constantly at work to modify and correct injustice and to produce a correct result. The roads compete with one another, they compete with water ways, they compete with Canadian corporations, they compete in the market to which the product is sent. The competition in foreign markets of the product they carry is in itself an element which enters into the problem.

Now, these are the great regulators of railroad traffic: First, the reciprocal interest between the carrier and the customer, which is an ever-present existing fact which every intelligent man must recognize. Secondly, this law of competition which, like the law of supply and demand, is unceasingly at work. These, I say, are the two regulators, Mr. Speaker, of this great subject, the law of reciprocal advantages between the carrier and the customer. The laws of trade which flow from competition are as constant in operation as the law of gravity itself; and in spite of the greed of contending managers, in spite of the insolence and arrogance and the blind unwisdom of men, they are constantly and effectually at work to correct abuses and to make proper equation between apparent conflicting interests.

Mr. Speaker, the only healthy and wise system of law which can work successfully and effectively in the solution of this problem is that which works with the natural law. Men can employ the great agencies of nature—steam, electricity, and the like—and produce grand results, and they do it by working with the laws which govern these forces and not against them. There is what I might describe in this railroad system, as there is in every social system, a principle which answers to what the physiologists denominate the vis medicatrix in the human system; to paraphrase a famous saying of Matthew Arnold, there is a power in the social system which makes for health and for the correction of abuses. It is a constantly working force, and if men had patience oftentimes to await the solution of vexing problems through these natural laws, the cure, wrought slowly perhaps, but surely, as nature ever works, would be final and effective.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House for a moment to the reasoning, which seems to me unanswerable, applicable to those clauses which the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Commerce insists upon ingrafting upon our legislation. He says, in the first place, that no railway in this country in the conduct of interstate commerce shall charge more for a short than for a long haul. As has been said, that seems to be just; as a general rule or as a general principle applicable to railroad traffic it is just. But it is not universally true; and if it is not universally true it should not be applied as an inflexible rule of law to the government of railways. They should be left to the laws of trade and of commerce and to the natural and healthful operation of those laws for the correction of the abuse, if there is any abuse, growing out of the violation of this general principle. Its rigid application would often result injuriously both to carrier and shipper. There is a lurking fallacy in the principle contended for. It takes into account only a single factor in a complex problem, to wit, distance. Rates, either direct or relative, can not be fixed by that standard alone.

It is not true that the short-haul shipper is wronged because he pays a higher rate for a less distance than the more distant shipper who lives at the point of competition. He is only wronged when he pays more than a reasonable rate for the service rendered him, taking into account all the circumstances of the situation, the reasonableness of the cost of the service to the short-haul shipper, the undoubted right of the railroad to fix rates at a standard sufficient to defray expenses and pay a fair profit on the plant, the relative advantage of position of the short and long haul shipper through natural causes, the necessities which the law of competition at important points thrusts upon the carrier, a due consideration to the general good which may be advanced without wrong to the citizen or the railway—these are some of the many factors which enter into the problem presented.

Take the illustration referred to by my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG]—and it is a very good one; one that was used before the committee. A railway from New Orleans to Memphis passes at an intermediate point an internal station called Winona. The Winona man pays, say, $2.50 per bale for the transportation of his cotton from that point to New Orleans. The railway company says to shippers of cotton at Memphis, "We will take your cotton at $1 per bale to New Orleans in competition with the river and make a small profit." The shipper there says, "I will not send my cotton by your railway unless you take it at that price, because I can send it by barge or by steamer at that price or less"—75 cents per bale, I think, was the rate.

Mr. WOODWARD. One dollar.

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. Very well; what will the railway manager do under those circumstances? The application of the Reagan bill would say he shall not take that freight from Memphis. Does it do any harm to the shipper at Winona? Nobody pretends it harms him. If the railway charges no more than the service is actually worth to him, and no more than they are entitled to charge under their charter for the performance of the service, who is wronged? If the railway makes a small profit by taking this cotton from Memphis, it is for the benefit not only of the railway, but of the local shipper, because it enables the railway under those circumstances to give better terms to the local shipper. Everything which swells income, everything which gives increased competition to those who have cotton to ship, is an advantage to the State of Mississippi. And I say that where there is a general advantage in a railway policy, and nobody is hurt, the application of this principle would work disastrously. It is for that reason I am opposed to it.

Nor is it true universally, Mr. Speaker, that because railways under these circumstances can afford to carry that freight from Memphis for a dollar to New Orleans, therefore they can afford to carry the local freight at the same rate. That is not true. There is not a railway man in the United States that would not deny it. I do not suppose that the gentlemen on this floor who advocate this bill will stand up here and say that all the railway men in the United States who have uttered any sentiment on this subject, the most honorable men, the most upright men, as well as the most enterprising men, representing these great interests in this country, would come before this committee and stultify themselves and falsify for the sake of this advantage. These experts represent to us that they can take freight, for example in the instance I have named, from the city of Memphis to the city of New Orleans and can make a small profit on it, because they say, "We have our roadway, we have our plant, we have our cars, we have our employés, and we can take this, and make on the whole a small profit; now let us do it." But this bill reported as a substitute, omitting to take into account this matter of competition, omitting to take into account the general interests of all concerned, undertakes to put an absolute, arbitrary, and inflexible rule into this delicate and intricate machinery, a rule which will work the very wrong intended to be remedied.

There is another illustration cited to the committee. The railways from New York to the city of New Orleans dare to compete with coastwise carriers to that point. Do we not desire to encourage competition? Do you wish to destroy competition? How can those railroads compete? Only in one way—by putting the through rates from New York to New Orleans at 76 cents a ton. The railway rate from New York to Atlanta is $1 a ton. Has the Atlanta man any right to complain if the railroad company imposes only a reasonable charge for the service rendered him? That is all he has a right to claim; and no fair-minded man, it seems to me, who looks that proposition squarely in the face, can deny it. That is a just principle, which should govern the relations between the shipper and the railroad manager. The shipper at Atlanta will not get his freight any cheaper if you say the railroad company shall not carry freight for a little less to the city of New Orleans. On the contrary, the ability of the railroad to give him cheaper rates is cut off, and competition to New Orleans is rendered impossible.

It is not true that the local freight is taxed in order that the railroads may carry through freight at a less rate; and I undertake to say, Mr. Speaker, that in this widely extended country, where terminal points are so remote from each other, and where the transportation of a vast amount of freight at minimum rates is constantly necessary, the application of this rule will work nothing but injury to the great interests of the country.

Now, in regard to rebates, the clause in the bill reported by the committee is carefully guarded. It is said that rebates are always, absolutely and unconditionally, an evil—unjust and wrong in principle. Why, Mr. Speaker, there is not any abstract rule applicable to this subject anywhere. This is the most practical question that ever confronted human intelligence. If men straddle abstractions, if they insist upon resting in abstractions on this subject, they are likely to go astray. The question is, how does this matter work in practice? Is it true that a rebate is absolutely, essentially, and under all circumstances wrong? I deny it. Instances have been shown before the committee, and instances can be mentioned before this House, which absolutely disprove it.

Now here are eight or ten—I think eight—great trunk railroads running eastward from Chicago to the New York market. They compete with each other. There is no difficulty in each road making independently its own rates. I make a rate this morning with the Erie road for one hundred car-loads of pork from Chicago to New York with a narrow margin of profit. My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. RANNEY] makes a rate on the same day for the same kind and amount of freight to New York by the New York Central Railroad. I send mine at 75 cents a hundred; he sends his at 50 cents a hundred. There is no common understanding. The Reagan bill says there shall not be any. The Reagan bill says there shall be no combination which shall prevent this injurious competition, this competition which works the worst kind of discrimination between the dealers in the same article. What then? How can this matter be corrected? Shall I go to New York, and when I discover that another man has an advantage of 25 cents a hundred over me go to the railroad company and say, "I suppose you intend to do business on fair principles as regards your neighbors?" The company says, "Certainly." "Then I want you to give me a rebate which shall put me on an equality with my friend, who from another company has obtained a less rate." Is there any injustice in that? Does it not wipe out the very discrimination which is sought to be obviated in this bill? If you adopt the rigid rule of the Reagan bill the hands of the railroad companies are tied, and they can not correct such a wrong.

Again, take the matter of exports. The Reagan bill says that the railroad companies shall not vary from their published tariffs; that when they have agreed upon a tariff they must not change it. They can not change their tariff very often; they can not change it without notice. Now, suppose products designed for export go to New York, and then it is found they can not be exported and meet competition in foreign markets unless the rates are reduced, are you going to cut off the foreign market from the Western producer and say peremptorily, absolutely, and arbitrarily that the railroad companies shall not make a rebate in order that these producers may ship their freight to Liverpool? That is the effect of the provision of the Reagan bill—the inevitable effect of it. The testimony of every intelligent railroad-man goes to this point. Are you going to say in the first place that the railways shall not combine to fix rates, shall not form what is called a "pool," in order to avoid this injurious competition (of which I shall have a word to say presently), and then say further that when freight reaches the seaport from which it is designed to be shipped the companies shall not make a rebate in order that the producer may export it and find a market for it? Are you going to tie the hands of the railroad companies so that produce shall rot at the seaport or at the point from which it would be sent because it can not be exported? Is there any wisdom in the application of such an inflexible rule as that?

Take the case of staves, the case already referred to. These railroads carry staves to New York, all of them, at the same rate. They are not at liberty to vary their tariff, and ought not to do so. Now, suppose I am an exporter of staves in New York and my friend from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] is a dealer in staves there. I can not export those staves to compete with the European dealer in that article unless the railroad will give me a rebate. Does it hurt him if they give me a rebate under those circumstances, and allow me to find a market abroad when I can not get one at home?

Is this the encouragement of American commerce? Is this the proper regulation of interstate commerce? I deny it.

Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. Certainly.

Mr. REAGAN. Would it not be just to allow the same rebate allowed to one person to another person hauling the same goods over the same route?

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. That depends. In the case I suppose it would be just, because the staves exported and on which rebate was allowed would not in any sense interfere with the regular market or prejudice any consignee.

Mr. REAGAN. Then why not give all persons interested in the same trade—and I do not wish to be considered as interfering with my friend's argument, but if he wishes to accomplish the object which he seems to seek, that of reduction of freight charges—why, let me ask, not give the same rebate to all persons engaged in hauling the same character of commodities? Why punish one part of the people by advantages bestowed upon all others?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The Judge should put his question this way: Would it not be unjust to not allow this rebate to another man shipping staves to the same market when it is allowed to one man?

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. As I have stated in the case suggested, if rebate was given to the other man then it would be unjust.

Mr. REAGAN. On the principle for which I am contending the application of a rebate should be made to all persons at the same time doing the same sort of business. That places everybody on terms of equality and will allow advantage to no one person or persons to the disadvantage of any others. Let me ask the gentleman whether it would not be safer and better to reduce freights to all—that is, that the railways should make their schedules lower to the extent at least to which they allow rebate?

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. That suggests the very difficulty of dealing with it by arbitrary legislation. If you put the freight so low so the exporter can export his staves, you put them so low the business at home is done at loss to the railway. As was in evidence before the committee, they gave an exporter of staves a rebate because they desired to encourage foreign commerce. They would have made more money by holding the exporter of staves to the tariff price, but they gave him a rebate not for their own advantage but for the general advantage, and it harmed nobody. Will it be pretended a principle which works practically in favor of an increased exportation, which widens the market of American commerce, is an injurious principle when it harms nobody? Tariffs are constantly fluctuating, because tariffs have to follow prices and prices fluctuate in the market. So far as the foreign markets are concerned they govern prices. You can not export wheat from Chicago to Liverpool without reference to the price of wheat in Liverpool. That is one of the elements which enters into the problem and helps to settle and regulate it, and it is one of the reasons why the railroads are unable to charge arbitrarily a high price. They are governed because they are under these laws which they can not repeal.

Now I come to the consideration for one moment of the subject of competition—a subject which I think is not thoroughly understood; I certainly never understood it until I turned my attention to it—I mean in its application to the railway traffic. Competition is a thing which we all desire. We want to cultivate it. The elements of competition in the railway system of this country are fixed and sure, and no legislation can repeal them. There is not a great transcontinental line from the seaboard to the Mississippi or from the lakes to the Gulf that is not controlled, absolutely controlled, by this competition in the fixing of the rates. The water rates control the railway, for they can not charge without reference to the water rates. The water rates compete with them. The railroads compete with the great water ways, the lakes, the Welland Canal, the Erie Canal, the Ohio River, the Mississippi River, the Cumberland River, and the Tennessee River. Everything that affects either one of these great lines affects them all.

The moment the price drops in Chicago it must drop at Indianapolis and at Saint Louis and at Louisville; and whenever the price drops in Liverpool it must drop all along the line or else the traffic will be diverted from them. Otherwise the great trunk lines running east would have the traffic diverted from them and shipments would run crosswise to the line which gives the cheapest rates. There is no doubt of that. It is an interlacing and interdependence of interests multitudinous and conflicting, and which the enactments of man in the cold, frigid, stern rules of law, I undertake to say, can not successfully control or govern.

Now, competition within certain limits is properly competition; but when such competition, so called, transcends certain limits it ceases to be competition in the proper sense of the word and becomes war, reckless and ruinous to all interests. Roads should and do compete down to a point where they can carry traffic at the lowest rate which will enable them to pay a reasonable profit upon it; but the moment they go below that rate it ceases to be competition, and if it be called competition when it reaches a figure below that point, then it becomes an injury not only to the roads but to the business of the country. That is so obvious a proposition that it goes without saying. You make your rates to-day with one road, and under the circumstances I have suggested they are 40 cents lower before night, and somebody else gets the benefit of the different rate. The shipper of the same sort of goods on the same day—if you have a railroad war, which some denominate competition—the shippers of the same character of goods, the shippers of the same articles precisely on the same day, may get a rate varying from $1 to 10 cents, or nothing. That, I maintain, is not competition. It is not the competition that the Congress of the United States should encourage. It unsettles values; it induces wild speculation; it bankrupts railroads, and bankrupt railroads are of no service in this country. We have had 20,000 miles of such roads, of which the stock has been entirely wiped out.

Now, how shall we correct the evil? There is nothing in the Reagan bill, so called, to correct it. There is a principle there which, on the contrary, absolutely forbids every attempt to correct it. Now, I am not in favor, Mr. Speaker, of an unconditional and absolute surrender of this subject to a combination of railroad-men to do what they please in the way of pooling or otherwise. I am as well aware as any man can be that there is a possibility of combination (though it is extremely improbable and never yet has been done, in my judgment certainly there is no proof before the committee that it ever took place), but a possibility of combinations between railroads which would have the effect of raising prices of freights beyond a just and reasonable and proper charge for the service. If any such instances ever occurred, I say there is no evidence before the committee.

Mr. Speaker, how shall competition, which degenerates into ruinous and destructive wars on all interests, be overcome or prevented?

Well, I confess, sir, that, studying the problem for many months as I have, I can not see any possible way by which it can be overcome except by these very combinations. Combination within certain limitations is just as legitimate as competition; and these two opposing principles, if rightly balanced, will regulate the whole subject. There is no doubt of it. If you have eight trunk lines running from Chicago to the seaboard, and they are cutting rates and unsettling the market, unsettling values, inducing wild speculations where the chances can not be calculated, and bankrupting themselves, what is the result? It may be said that they do it voluntarily. Very well; that is the law of human nature. If one road cuts the rates it will get the freight unless the other roads cut the rates too; and then when another road cuts a little lower the others must follow or lose the business. What is the remedy? Why, there is no cure except in a common agreement between the roads as to the rates and a determined policy of standing by them without violation. If they do that nobody has the right to complain. If they abuse the power and fix exorbitant, unjust, unreasonable rates everybody has the right to complain. Why here come in and apply all of the principles to which I have already alluded—the competitive water way, the market abroad? Rival roads working together to establish and maintain reasonable rates form a combination of competitive elements. Such a combination, under the safeguards guaranteed by the amendment proposed by Mr. SEYMOUR, the gentleman from Connecticut, furnishes, in my judgment, the only practical method of prevention of railroad wars, which are admittedly ruinous and a most prolific source of unjust discrimination.

Now, the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SEYMOUR] meets my hearty concurrence, and I think if Congress would ingraft this upon these provisions of the bill that the pooling system could work no possible harm and might afford a solution of the problem which the railways themselves have been trying for a long time to solve. The amendment is designed to cure the evils of competitive strife.

Mr. LONG. It refers to the pooling of the business of the roads.

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. Yes; to the pooling system. The amendment proposes in section 4, line 14, referring to this question of pooling:

> The intent, purpose, and effect of which is to raise charges above reasonable rates, or to divide the earnings on any other basis than a reasonable accordance with the service respectively rendered by such roads, or to impair reasonable competition; and every such contract shall be open and in writing, and a copy thereof shall, as soon as the original is executed, be sent by the parties thereto to the board of commissioners hereinafter created.

Now, if this provision is carefully guarded no harm can possibly come to the public thereby and no harm to the railway service.

You put on foot an instrumentality by which this destructive cutting of rates will be measurably prevented—not absolutely. It will not be in the power of legislation or anything else absolutely to prevent it. But all legislation is really approximation. I do not pretend the bill reported by this committee is perfect. I do not think it is in the power of man to frame a bill now in advance which will meet every requirement. It is what is called tentative; it is initiative. But I believe if this provision is ingrafted upon a permission to make a pool, everybody will be served and everybody will be secured, and there will be a remedy for the evil of which my friend from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] complains, and which I would avoid with as much earnestness as he, for I am as much opposed to unjust discrimination on the part of these powerful corporations injurious to the rights of any citizen as he is. But I differ with him essentially as to the methods by which this result is to be secured.

The rules, Mr. Speaker, which are applicable to this case must be elastic and should have genesis in the conditions of each case. These conditions which surround railway traffic are infinitely varied; they can not without injury to all interests concerned be subjected to artificial, unvarying rules imposed by the Government. The only solution, in my view, of the difficulties with which this great subject bristles is through the harmonious co-operation of the common law and the natural laws to which I have referred, re-enforced by legislation working with and never against them, which shall supply machinery for their sure and summary enforcement in case of need.

And this brings me, Mr. Speaker, to the consideration of what I regard as the most important feature in this bill. I do not claim to be wise above my day or above my fellows, but I must say that it seems to me so perfectly clear that the only effective way to remedy evils which are admitted to exist is through the influence and power of a railway commission, that any other legislation than that seems to me absolutely valueless and it may be mischievous.

I was somewhat amused at the criticisms made by my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BOYLE] yesterday. He, as we know, is a very acute lawyer, and he argued this question from the standpoint of an acute and an able lawyer. He made a very clear-headed presentation of the case from his standpoint. It was just such an argument as I have listened to many a time in court from a lawyer who carefully concealed everything that was valuable and strong in his adversary's case and directed all his efforts to expose its weakness. He took up the points one after another, instead of grouping them and looking at them as a whole, just as one might separate a bundle of sticks or the strands of a cable, each one of which considered by itself is a slender and weak thing, but when bound together you find it is a whole, having coherence and strength which can hold a tempest-tossed ship. Now, what is my friend's objection? Why, it is the same objection in substance that my distinguished friend from Texas, the chairman of the committee, stated in a general way, and that is that this commission is wholly insufficient. It has no power to do anything—that is to say, it does not afford any remedy to the party injured.

Why, Mr. Speaker, it is a remedy in addition to all the remedies which the gentleman affords in this bill. The party has the same right to go into court in the committee's bill as in his bill. He is subjected to not quite so severe penalties, but he is subjected to penalties in this bill for violation of the general principles which we say should govern railway managers. What is the trouble? The gentleman says it is not efficient enough; when you come to sum it up this commission has not power to render a final judgment and enforce its judgment by execution. That is the sum and substance of the objection. Now, both those gentlemen are too good lawyers not to understand that it is not in our power to create such a commission. We have given this commission more powers than any railway commission has ever had in this country; we give them full power to investigate. They are the ear of the Government, to listen to complaint; they are the right hand of the Government, to put in operation machinery in favor of the humblest and the weakest citizen of this Government who seeks redress.

My friend from Pennsylvania complains because the redress afforded is not full and sufficient. It goes just as far as the law will allow it to go. Commissions elsewhere in the States are clothed with no judicial or executive power. They do not render final judgment; they have no power to issue injunctions; they have no power to make any peremptory orders. Such a commission is a board of investigation, a board of inquiry, and a board of advice, representing the sovereignty of the State as this proposed commission would represent the sovereignty of 60,000,000 people.

It is idle, Mr. Speaker, for a gentleman to belittle the power and the influence of such a board as this bill contemplates. Any man who knows anything of the railway management in this country knows that railway managers may be arrogant; great power begets pride, and great power begets arrogance; it is a temptation to injustice. And it is for that reason, Mr. Speaker, that it has seemed to me wise, inasmuch as this great power, this imperium in imperio, has grown up in this Government and has excited the fears of many people because of its possible malign influence upon legislation and upon the judicial operations of the country—it has seemed to me proper, in view of the general feeling upon this subject, in view of the situation of affairs, that some representative of this Government should stand between the people and the railways impartial and not in a threatening or hostile attitude to the railways, but there simply as the watchful guardian of the rights of the people, or, as I have said, the ear and the arm of the Government, to hear and to guard.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. Certainly.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Do I understand the gentleman to take the position that, in constituting a commission as proposed in the committee bill, Congress would go the full extent of its constitutional power; in other words, that it would give to this commission all the power it can exercise under the Constitution?

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. I do not say that. I say that, as I understand the Constitution and the judicial system of our Government, Congress can not establish this commission as a judicial body without giving its members life-tenure. As I understand the Constitution of this Government, you can not give this board judicial power to hear and determine finally and to execute their judgment through final process unless you give the members of the commission life-tenure; and that we do not want to do.

Let me say here that this provision is drawn in conformity and analogy with the English practice. Let us review the order of procedure. Any man may make complaint. It is true that the commission is not bound to entertain the complaints of every man; and my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BOYLE] made a point in this regard. He said there might be cases where the commissioners would refuse to entertain a complaint, and then the party complaining would be turned over to a district attorney or a county attorney or some officer of that description in some State or Territory of the country. Upon this ground he thought the provision objectionable. I say that is one of the merits of the bill. I beg leave to differ with my learned friend on this point.

Suppose such a board of commissioners as this bill contemplates should be appointed by the Chief Magistrate of this country—President Cleveland, if you please, or by and by President Carlisle, perhaps—will my Democratic friends on this floor say that either of those gentlemen, knowing their action would be reviewed by the Senate, would appoint a board which would not properly exercise the discretionary power to judge as to the propriety of entertaining complaints of this character?

Mr. BOYLE. Is any court in this country armed with such discretion that it may hear the complaint of one man and refuse to hear the complaint of another?

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. No court is armed with any such power. But this is not a court. That is the very point. It is not intended to be a court. It is intended to be a guardian, a watchful and impartial guardian of the rights of all. It is intended to listen and to investigate and to set this machinery in motion if in its judgment, upon consideration of all the circumstances of the case, it is wise to do so.

Now, my friend knows perfectly well that under this great system of railways there might be, and would undoubtedly be, a great many frivolous complaints; there would be a great many malicious complaints, and it is not that sort of complaints that the law is intended to meet; it is not that sort of difficulty that we are trying to cure. We are trying to cure real substantial evils existing in this country, and I say this machinery is adequate for the purpose. If you constitute such a board as this you may safely intrust to it the discretionary power to say whether it will entertain complaints or not.

That is the first point. Now, this board will have power to go on and investigate. It is true the investigation of the board does not ripen into judgment. Perhaps the bill should go a little further and say that where a man claims damages the commission should inquire and report its judgment as to the amount of damages that should be given. I should have no objection to such an amendment. I think on the whole it would be an improvement, although such a power would be in the nature of a final judgment.

Now, I understand perfectly well that a well-trained lawyer like my friend from Pennsylvania is very apt to pooh-pooh the judgment or finding of such a tribunal. We are accustomed to respect courts that not only have the authority to render judgments but are clothed with power to execute them; and we are disposed to say with reference to such a proposition as this: "This is nonsense; because it does not result in anything absolute and final." But I think my friend and gentlemen who think with him on this subject underestimate the moral power of such a board as this. I undertake to say that the very existence of such a board, representing the sovereignty of this Government and the concrete will and purpose of the American people to see that justice is done, would exercise a powerful and a controlling influence upon the great corporations of this country. I have not a doubt of it, and I do not believe my friend has. If Charles Francis Adams, who is an expert on this subject, a man whose character is above all possible reproach, should be associated with two other men competent to deal with this subject—if a board thus constructed should sit and hear complaints of this sort, listen to the evidence carefully and patiently, upon notice to both sides, and should then come to a finding, do you suppose, Mr. Speaker, that there is any railroad in this country that would not respect such a finding? There would never be any occasion to invoke the aid of a court after such a finding.

Again, I have heard it intimated by some gentlemen that you can not trust the President and the Senate to appoint a board of men who should be superior to the malign influence of the combined corporations of this country. I do not know that any such sentiment has found utterance upon the floor of this House. I should be sorry to hear that stated here as the deliberate conviction of any man who claims to be a democrat; for if a man comes to that he has lost faith in republican institutions and he has lost faith in the people. But it is not true, Mr. Speaker. The President and the Senate of the country, I believe, can safely be intrusted with (and I would as soon trust to the President of one party as to the President of the other party) the duty of selecting a board of able, fearless, impartial men who shall stand as the representatives of the country to keep these corporations within their proper limitations. That is all we ask, and it is all we ought to ask. It does not become the dignity of the American Congress to assail any great interest which has invested in it $7,000,000,000 of the hard-earned money of the people, and which employs 2,000,000 of citizens in its daily service.

They are entitled to the protection of their rights to the fullest extent, and I understand my respected friend the chairman of the Committee on Commerce—and I know his sincerity as well as his ability—has no desire or purpose to inflict any wrong on them. But believing, as I do, the measures he seeks to inaugurate are calculated to produce the very evil he would remedy, I would interpose this machinery, which has allied to it the whole judicial power of the United States. Any circuit-court judge anywhere, at any time, in chambers can be called upon promptly and summarily to entertain this subject. Some gentleman said he had not the power to issue a temporary injunction, but that gentleman had not carefully read the bill, and he is mistaken.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I want to ask the gentleman from Vermont a question which involves a difficulty in the minds of a great many members upon the floor, and it is this: Why the Committee on Commerce did not so frame the bill that the commission might determine the amount of damages done to the complainant. If there be any reason why that should be omitted I should like to know it. The State commissioners are allowed the right to fix the damages.

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. In answer to the gentleman from Iowa, I will say that I know no other reason except probably that it did not occur to the committee. I have already stated that in my judgment such an amendment would add an important feature to this commission. There certainly should be no objection to going one step further where a man claimed damages and allow the commission to give their judgment of the amount of damage sustained by the complainant. It would not be a judgment such as my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BOYLE] would have a great deal of respect for. He would say, perhaps, that it did not amount to much. But when he said that he would look at it from the standpoint of a lawyer and not from the standpoint of a moralist, he would leave out of consideration wholly the moral element. He knows the moral consideration would weigh as strongly with the railways of the country as any proceeding in chancery for injunction.

Now, Mr. Speaker, suppose the bill of my friend from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] is passed and it comes into operation as the law, and some poor fellow in his country starts out to get treble damages, how far do you suppose he would get in remunerating himself for his losses, which might be very small? The very imposition of treble damages imposes a duty on the railway to fight. The very fact the man is to be compensated more than he lost or has sustained is enough to put the railway on the defensive. I think the principle is vicious. It is inequitable and unjust, and I think any man in this country who undertakes under that bill to assert his rights will quite as soon come to grief as any man who should assume to pursue a common law remedy without any statute at all. It invites defense; it provokes a hostile war; and railways would carry such cases to the last extremity. They do not care so much for proceedings in court; they care a great deal more, as my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] has stated, for the blaze of public sentiment for the publicity of wrongs and outrages done by them than for any mere judicial proceeding.

Mr. Speaker, at the risk of repetition allow me to summarize my view upon this point. An intelligent, upright, and independent board, representing the Government of the people, standing between the people and the railways, charged with the duty of careful supervision of the relations between the two, and clothed with powers sufficient to preserve their just balance, would command the confidence of all parties, and its deliberate behests would challenge respectful attention and obedience by railway managers.

The bare fact of the existence of such a commission, whose action could be summarily invoked by any citizen, however humble, would exert a strong and constant tendency to bring and keep the management of the roads of the country within the limits of righteous dealing. Notice, too, that the Federal courts are brought into swift concurrent and auxiliary action with the board in the exercise of its functions.

Ample provision is made for speedy and intelligent investigation, while the roads are secured against hasty action by a provision for notice, which gives opportunity for retraction or correction of ascertained error.

The substitute bill leaves the wronged citizen to make alone such case as he may dare to undertake against a powerful and arrogant adversary, and attempts to fortify his weakness by severe penalties of doubtful expediency; while under the committee bill the machinery for redress is put in motion and controlled by a board which represents the sovereign will and purpose of the whole people, not for the enforcement of rigid, artificial, arbitrary rules, often of injurious application, but for the wise enforcement of sound and just general principles, broad enough and flexible enough to meet all emergencies without injury or injustice to either citizen or carrier.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, after the elaborate and able presentation of the superior merits of the substitute offered by Mr. REAGAN over the bill under consideration, I deem it unnecessary to consume much of the time of the House. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], ever since the introduction of this question before Congress ten years ago, has given it his patient study and support, and a few days ago gave to this House the result of his investigation in the following substitute for the bill under consideration, which I do not contend is perfect, but is certainly preferable to the so-called committee bill:

A bill to regulate interstate commerce and to prohibit unjust discriminations by common carriers.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged alone or associated with others in the transportation of property by railroad from one State or Territory to or through one or more other States or Territories of the United States, or to or from any foreign country, directly or indirectly to charge to or receive from any person or persons any greater or less rate or amount of freight, compensation, or reward than is charged to or received from any other person or persons for like and contemporaneous service in the carrying, receiving, delivering, storing, or handling of the same. All charges for such services shall be reasonable. And all persons engaged as aforesaid shall furnish, without discrimination, the same facilities for the carriage, receiving, delivery, storage, and handling of all property of like character carried by him or them, and shall perform with equal expedition the same kind of services connected with the contemporaneous transportation thereof as aforesaid. No break, stoppage, or interruption, nor any contract, agreement, or understanding, shall be made to prevent the carriage of any property from being and being treated as one continuous carriage, in the meaning of this act, from the place of shipment to the place of destination, unless such stoppage, interruption, contract, arrangement, or understanding was made in good faith for some practical and necessary purpose, without any intent to avoid or interrupt such continuous carriage or to evade any of the provisions of this act.

SEC. 2. That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in the transportation of property as aforesaid directly or indirectly to allow any rebate, drawback, or other advantage, in any form, upon shipments made or services rendered as aforesaid by him or them.

SEC. 3. That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in the carriage, receiving, storage, or handling of property as mentioned in the first section of this act to enter into any combination, contract, or agreement, by changes of schedule, carriage in different cars, or by any other means, with intent to prevent the carriage of such property from being continuous from the place of shipment to the place of destination, whether carried on one or several railroads. And it shall be unlawful for any person or persons carrying property as aforesaid to enter into any contract, agreement, or combination for the pooling of freights, or to pool the freights, of different and competing railroads, by dividing between them the aggregate or net proceeds of the earnings of such railroads, or any portion of them.

SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in the transportation of property as provided in the first section of this act to charge or receive any greater compensation for a similar amount and kind of property, for carrying, receiving, storing, forwarding, or handling the same, for a shorter than for a longer distance on any one railroad; and the road of a corporation shall include all the road in use by such corporation, whether owned or operated by it under a contract, agreement, or lease by such corporation.

SEC. 5. That all persons engaged in carrying property as provided in the first section of this act shall adopt and keep posted up schedules which shall plainly state:

First. The different kinds and classes of property to be carried.

Second. The different places between which such property shall be carried.

Third. The rates of freight and prices of carriage between such places, and for all services connected with the receiving, delivery, loading, unloading, storing, or handling the same. And the accounts for such service shall show what part of the charges are for transportation and what part are for loading, unloading, and other terminal facilities.

Such schedules may be changed from time to time as hereinafter provided. Copies of such schedules shall be printed in plain, large type, at least the size of ordinary pica, and shall be kept plainly posted for public inspection in at least two places in every depot where freights are received or delivered; and no such schedule shall be changed in any particular except by the substitution of another schedule containing the specifications above required, which substitute schedule shall plainly state the time when it shall go into effect, and copies of which, printed as aforesaid, shall be posted as above provided at least five days before the same shall go into effect; and the same shall remain in force until another schedule shall as aforesaid be substituted. And it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in carrying property on railroads as aforesaid, after thirty days after the passage of this act, to charge or receive more or less compensation for the carriage, receiving, delivery, loading, unloading, handling, or storing of any of the property contemplated by the first section of this act than shall be specified in such schedule as may at the time be in force.

SEC. 6. That each and all of the provisions of this act shall apply to all property, and the receiving, delivery, loading, unloading, handling, storing, or carriage of the same, on an actually or substantially continuous carriage, or as part of the continuous carriage, as provided for in the first section of this act, and the compensation therefor, whether such property be carried wholly on one railroad or partly on several railroads, and whether such services are performed or compensation paid or received by or to one person alone or in connection with another or other persons.

SEC. 7. That each and every act, matter, or thing in this act declared to be unlawful is hereby prohibited; and in case any person or persons as defined in this act, engaged as aforesaid, shall do, suffer, or permit to be done any act, matter, or thing in this act prohibited or forbidden, or shall omit to do any act, matter, or thing in this act required to be done, or shall be guilty of any violation of the provisions of this act, such person or persons shall forfeit and pay to the person or persons who may sustain damage thereby a sum equal to three times the amount of the damages so sustained, to be recovered by the person or persons so damaged by suit in any State or United States court of competent jurisdiction where the person or persons causing such damage can be found or may have an agent, office, or place of business; and if the court before which any such action is tried shall be of opinion that the violation of the law was willful, it shall make an allowance, by way of additional costs, to the party injured sufficient to cover all his counsel and attorney fees. Any action to be brought as aforesaid may be considered, and if so brought shall be regarded, as a subject of equity jurisdiction and discovery, and affirmative relief may be sought and obtained therein. In any such action so brought as a case of equitable cognizance as aforesaid, any director, officer, receiver, or trustee of any corporation or company aforesaid, or any receiver, trustee, or person aforesaid, or any agent of any such corporation or company, receiver, trustee, or person aforesaid, or of any of them, alone or with any other person or persons, party or parties, may and shall be compelled to attend, appear, and testify and give evidence; and no claim that any such testimony or evidence might or might not tend to criminate the person testifying or giving evidence shall be of any avail, but such evidence or testimony shall not be used as against such person on the trial of any indictment against him. The attendance and appearance of any of the persons who as aforesaid may be compelled to appear or testify, and the giving of the testimony or evidence by the same, respectively, and the production of books and papers thereby, may and shall be compelled the same as in the case of any other witness; and in case any deposition or evidence, or the production of any books or papers, may be desired or required for the purpose of applying for or sustaining any such action, the same, and the production of books and papers, may and shall be had, taken, and compelled by or before any United States commissioner, or in any manner provided or to be provided for as to the taking of other depositions or evidence, or the attendance of witnesses, or the production of other books or papers, in or by chapter seventeen of title thirteen of the Revised Statutes of the United States. No action aforesaid shall be sustained unless brought within one year after the cause of action shall accrue, or within one year after the party complaining shall have come to a knowledge of his right of action. And as many causes of action as may accrue within the year may be joined in the same suit or complaint.

SEC. 8. That any director or officer of any corporation or company acting or engaged as aforesaid, or any receiver or trustee, lessee, or person acting or engaged as aforesaid, or any agent of any such corporation or company, receiver, trustee, or person aforesaid, or of one of them alone, or with any other corporation, company, person, or party, who shall willfully do, or cause or willingly suffer or permit to be done, any act, matter, or thing in this act prohibited or forbidden, or who shall aid or abet therein, or shall willfully omit or fail to do any act, matter, or thing in this act required to be done, or cause or willingly suffer or permit any act, matter, or thing so directed or required by this act to be done not to be so done, or shall aid or abet any such omission or failure, or shall be guilty of any infraction of this act, or aid or abet therein, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be fined not less than $1,000.

SEC. 9. That nothing in this act shall apply to the carriage, receiving, storage, handling, or forwarding of property wholly within one State, and not shipped from or destined to some foreign country or other State or Territory; nor shall it apply to property carried for the United States at lower rates of freight and charges than for the general public, or to the transportation of articles free or at reduced rates of freight for charitable purposes, or to or from public fairs and expositions for exhibition.

SEC. 10. That the words "person or persons" as used in this act, except where otherwise provided, shall be construed and held to mean person or persons, officer or officers, corporation or corporations, company or companies, receiver or receivers, trustee or trustees, lessee or lessees, agent or agents, or other person or persons acting or engaged in any of the matters and things mentioned in this act.

Mr. Speaker, before I enter upon the argument I desire to correct an erroneous impression upon the minds of the members outside of the Committee on Commerce in regard to the bill under consideration. It is called the committee's bill by gentlemen who have referred to it in debate, leaving the impression upon the minds of the members that a majority of the Committee on Commerce have approved the provisions of the bill under consideration for which Mr. REAGAN offered his substitute. This is not true. I state here in the presence of the chairman of that committee, and I hope he will correct me if I am mistaken, that a majority of that committee has never approved the bill under consideration. There is but one member of the committee in favor of the bill, as far as I know, and it is wrong that the bill should have the prestige of a bill approved by a majority of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. Speaker, I have never approved the bill under consideration as one of the committee, and I state again that there is but one of the committee who indorses the bill known as the committee bill, now under consideration, and it is not entitled to that consideration that is given to a bill approved by a majority of a committee. The Committee on Commerce heard the testimony and arguments of able representatives of many of the great trunk lines of railroads and of others not connected with railroads for more than two months at their sessions, and could not agree upon a bill; and finally it was agreed that the bill under consideration should be reported to the House with the privilege of every member to offer substitutes or amendments, and it is in this way it came before this House, and no one on the committee feels bound to support the bill, and I hope no member on this floor will give the bill any weight further than its merits in his judgment entitle it to. I hope gentlemen will give the bill under consideration close scrutiny, owing to the fact that it stands here without the approval of any committee of this House at all. I have said this much in justice to myself and the committee, and to remove a false impression resting on the minds of the members in regard to the bill under consideration known as the committee bill, giving it prestige over the substitute offered by Mr. REAGAN.

Mr. Speaker, what are the evils complained of for many years, that have oppressed the people under the present railroad system, and which have been brought to the knowledge of Congress by thousands of petitions from all parts of the country, and by numerous bills introduced and referred to the Committee on Commerce?

First. It is charged that the railroads have charged unreasonable rates, swallowing up the profits of the producers of this country.

Second. That they have shown favoritism to individuals and to communities, thereby building up some and breaking down others unjustly.

Third. That they had destroyed that just competition which is necessary to commerce and to protect the shippers by a system of pooling.

Fourth. That they covered up their unjust favoritism and discrimination as public carriers by a system of rebates and drawbacks.

These are the evils said to exist and that afflict the country, and no member on this floor has had the hardihood to deny that these evils do exist and need a remedy at the hands of Congress.

THE REAGAN SUBSTITUTE.

The substitute offered by the gentleman from Texas remedies all these evils—

It makes it a penal offense to charge unreasonable rates;

It makes it a penal offense to discriminate against shippers—

Charging one more than another for like service; and to carry out this provision it prohibits any railroad company from charging more for a short haul than for a longer one. It gives to the individual wronged a right of action in either the Federal or State courts, and entitles him to treble damages.

It secures that just competition which is the life of commerce and which protects individuals from monopolies by preventing pooling and making it a penal offense punishable by indictment and fine. It secures similarity of charges for similar work and prevents evasions by prohibiting rebates and drawbacks and making it a penal offense punishable by fine and indictment.

It requires the rates of freight to be posted up in the offices, that all may see and understand them. It gives auxiliary aid by bill of discovery, requiring exhibition of books and papers. It gives a remedy full and complete. What more could any one ask? Every evil complained of is remedied. What less could be given to protect the people from rapacious corporations, clothed with immense power by their charters, and wielding a great influence upon the legislation in many of the States, if not a controlling one?

JUSTICE TO RAILROADS.

Sir, I recognize the benefits conferred upon the country by the building of railroads. I admire the energy and the enterprise of our citizens engaged in railroading; but, sir, those from whom they draw their annual tribute, the people, the farmers, the producers, have rights that ought and must be protected. I would not deprive any railroad company of just, full, and adequate compensation, but let them be just to others. This substitute can not hurt railroad companies that are acting justly. It only forces those who do not want to act fairly and justly to regard the rights of the people.

But, sir, we are told by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Governor LONG] that this substitute is mere brutum fulmen, that it will be a dead letter on the statute-book; if so, it will certainly not hurt any railroad, and they and their friends ought not to object to it.

Mr. Speaker, I have not heard a single shipper object to this substitute. It comes from the other side, the railroad officials. They opposed it before the committee through able counsel, and not on the ground at all that it would prove to be brutum fulmen. Oh, no, sir! And, sir, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Governor LONG] is not willing to rely upon this objection, for he attacks one of the main features of the substitute bill, the long and short haul feature, contending that it is unjust; and to prove it he puts two cases—one of hauling freight over the costly bridge at Saint Louis for two miles and one for hauling freight a mile or two through a costly tunnel. Sir, these are delusive instances, and are not practicable objections at all, as every one sees, and which require no argument to show their fallacy. What the people complain of is that railroads charge more for hauling freight fifty miles than a hundred in the same direction, and charge double as much for hauling freight one hundred miles as two and three hundred in the same direction and on roads that cost on an average the same per mile. This is occurring all over the country in the West and South, and it is of this the shippers complain, and have a right to complain, because it is wrong, it is unjust. It is palpable, and requires no argument to show its injustice.

But, sir, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Governor LONG] with great complaisance, after denouncing the substitute of General REAGAN, points us to his remedy in the so-called committee bill, the railroad commission feature found in the eighth, ninth, tenth, eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth sections of the bill now under consideration. This, in his judgment, is par excellence, and is held up by him as the cloud by day and the pillar of fire by night that is to lead the children of Israel into the promised land. [Laughter and applause.] This railroad commission is to give all the desired relief to the oppressed shippers, the relief from the wrongs that he admits exist. Sir, I want every member to read it and study it carefully. It is very lengthy, it is true, but when you come to analyze it it is simply this: That the President is to appoint three commissioners, one skilled in law, one skilled in railroad matters, and the other skilled, I suppose, in nothing, for the bill does not say—I suppose a sort of figure-head—but all to draw $7,500 apiece, to be provided with an office in Washington, to have free passes over every railroad in the United States and Territories, and to have all their necessary and other expenses paid out of the public Treasury, and two clerks at a salary of $2,500 each.

Now, if any poor farmer or shipper has been outraged by a railroad corporation trampling under foot his rights and disregarding the law, then he is to prepare a petition in writing addressed to this commission. If he is fortunate enough to get a board of trade or a United States attorney to examine into the facts and certify that the complaint is well founded, then the commission is to investigate it; and if they find that it is well founded and the petitioner's rights have been outraged and violated, what then? Are they to give judgment for damages? Oh, no, sir! They may communicate the same to the railroad company to afford them an opportunity of making such observation or taking such action as they (the company) may see fit. This is the language of the bill—section 10, lines 15 to 20, of the bill under consideration. Now, did ever any man outside of Massachusetts hear of such a moral-suasion remedy expressly against a soulless corporation? [Laughter and applause.] Why, sir, it does not even amount to "brutum fulmen," in the gentleman's own language, for there would be some satisfaction in that to the wronged individual; but in this remedy, after all his trouble, he gets nothing.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Governor LONG], in speaking of the Reagan substitute, after charging that it will be a dead letter, that it is mere brutum fulmen, says, "The people ask for bread and Mr. REAGAN gives them a stone; they ask for fish and he gives them a serpent." Sir, the rights of the people have been outraged for many years; they ask for a remedy commensurate with the evils that are acknowledged to exist, one that will give substantial relief, one that can and will be enforced in the courts of the country by honest judges and honest jurymen, and the gentleman instead of giving them that proposes to give them some of Mrs. Winslow's Massachusetts Soothing Sirup through his railroad commissioners who have no power. [Laughter.] Sir, it will not do—it will not satisfy the demands of the country.

But, sir, let us proceed with this remedy after this courtship between the railroad commissioners and the railroad company. If moral suasion should amount to nothing, then what? Why, in a proper case, says the bill, the commission may issue a notice to the railroad company requiring an answer, and thereupon the commissioners or some one else shall inquire into the facts of the case, and if the company has been found to have violated the law, then what are the commissioners to do? To give judgment upon this twice proved and established outrage? Ah, no! But they are to record their convictions in a book, and within twenty days afterward they are to cause a copy to be furnished to the railroad company, with a notice to cease and desist from such violations of the law, and also a copy to the United States attorney. Then, upon another notice that the company will not desist or refuses, the attorney is to file a petition in the name of the party aggrieved, and the court shall do what? Give a judgment on this long-delayed and twice-proven claim? Ah, no! But the court is then to begin for the first time and inquire into the matter, by requiring an answer showing why injunction, &c., should not issue, and upon proof for the third time the court is to act.

Now, why is all this rigmarole in favor of the railroad? Look, Mr. Speaker, at the Reagan substitute and contrast the two. It throws open the courts of the country, gives them jurisdiction at the outset, as in all other cases of violated rights of the citizen injured. Sir, it seems to me that the remedy is full, ample, and complete under the substitute offered by Mr. REAGAN. With all due respect to the gentleman from Massachusetts, for whom I entertain great regard, I think that every section of this bill in reference to the commission and creating one ought to be stricken out and the substitute adopted with some amendment. The tribunals created by the Constitution and the laws, the courts, State and Federal, can give all the relief to the citizens that any one asks for, without any additional expense to the people. There is no necessity for a commission at all—not the slightest.

Mr. Speaker, Congress has fallen into the modern habit of referring too many things to a commission or commissioners. We had our Presidential commission, that robbed the people of their victory; and then we had the tariff commission, and their report proved an abortion, a failure, and amounted to nothing. [Applause on Democratic side.] The railroad commissions in many if not all of the States have proved inefficient, and now it is proposed to create a new railroad commission of three—we already have a Federal railroad commissioner. I must confess that I see no use in creating this new commission, except to provide three splendid "sinee-curees." It certainly does this. It creates three officers with a salary of $7,500 and free passes on all railroads—all their expenses paid, necessary and other, and little or nothing to do; for surely no one in his senses would ever apply to this commission for relief.

Mr. Speaker, a friend of General Grant's told me that General Grant promised an old friend of his during the war that if ever he had the power he would give him some good position. Long afterward, when General Grant was President, the old man came to Washington and called upon General Grant. After the usual salutations the old gentleman said: "General, you remember your promise to give me a place?" The general, who never forgot his friends, replied familiarly: "Yes, Tom, I recollect my promise, and will fulfill it. What place do you want?" The old man hesitated and said: "Well, I don't know exactly, but I want a 'sinee-curee.'" The general said that was a new office. "What office is that?" The old man said: "It is an office with little or no work attached, and a damned sight of pay." [Much laughter and applause.]

Now, one of the berths provided for in this bill would have just suited him, $7,500, expenses paid, and little or nothing to do, and three of them at that—pretty good "sinee-curees," at the expense of the people, and no use or necessity for them whatever. But, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts the other day in his able argument told us that these commissioners could make reports and investigate, &c. To give his identical language, he said: "These commissioners would be the eyes, ears, and fingers of Congress in the work of supervision," &c.

Well, sir, with all due respect, I think it would be much better if Congress would do its own "hearing, seeing, and feeling" in regard to the public matters that affect the right of the people. Sir, the great railroad companies brought before the Committee on Commerce during the last session of Congress their witnesses and experts and able lawyers. Their testimony was all taken down and their argument reduced to writing and revised, and the whole of it is already published and in the archives of the Government, and open to the inspection of every member of Congress who wants to see, hear, or feel. This question has been investigated for the last ten years, and I hope that Congress will now act and give the people the proper relief, and not create the new and useless offices of three railroad commissioners.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Governor STEWART, of Vermont] stated that the great protection to the people would be competition; that they must look to competition between the railroads themselves as a remedy for the evils from which they are suffering, and that you must rely upon moral suasion to produce good results. Another distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, who spoke within the last day or two, stated that no railroad could or would afford to stand up against public opinion in favor of the outrages reported by any board of trade.

I fully agree with the gentleman that competition is of itself a great remedy for unreasonable charges. Competition will stimulate commerce and afford relief for oppressed industries and to the citizens of the whole country. But these railroad-men have devised a means by which they can and do destroy competition. The railroad corporations, or many of them, have devised a pooling arrangement or system which of itself is calculated to destroy competition and in the nature of things must destroy it.

That is one of the very evils against which the bill or substitute of my friend from Texas desires to apply a remedy. What is the use, let me ask, to the people of this country if you have seven great trunk lines, extending from Saint Louis to the East, if these roads are allowed to pool their freights and divide the profits between them? Where is the healthy competition that my distinguished friend who just took his seat refers to if you allow pooling? Can not and does not every member of this House see that such an arrangement or pooling destroys that healthy competition which is the very life of commerce and the protection of the citizen? That is an evil that the Reagan substitute proposes to remedy. That substitute proposes to make it a penal offense for the roads to pool their freights. One of the main objects of the substitute is to strike down that very pooling system and protect the people from its oppression.

Another object, sir, is to prevent rebates and drawbacks. Why are rebates resorted to? It is to cover up a fraud practiced by the railroads themselves. They know under the common law that they are compelled to charge reasonable rates without discrimination between shippers as common carriers. They understand well enough what their duty is in the premises, but what do they do? They nominally charge all men the same rate for similar service, and in that respect make a literal compliance with the law. But that is not all. They give one man, a friend of the road, a rebate on his freight which they deny to another. They give one man a drawback and refuse it to another, or they give to one community a drawback on shipping rates which is denied to another, and thereby build up one fortune or one locality at the expense of others unjustly. That is one of the outrages that is proposed to be remedied by the substitute of the gentleman from Texas. It proposes to make such proceeding a penal offense, punishable by fine and indictment. But in opposition to that we have the so-called committee bill, that furnishes this useless commission, allowing rebates and drawbacks in the third section. Why, they say you shall give the same rebate to all alike. But why give a rebate at all? If the rebate is wrong, why allow it at all? Why allow it in any case?

It is a mere cover for a fraud. If a railroad company charges only just, reasonable, and uniform rates, and does not discriminate, is there any necessity for rebates at all? I repeat, it is simply a cover for the frauds practiced by the railroads upon the shippers of the country, and to enable them to unjustly discriminate.

Another thing that the substitute proposes is to require a schedule of rates to be posted up in some public place in every depot, to enable every man, every farmer or shipper to see what rates are charged, whether they are reasonable or not, and whether he is overcharged beyond the advertised rates. And yet in the face of these just provisions of that substitute gentlemen contend that the so-called committee bill is the best in every feature. That gives no protection to the citizen or to the shipper. They want by legislative enactment to ask the favor of these railroads to deal justly—to use nothing but moral suasion—soothing sirup to be administered by the railroad commission, and leave the shippers to the mercy of railroad corporations. Gentlemen, it will not do. The so-called committee bill does not give a remedy commensurate with the evils of which the people complain.

As I said before at the beginning of my remarks, and which I repeat, because I see that many members came into the Hall while I was speaking who did not hear my opening statement about the bill under consideration, and I desire the members on this floor to disabuse their minds of the erroneous impression that the bill under consideration is the judgment of a majority of the Committee on Commerce, and I, approved by them, repeat what I then said, that there is but one member of the Committee on Commerce in favor of the pending bill, and which has been erroneously called by every gentleman in debate on this floor "the committee bill." It came here, as I have stated before, on an agreement, after spending two months in a vain effort to agree upon a bill, that the bill should be reported but that no member of the committee should be bound to support it, every member reserving the right to offer a substitute for it or an amendment. The real object in reporting the bill was that Judge REAGAN might have an opportunity to bring before the House his substitute, on which he has labored for ten years, in order that we might have a vote upon the substitute in this Congress. That was the whole object, and the bill known as the "committee bill" is before this House without the indorsement of the Committee on Commerce. It stands here without the indorsement of a single committee of this House, and therefore is entitled to no prestige over the substitute offered by the gentleman from Texas. Let gentlemen scrutinize that bill, and I think after mature consideration they will reach the same conclusion that I have, that it merely creates a sinecure and affords no remedy commensurate with the evil for which this legislation is asked by the people.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to append to my remarks the eighth, ninth, tenth, eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth sections of the bill known as the committee bill, now under consideration. They are the sections to which I have referred creating and regulating the proposed railroad commission. Such a commission, armed with no power except to draw their salaries and make reports, may be very effective in a land of moral suasion like Massachusetts, but I doubt its efficacy elsewhere.

Mr. Speaker, I return my thanks to you and the members of the House for the attention which has been given to me, and shall say no more at present, reserving the remainder of my time. [Loud applause.]

SEC. 8. That there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, three commissioners, of whom one shall be of experience in the law and one of experience in railroad business, who shall be collectively known as the commission of interstate commerce of the United States, and shall be charged with the duty of carrying into effect the provisions of this act in respect of interstate commerce. One of said commissioners shall hold his office for the term of two years, one for the term of four years, and the other for the term of six years, to be respectively designated by the President, and thereafter said commissioners shall be appointed for the term of six years; and a commissioner appointed to any vacancy shall hold office for the unexpired term. Any one of said commissioners may be removed by the President for cause, but not otherwise. Said commissioners shall devote their whole time and abilities to the duties of their office, and shall not accept or engage in any office or employment inconsistent with the provisions of this act. If either commissioner, after his appointment, shall be or shall become by inheritance or operation of law pecuniarily interested in any railroad or railroad security, he shall within thirty days divest himself of such interest; and upon his failure to do so, or upon his voluntarily becoming interested in any such railroad or railroad security, his office shall become vacant. No commissioner shall participate in any hearing or proceeding in which he has any pecuniary interest whatever. Each commissioner shall receive an annual salary of $7,500, payable like the salaries of the judges of the courts of the United States: Provided, That before entering upon the discharge of their duties they shall, in addition to the oath required of them by law, take and subscribe to an oath that they are neither directly nor indirectly interested in the ownership or earnings of any railroad company whatsoever.

SEC. 9. That the said commission shall exercise only the powers by this act conferred. Said commission may appoint a clerk, whose duty it shall be to keep a full and faithful record of the proceedings of said commission, and otherwise to assist the members thereof in the performance of their duties, and who shall receive an annual salary of $2,500; and also one accountant, at an annual salary of $2,500. The Secretary of the Interior, at the request of said commission, may also furnish the commission such additional clerical, engineering, expert, or other service as they may request and he shall deem proper. Actual and necessary traveling and other expenses incurred by said commissioners, or their employés under their orders, shall be allowed them, for which vouchers shall be rendered. The commissioners, their experts and clerks, may pass and repass over any railroad engaged in interstate commerce free of charge whenever engaged in the performance of their duties under the provisions of this act, but neither shall accept any other pass, gratuity, or favor whatever from any railroad company.

SEC. 10. That any person complaining of anything done or omitted to be done by any railroad company or person in violation or contravention of this act may, in addition to the remedies hereinbefore provided, apply to said commission by petition in writing, which shall briefly state the subject of such complaint. If the petition is signed by any board of trade or other commercial body, or, when signed by an individual, if it bears the certificate of any district attorney of the United States, or of any district or county attorney, or officer corresponding thereto, of any State or Territory, that he has examined the facts, and in his opinion the complaint is well founded, the commission is hereby required to entertain and investigate the same. In all other cases the commission shall decide whether or not the petition ought to be proceeded with. The commission may, if they think fit, before requiring or permitting any formal proceedings to be taken on any petition, communicate the same to the railroad company against whom it is made, so as to afford them an opportunity of making such observations or taking such action thereon as they may think fit. The commission shall have power and in a proper case is required to cause a copy of the petition to be served upon the railroad company complained against, and to issue a notice requiring such company to appear before the commission and answer the said petition. The answer shall be in writing. After the answer is filed it shall then be lawful for the commission, if it shall think fit, to direct and prosecute, in such mode and by such persons or means as it shall think proper, all such inquiries into matters of fact as may be deemed necessary to enable the commission to form a just conclusion in respect of the matters of said petition. All the proceedings before said commission shall be directed by and under general orders, which shall secure to all persons interested reasonable notice and opportunity to be heard. If it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the commission, either by the testimony of witnesses or other evidence adduced before it, or by the report of any person to whom the commission may have referred the inquiry, or any part thereof, that anything has been done or omitted to be done in contravention or violation of this act by any railroad company or person so upon due and proper notice proceeded against, it shall be the duty of such commission to make and record its report in writing in respect of any such contravention or violation of this act, which report shall comprise and embrace the findings of the commission upon and in respect of all questions of fact in issue or involved in such proceedings. Within a reasonable time, not to exceed twenty days, after such report and findings are made by the commission, it shall cause a copy thereof to be served upon or delivered to the railroad company so found to have violated this act, to which shall be appended a notice to be issued by said commission to such company forthwith to cease and desist from such violation; and also to deliver to the district attorney of the United States for the district in which the act complained of occurred another copy of such report, findings, and notice.

SEC. 11. That upon notice that any such railroad company has neglected or refused to conform to the decision of said commission, and to desist from such violation or contravention of this act, it shall be the duty of such district attorney to apply by petition, in the name of the party aggrieved, to the circuit court of the United States for such district, for, and it shall be the duty of such court to grant, an order upon such railroad company to show cause why such company should not be enjoined and restrained against the continuance of such violation, and for such other order and relief in the premises as may be just and proper. For the purpose of making any order or decree in the premises, final or otherwise, such court shall be always open, and the day on which any such order or decree is made shall be a special term of such court. Upon the service and return of such order to show cause, and notice to the parties interested, such court shall proceed in a summary manner to ascertain whether the said report and findings are true; and whenever said court shall be of opinion that such company has done or is doing any act in violation or contravention of this act in said report and findings described, it shall so adjudge; and it then shall be the duty of said court forthwith to issue a writ of injunction, requiring such railroad company to desist from such violation, and in respect of the matters in said report contained to conform to and obey all the provisions of said act. Such court may enforce obedience to any such injunction, order, or decree, by any person or party, by fine, proceedings for contempt, and all other means within its lawful jurisdiction sitting as a court of equity. Any person interested to restrain such violation may, on application to the court, be allowed to appear and be heard, by himself or counsel; and upon proof that any district attorney has failed in any proper case for the period of ten days to apply for such order to show cause, the court may permit such application to be made and prosecuted to effect by or in behalf of any person so interested. Such court may, in its discretion, award or deny costs to any party to such proceeding. In any case where the court shall adjudge that the violation of this act by any company has been willful, or continued after notice to desist therefrom, the court may award to any party injured such a gross sum by way of costs as will reimburse all his costs, charges, expenses, counsel fees, and disbursements, to be paid by such company.

SEC. 12. That the commission may make, and from time to time amend, such general orders as may be requisite for the order and regulation of proceedings before it, including all forms for proceeding, notices and the service thereof, and for the prescribing, directing, or regulating any matters authorized by this act. All the proceedings before said commission shall be upon reasonable notice to all parties interested, and such forms shall conform as nearly as may be to those in use in the courts of the United States. Any party may appear and be heard in person or by attorney.

SEC. 13. That for the purposes of this act the commission shall, subject as in this act mentioned, have full power to ascertain and report upon all questions of fact arising under this act, and shall also have the powers following:

(a) They may by subpœna or order, to be served by a person by them authorized, require the attendance of witnesses, and of all such persons as they think fit to call before them, or before any person by them authorized to prosecute an inquiry.

(b) They may require the production of all books, papers, and documents relating to any matter before them and to that end may invoke the aid of any court of the United States.

(c) Either of them may administer oaths and affirmations.

SEC. 14. That the principal office of the commission shall be in the city of Washington, where its general session shall be held and its records and archives be deposited. Whenever the convenience of the public or of the parties may be promoted, or delay or expense prevented thereby, the commission may hold special sessions in any part of the United States. It may, by one or more of the commissioners, or one of the persons named in the ninth section hereof, or by any person specially appointed by the commission, prosecute any inquiry necessary to its duties, in any part of the United States, into any matter or question of fact, and may specially delegate to the officer or person conducting such inquiry such powers to that end as are by this act conferred upon the commission and may be deemed necessary. Every vote and official act of either of the commissioners shall be entered of record. The commission may conduct its proceedings in such a manner as will most conduce to the dispatch of business and to justice; they may sit together or separately, and either in private or public, but any proceeding before them shall be public upon the request of either party thereto, and a majority of said commission may determine any question submitted. The commission shall prescribe a railroad year, and a system of reports covering said year to be rendered by railroad companies; examine the books and accounts of said companies at such times as may be deemed by them necessary; see that all United States laws relating to said companies are enforced; furnish such information to the several Departments of the Government, or the Government directors of any of said railroads, in regard to the tariffs of fares and freight, or the accounts of said railroads, as may be required of them or as they may deem expedient; make an annual report of their doings to Congress on or before the 1st day of January of each year; and otherwise endeavor to procure the data necessary to the gradual enactment of an intelligent system of national legislation regulating interstate railroad commerce.

SEC. 15. That the Secretary of the Interior shall provide suitable offices and a room for the public sessions of the commission in the city of Washington. Witnesses summoned before the commission shall be paid the same fees as witnesses in the Federal courts, and depositions de bene esse and under commission may be taken to be used before the commission in the same manner and upon the same conditions as in such courts. The salaries and expenses of the commission shall be provided for, audited, and paid in the same manner as the salaries of judges and other judicial expenses.

SEC. 16. That said board of commissioners shall inquire into that method of railroad management or combination known as pooling, and state the result of their inquiry in their first annual report, and whether, in their judgment, any, and if so what, legislation is expedient in relation thereto.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President, in writing, was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The House resumed consideration of the unfinished business.

Mr. BUDD addressed the Chair.

Mr. REAGAN. I understand that no gentleman on the committee desires to be heard this afternoon.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will then recognize the gentleman from California.

Mr. BUDD. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the efforts of Judge REAGAN and others to prevent corporation abuses and regulate the interstate commerce of the railroads of the United States have continued for eight or ten years without effecting the enactment of any law by Congress. It is the duty of Congress to pass some such law. To secure justice to all parties, Government supervision or regulation or ownership is indispensable.

RAILROAD ABUSES REQUIRE LEGISLATION.

True, the former glaring abuses of railroad mismanagement have been, without law, largely corrected. There are existing, however, glaring and outrageous abuses, extortions, and discriminations which demand corrective and stringent enactments. Just what enactments will remove these evils it is more difficult to determine than that a remedy is needed. The railroad problem is not as simple and easy of solution as is imagined by those who have never given it a patient study. To deal in generalities and denounce abuses is far easier than to correct them.

To correct and prevent extortions, overcharges, and discriminations laws have been passed by nearly every European people. Belgium, Germany, France, and the colonies have legislated on the subject.

In England for more than forty years the railroad problem has been thoroughly studied by leading statesmen; committee after committee of Parliament has investigated and reported thereon. Some governments have attempted to solve it by acquiring railroads within their borders. It is thus in Belgium, in New Zealand, and Australia. France has a present interest in its railroads and a future right to the sole ownership of them.

For forty years England has been puzzling over the problem. During the first thirty-three years no satisfactory result was reached and all efforts at restraint proved abortive.

In 1872 a committee of twelve of the ablest and best men in Parliament, six from each house, was appointed. After long and careful investigation it reported, in effect, that it could neither recommend nor draft a bill that would prevent all railroad extortions, nor the growth of the railroads as monopolies. It recommended, however, measures which would largely remove existing abuses and secure to the people greater benefits than had been theretofore enjoyed. The committee stated that railroad consolidation had in some cases, as that of the Great Eastern line, proved beneficial and caused a reduction of freights and fares and an increase in facilities. But I say that proper laws can and should give the relief demanded.

REDUCTIONS DURING PAST FEW YEARS.

Although the efforts in this House have not resulted in law, they have had a salutary effect. There has been a large reduction in rates and a modification of abuses in interstate railroad commerce that would have been deemed impossible when this agitation began. According to Joseph Nimmo, jr., the able Government statistician, from 1868 to 1883 there was a reduction in the cost of grain transportation from the West to the Atlantic seaboard of more than one-half. Had any member in 1868 introduced a bill reducing these rates 50 per cent., he would have been denounced as a crank and his bill been cited as proof of lunacy. I compile the following from Nimmo's official reports: To transport grain from Chicago to New York, cost, per bushel, in 1868: By water, 25.3 cents; by rail and water, 29 cents; by all rail, 42.6 cents. In 1873, all water, 19.2 cents; rail and water, 26.9; rail, 33.2; 1880, all water, 13.2; rail and water, 15.7; all rail, 19.7. In 1883 it ran, all water, from 7.2 to 11.3; water and rail, 10.7 to 11.9; all rail, 15 to 18 cents—seven months it being 15 cents. Edward Atkinson is authority for the statement that the saving to the people of the United States by reason of the railroad reductions is equal to the national debt.

In Europe, where labor and material are cheap, we expect to find rates much lower than here. The statisticians tell us that this is not the case, and that freights are lower in the United States than in Europe. They say:

In France, where the government regulates the railroads (or tries to regulate them), the average cost per mile of moving a ton of freight is about 1.6 cents; in Belgium, 1.5 cents; while in the State of New York the charge is only .9 cents per ton per mile on the average.

To show further these reductions in rates I will cite from the uncontradicted statement of Mr. Albert Fink before the House Commerce Committee, of which Judge REAGAN is chairman:

During the summer the railroads charge 50 cents for carrying 200 pounds of flour 1,000 miles, but now charge 30 cents. Supposing a man eats 1 pound of flour a day, he then pays on an average for 365 pounds of flour, say, about $1. If he also consumes a pound of meat per day, brought from Chicago to New York at an average cost of about 32½ cents per 100 pounds, amounting to $1.20 a year, he pays during a year $2.20, which is about equal to one and a half day's wages of a common laborer and less than a day's wages of a skilled laborer for the services rendered him by the railroads.

* * * * * * *

If you will go through the whole list of articles of consumption you will find that the charge for railroad transportation is very small compared with the cost of producing the articles, and much smaller than the profits which are generally charged by the middlemen, the merchants, who are constantly complaining of the railroads. Take, for example, a suit of clothes, shipped from New York to Chicago, weighing about ten pounds. At the present rates it is transported to Chicago for 7½ cents. The suit may cost from $20 to $50, and the cost of transportation is almost inappreciable. Or, take a calico dress, which is transported from New York to Chicago, a thousand miles, for about three-quarters of a cent a pound, or 2½ cents for the dress. And yet we have complaints of dry-goods merchants calling upon the railroad commissioners of New York to reduce the cost of carrying these articles. Take a pound of coffee, which is carried from New York to Chicago for one-third of a cent a pound; and sugar for one-fourth of a cent a pound; the price being 30 cents per pound for coffee and for sugar 11 cents.

That there exist, however, abuses, extortions, discriminations, combinations, and poolings injurious to the public good, which must be corrected by law, no one can truthfully deny. In enacting such laws we should be certain that they secure the greatest good to the people without crippling the industries of the country. Railroads brought inestimable blessings; but with these blessings they also brought many evils. They often discriminate unjustly, and build up one man at the expense of another; they at times commit wrongs beyond the reach of law; they frequently place on the people's backs "all the traffic will bear" and more than prosperity can stand. In a thousand ways they may and do, with impunity and profit, violate the laws of trade.

Coming from California, which is known as a strong anti-monopoly State, I insist that in passing laws regulating and correcting the abuses of railroad mismanagement our enactment shall, in so far as it can be done by law, remedy the abuses that exist in interstate commerce.

In discussing these measures I desire to offer a few criticisms on the wording of the substitute, for of the two measures before us I favor the Reagan substitute generally, and desire to see it perfected before it is adopted. I will then pass to a discussion of one section of the substitute which I do not favor, and which, if adopted, would prove injurious to the far West, and especially so to California.

At the proper time I will move to insert, after line 9, on page 1, the words "by him or them."

The first and second sections of the bill are nearly the same as the first section of the substitute. By some oversight the words "by him or them" are omitted from the latter in a place where they are absolutely necessary to prevent injustice.

The only reasonable construction of the section now is, that no person shall charge for the same amount and kind of freight between any two places more or less than is charged by him or any other person, no matter what are the means of transportation.

In other words, a railroad carrying grain from Chicago, or any other point, to New York or any other point, can not charge more or less than is charged for the same amount and kind of freight by the water lines, the lakes, and canals; yet every one who has investigated this subject should know that this water transportation is to rail, in point of cheapness, as 4 to 1, or thereabouts.

The following arrangements throw light upon this subject. These were not poolings but proratings:

That between the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad and the Boston Steamship Company favored the water transportation as 4 to 1.

That between the Erie Company and boats from New York to Boston favored water transportation as 3 to 1.

That between the railroads and steamers from Parkersburg to Cincinnati favored river transportation as 2 to 1.

That between the Erie Railway Company and the lake steamers as 5 to 1.

That between the Vermont Railway and Northern Transportation Company favored water as 3 to 1.

That by Chesapeake and Ohio Railway and Ohio River vessels was as 2 to 1.

That of the Illinois Central and the Mississippi boats as 5 to 1.

A STRANGE OVERSIGHT.

The insertion by the committee in their second section of the words "under substantially similar circumstances" is in my judgment absolutely needless, except as giving a loop-hole for construction by judges or railroad attorneys; for if the words "like and contemporaneous services" in that connection do not express the same thing as "similar circumstances," then you can not get synonymous terms in the English language to do so. The committee have failed to insert in section 3 of their bill the word "substantially" as modifying similar circumstances, leaving the act to be construed with the words "substantially similar circumstances" in section 2 and "similar circumstance" in section 3. The omission of the word "substantially" in section 3 may mean much by legal interpretation, and as the bill is carefully drawn looks decidedly significant.

No two circumstances in human events can be exactly similar; they may be "substantially" so; and you provide by one section that if circumstances are "substantially" similar, certain things may be done, but in the other you have restricted the interpretation by the omission—apparent and glaring omission—of the same word. In the interpretation of this bill, under the rules governing legal construction, the omission of the word in one place and its insertion in another speaks volumes—speaks largely against section 3 of the committee's bill.

REBATES GENERALLY INJURIOUS.

Mr. Speaker, as a general rule the section of this substitute prohibiting rebates is correct. Through rebates and the violation of acts in this section prohibited most of the railroad abuses complained of have occurred. So I say, as a general proposition, rebates are improper and should not be permitted. I can imagine, however, certain circumstances under which rebates ought to be permitted, and under which no harm, but much good, would result. Nevertheless I am not willing to strike out a section prohibiting them, unless all necessary and proper restrictions and limitations are inserted, such as will protect the interests of the shipper and prevent unjust discriminations.

I will in due time offer such.

I can imagine a brick-yard at which a million of bricks are made annually. I can imagine that in such a case the railroad company might say to the manufacturer of bricks, "If you will make and ship over our line 3,000,000 bricks instead of 1,000,000, we will give you a rebate of 15 per cent. per car on all bricks shipped." I can see that in such a case the railroad company, by the larger volume of business, will get in the aggregate greater compensation. I can see that the increased quantity of business may allow the man who runs the yard a considerable saving in his freight. I can see that by the increased, the triple supply to the market, the consumer of bricks gets a reduction. In such a case as this I can see how a rebate may be proper and may yield a profit to the railroad, a profit to the manufacturer, and a profit to the consumer. Some of the States of the Union, as for instance Alabama, allow them occasionally for the purpose of "assisting in the development of any industrial enterprise."

I can see how the same thing might occur in such a coal-mine case as that stated yesterday by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR]. I can also understand a case in which one mine produces six-dollar ore and the other forty-dollar ore. I can see that in such a case it might not pay the railroad company to construct tracks and carry the six-dollar ore from the mine to the crushing mill if the quantity of ore were very limited; but at the same time, if it can get a few hundred thousand tons of such ore to be carried over the road at a low rate, it might make a profit. In that case and in a few others I can see how a rebate might be justifiable.

Mr. REAGAN. Is it the gentleman's view that the railroad companies should be empowered to discriminate in favor of the wealthy and strong against the poor and weak for like service?

Mr. BUDD. That is the very question that was asked another gentleman on this floor yesterday. I do not see that this case cited is a discrimination in favor of the wealthy as against the poor. I see, sir, that in this very case the discrimination would be in favor of the poor man, or rather the man owning a mine of poor ore, as against the man owning a mine the ore of which is worth $40 a ton. I can see, further, that in this entire substitute you allow discriminations. You allow the railroad companies to charge more for one kind of freight than for another. You do not by your bill regulate the charge upon the jacket of the poor man nor upon the silk of the rich. Under your bill you allow these companies to charge more for the transportation of calico, if they find it profitable to do so, than for silks. If the shipment of one thing is small and the shipment of the other is large, there may be by reason of this increased volume of business another and entirely different rate. Your bill does not prohibit discrimination in such a case.

Proper discrimination is the order of life and business; and in this substitute discrimination is allowed from the beginning to the end. There is not in this substitute by any clause a prohibition of discrimination as such. True, the railroad company must charge the same for the contemporaneous transportation of silks for one man as for another, but under your bill they may put a greater rate on the shovel of the poor man than on the silks of the rich; there is nothing prohibiting it. Directly answering the question, I am not in favor of the rich against the poor. I am against rebates in ninety-nine cases out of one hundred, and I would not vote for any act or any section that allowed them, unless there were proper restrictions and limitations in the same measure protecting all persons against these unjust discriminations. On that section I vote with the substitute, unless there is an insertion absolutely preventing such discriminations.

Speaking of discriminations, I would like to call the gentleman's attention to another point.

DISCRIMINATIONS OF SUBSTITUTE.

One of the most glaring discriminations ever contained in any bill is to be found in this substitute. There is a discrimination in this substitute against persons engaged in transportation which would not be allowed in the commonest affairs of life. If a person "willfully" carries freight at a rate that is unreasonable, or if he "willfully" violates this act in any manner, you can fine him a thousand dollars. There is no doubt about that. It is just. Imagine, however, a case that is to be left to the courts, in which the question involved is whether the rate charged from San Francisco to Reno, or any other point out of the State of California, is reasonable.

The company or its agent insists that the charge made by it or him is reasonable—that it is worth $10 per ton. The other man says it should be less by $1 per ton. The matter goes into court. Now, we will say $1,000 is the damage claimed by the shipper. There was an honest difference of opinion. What is the result? You can recover three times the damage, or, in other words, for an honest difference of opinion you can recover from the railroad the sum of triple damages, $3,000, although it was not a "willful" overcharge. This substitute by one section provides that, should you arrest a man and try him, in such a case you could not even fine him. Why? Because it was not a "willful" overcharge. A judge sitting to hear and pass on the case would say, "This was not a 'willful' violation; this was an honest difference of opinion, and I can not allow the costs in the case, because it was not such a willful violation as the law contemplates." There the discrimination comes in, and you can not allow costs of $20, because it was not a willful violation, but you can amerce in damages to the extent of $3,000 or more.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman from California quotes different provisions in the bill strangely blended. He says you can not fine him in costs for willful violation of the law. There is nothing in the bill——

Mr. BUDD. That is what I say; you cannot fine him except for a "willful" violation of the law.

Mr. REAGAN. I have said that.

Mr. BUDD. You can not even charge costs up to him without "willful" violation of the law.

Mr. REAGAN. How can you talk about costs in a criminal action?

Mr. BUDD. I mean for a civil action.

Mr. REAGAN. Unmix them, and I will answer.

Mr. BUDD. I will, and then the gentleman may answer. Under subdivision 8 of your substitute you allow a fine of $1,000 for "willful" violation of the law.

Mr. REAGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUDD. Under section 7 of the same act, line 15, if the court before which any such action is tried shall be of opinion that the violation of the law was "willful", it should make an allowance by way of additional costs to the party injured sufficient to cover all his counsel and attorney fees.

Mr. REAGAN. In a civil suit.

Mr. BUDD. One moment. If there be a "willful" violation of the law additional costs to cover all counsel and attorney fees are allowed; but in section 7, lines 1 to 10, if any person be found violating the provisions of this act such person or persons shall forfeit and pay to the person or persons who may sustain damage thereby a sum equal to three times the amount of the damages so sustained, to be recovered by the person or persons so damaged. You can charge, therefore, under this act a fine of from $3,000 to $30,000 for an honest, conscientious difference of opinion as to what is a reasonable charge without there being any intention "willfully" to violate the act.

Mr. REAGAN. That would be according to the judgment of the court.

Mr. BUDD. Very good.

Mr. REAGAN. But the gentleman is talking as if the question were one of mistake in judgment by the railroad.

Mr. BUDD. Yes, sir; I am.

Mr. REAGAN. In the case of a civil suit there would not be a penalty, but only the assessment of damages.

Mr. BUDD. But let me imagine a case which will illustrate the point.

Mr. REAGAN. Take a real case, something that can exist, not a hypothetical one.

Mr. BUDD. I always desire to take cases that may be recognized by symbols, because you can then at any time put the proper facts in to suit any particular case. I will therefore suppose a case.

I desire to ship a certain number of car-loads, say a car-loads or a thousand car-loads, of grain from Stockton to San Francisco, imagining for the sake of illustration that one of them is outside of the State and the case comes under the rule of interstate commerce, and the transporting company say, "We will charge you $10 a ton." I reply, "I think $9 is enough," or any other supposable sum. There is an honest difference of opinion between us as to the value of the service, and the case goes to the courts.

It is found, on trial, that the company honestly believed the service to be worth the amount that they charged me, but that in point of fact I had been charged a thousand dollars too much. Now, under this provision of the bill the judgment of the court must be that the overcharge of $1,000, although it is honestly made, would entitle me to triple damages, and yet the judge sitting in that same case could not give the complainant $50 toward the expense of his attorney's fees.

Mr. REAGAN. If the gentleman will look at the provisions of the bill he will see that schedule rates are required to be posted up, and the law will assume that these are reasonable rates in the contemplation of law.

Mr. BUDD. No, sir.

Mr. REAGAN. And if the transportation company charges more or less than those rates it is made a separate offense by the bill. But on the hypothetical case he supposed it would be a question of law and of fact as to whether there was a willful violation of the law or not, and therefore I can not comprehend the exact ground of his criticism.

Mr. BUDD. Will you be kind enough to point me to any provision of the bill that makes the schedule rates so posted up reasonable rates prima facie in the courts?

Mr. REAGAN. There is a provision in the bill that they shall in the first place establish and post up their schedule rates in places designated by the bill, and if they charge more or less than the schedule rates they are themselves liable to the damages prescribed by the act. It is a finable offense under the terms of the bill.

Mr. BUDD. That is true, and would be all right and proper if there was a willful violation of the law; but if an overcharge were made honestly—honestly believing that the charge is simply what is right and proper for the service—if, in other words, they think the schedule is proper and it afterward turns out that it was not a proper rate, then, in the contemplation of this bill, although it were not a willful violation of the law, you can amerce them in three times the damages.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman talks about two things that are entirely dissimilar.

Mr. BUDD. Yes, sir, I agree with you; but you made them so by the bill that you propose here.

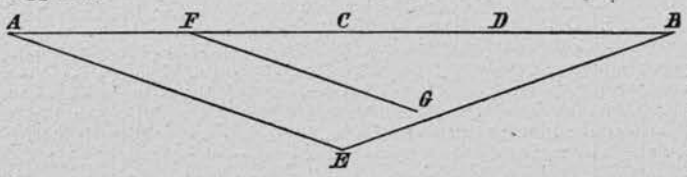
I say, Mr. Speaker, that it is a discrimination and an unjust one, and one that ought not to be permitted even though it be against a railroad corporation. I come from a State in which the feeling against monopolies is stronger perhaps than in any other State of this Union, and in which the Reagan bill is looked to as the great source of all remedy for the evils our people complained of. I know, sir, that any man may be criticised who dares to criticise adversely any provisions of this substitute, but when I, after careful study of this bill during the last session of Congress and during this, find these discrepancies and discriminations I feel it my duty to the people whom I have the honor to represent to present my objections in order that it may be so amended as to give the remedy we want.

No man is fit to be a representative of the people who fears to express his honest convictions on all public measures, or who keeps silent to avoid adverse criticism. I do not like certain provisions of this measure; I think them unjust, and therefore I oppose them.

LONG AND SHORT HAULS.

Now there is another section of the bill, and I only called this one up incidentally because it had been suggested by the question of Judge REAGAN himself. With the insertion of the word "willful" in subdivision 7 and of "by him or them" in section 1 I intend to vote for the entire substitute of Judge REAGAN with the exception of this long and short haul business. But I can not vote for that section.

Mr. REAGAN. I would like to ask the gentleman from California if he knows the fact that the constitution of California contains that precise provision that more shall not be charged for a short than for a long haul?



Mr. BUDD. I believe so. But we are dealing now with interstate and not with State commerce; and if the gentleman has studied the question as much as I think he has he would have found by this time that different rules prevail with reference to interstate and State commerce. Where a less charge for a long haul might be proper on a long line of road, running through several States, a thousand miles in length, it might not be proper within the limits of a little State whose extreme borders would not be three hundred miles apart. No more for a short than for a long haul? You make distance the sole measure of cost. You have stated in the first subdivision that all rates must be reasonable; and hence the elimination of section 4 would not allow a greater charge for a short than for a long haul unless the rates for a short haul were reasonably worth more. But you desire to prejudge it. You say, "It must be reasonable," and then prohibit it whether reasonable or not and shut the door against all power or courts so to declare it. You put in a rule that must meet all cases, and, like the bed of the robber Procrustes, if it does not fit you will stretch the man or clip him off; and yet I have figures to show that there are matters entering more largely into the cost of transportation than the mere length of the haul.

It is, under like circumstances, unjust to charge more for a short than for a long haul, but now we are passing upon a section proposed as a universal and inflexible rule under any and all circumstances—a rule without exception. In it the only element considered is distance. Now, unless this is the only or at least the greatest element entering into cost of transportation the section should not be adopted. If there be other elements of cost far more important than distance, the section would be unjust. If there be numerous cases in which the enforcement of the section would cripple or bankrupt railroads or prevent the laws of trade or competition from operating, then it should not be adopted. If under other sections of this bill all charges except such as are reasonable are prohibited and punished and ample remedy given to enforce them, then this section ought not to be adopted.

If it is reasonable to charge more for the short than for the long haul, who should complain? If it is not reasonable to charge more for the short haul, the party injured has three remedies: First, by criminal prosecution and a fine of not less than $1,000; second, by a civil suit in State or United States courts; third, by an appeal to the commission, its order, or a suit instituted by it, should the commission sections be adopted. Hence there are three safeguards against any company charging more or less than is reasonable for any haul, long or short.

Let us suppose certain cases illustrating the injustice of this section. I have a diagram here that I do not suppose all can see, so I will take those four doors by way of illustration, because every one can see them. I insert my diagram; either illustrates my remarks, as I shall refer to the matter by letters, varying the same to meet the facts in each case supposed:

I will now take these four doors because every one can see them, and I will designate them by letters. The Speaker's desk is C, I am at E; F is where Washington's picture stands. Now, A and B represent cities, as also do the other letters. From city A to city B you can under this section charge the same as from A to C, a lesser distance, whenever competition or the laws of trade or increased volume of business or other causes make them reasonably the same. There is no doubt of that. The distances are unequal, but the charge the same. A to C is a short haul, A to B a long one, but over this short haul you may charge as much as over the long one, though the distance is but one-half. The substitute allows this. Half way between cities C and B is situated a town D, to which from C there is a grade of 60 feet to the mile. A locomotive can at the same cost do only about one-fourth as much work over a 60-foot grade as it can on the level; consequently it is worth more to haul from A to D than it is from A to C. Say it is reasonable to charge $1 per ton from A to C, hence the law allows it. It is also reasonable to charge from A to D more than from A to C because of the increased grade and other causes. The law allows it because reasonable. But you may under this section charge as little from A to B as from A to C; does it not follow that you might be allowed to charge less from A to B than from A to D in such cases? In other words, the charge from A to D may under section 1 be more than from A to C, and under section 4 the charge from A to B may be as small as from A to C.

Mr. REAGAN. The long haul embraces every part of the road, whatever the grade. You can not make the long haul without running over the worst part of the road.

Mr. BUDD. I do not dispute that in this case. I understand that proposition. But yet you allow the company to charge as little for the long haul, running over the entire road, as you do from A to C before you get to the heavy grade. This fault can be corrected by amendment, and hence is not serious. But the Reagan substitute does not say "over the same track;" it says over the railroad, and includes all branches and leased lines.

Now we will suppose another case. A road runs from A to D, but from D to B there is no road operated; B is a large seaport town from which there is water transportation to A, not, however, touching at D. Now the charge from A to D is worth $1 per ton; it is charged; freight can be carried by water from B to A at, say, 50 cents per ton. If the road operated to D could be extended and was permitted to carry freight at like rate from A to B it might get much through and return freight, nearly filling cars both ways, whereas from D to A there is but little return freight. To get this through traffic it must compete with water, however, and can not get any of it at a greater charge than 50 cents per ton. If it could carry this volume of through freight, it would justify operating, or building and operating, the line D B; for a small profit could be made which added to its other revenues would in so far forth relieve D. But under section 4 it can not charge less from A to B than A to D. It might charge the same, but at $1 it can get no through freight and 50 cents on the entire traffic would not pay. You must either abandon the local traffic or not take the through at obtainable rates. Now, this would in some cases retard railroad extension and in others prevent competition.

Again, suppose another case. Assume, this time, that A and B are large competing centers with water communication. From A to D is a heavy grade of sixty feet. The road is tunneled, the beds blasted, and the whole work very expensive. The road is built, of necessity, to connect these points, the through traffic being large, though the local traffic is unremunerative. Now, as heretofore stated, transportation over a grade costs much more than on a level. Another company is operating a line from A to B by the way of E, also a large business center. A E B is on a level, hence the company can and does charge less than is profitable for A C B. The law allows it to, and it may, charge less for the entire route than the first company can for any shorter distance on its line. But the first company lease or buy the line of the second, and at once this section 4 prohibits it charging for the shorter mountain grade or any intermediate points, as from A to D, more than it does for A E B. Or, the first company after building the first line may have discovered the second route. Any case in which a company owns two lines, one good and the other bad, can be made applicable to this illustration.

Suppose in this last case it snows heavily in the mountains between C and D. There are expensive snow-sheds, and on this line are a large force of men at high wages. Now, it is a fact that when there is snow the cost of transportation is greatly increased. Experts say the increase in cost is from 10 to 75 per cent. Nimmo gives it at from 15 to 25 per cent. The experts before the Senate committee of 1876 gave varying figures according to the road. Bliss, of the Boston and Albany Railroad, stated that cost of maintaining that road is 12½ per cent. greater, repairs to machinery 10 per cent. greater, loss of power in locomotive 10 per cent., but that the greatest loss was from the detentions. Kneass, of the Pennsylvania Railroad, gave cost there in winter as 12 per cent. greater than summer. On the Vermont Central, according to Millis, it was in winter from 70 to 75 per cent. more than in summer. On the Baltimore and Ohio it was from 5 to 20 per cent. greater from the same causes.

Now, the road must be kept open and the cities along it be supplied, yet over this rocky, mountainous, snow-shedded, and expensive road section 4 prohibits any charge being made that is greater than is made by the same company on a longer line along the level, open, pleasant country.

That there are such heavily graded, snow-shedded, blasted-out, and expensive lines of road all know who have crossed the continent.

Again, suppose that there is a branch line which runs off into the coal or mining regions to G. Though running into these regions on a grade of forty, sixty, eighty, or one hundred feet to the mile, over which a locomotive could carry from nine to twenty-one cars only, this section 4 prohibits the company from charging a greater amount over this branch than on the level from one terminus to the other because it is a little shorter than the main trunk. Or, suppose the trunk and branch are both level, but differ in the fact that on the trunk there is much traffic both ways; on the other it is almost all in one direction. Suppose, now, that the trunk is one hundred miles and the branch is ninety. Each freight car weighs ten tons, and full load is ten tons more. The locomotive weighs thirty-three tons. There is more than a ton of dead weight to every ton of freight carried. On the level the locomotive can draw seventy loaded cars. On the trunk it can get 70 per cent. return freight; on the branch but 10 per cent. It therefore might be compelled to charge more on the short than on the long haul to make the same rate of profit; this, however, is prohibited.

Were there a grade of forty feet on this branch the same power that hauled seven hundred tons freight over the main line would haul only two hundred and ten tons freight over the branch, and the wear and tear would be much greater. Still the company is prohibited by this section from charging more thereon for a like quantity and kind. This is equally true, no matter in what direction nor from what point the lines radiate. The cost on different systems owned by the same company vary greatly. On some branches a large profit is made, while on others a loss is sustained. The same company has to charge different rates on different branches of its roads to equalize these matters.

I will now give a further illustration. Suppose C and D represent two mines in California. C produces ore worth $40 per ton; D ore worth but $6 per ton, and it is some miles beyond C. To transport the forty-dollar ore it charges $5 per ton, which rate is necessary to pay a profit to the transportation company of 6 per cent. I wish to develop D. My ore is worth but $6 per ton. I can make a good profit on this if I can obtain a reasonable rate to the mills at A. I apply to the company for rates, but am informed that it could carry my ore for $1 per ton and make 15 per cent. on operating expenses, or 1½ per cent. upon its capital, because of the quantity shipped, but that it is by section 4 of this act prohibited from charging for a longer haul one cent less than for a short one, hence it must under the law charge me $5 per ton transportation. This I can not pay. I throw up my hands and say, "Very well; I must wait until nature puts forty-dollar ore into my mine, because you are prohibited from charging a less rate, as the haul is longer." The development of my mine and the locality where it is situated is thus retarded. It is so with other industries which might be developed; so with coal, and iron, and even factories.

Again, if from A to D, in order to compete with another rail line centering at D, a company had to increase its speed to, say, thirty miles per hour, and yet this same company had between A and D water competition only, it might in the latter case run its through freight by slow line. About ten miles per hour is the maximum that will give the greatest profit; as you increase in speed beyond this you nearly in proportion increase the cost of transportation. Now, though by reason of this high rate of speed and the better facilities required at D the cost of transporting a similar amount and kind of property from A to D is greater than from A to B, the company can not charge a cent more therefor, because the haul is shorter.

Why, if from A to B there were two parallel and competing lines owned by different parties, one stopping at D and the other not, the one line could not charge from A to B a cent less than it did from A to

D; and the other line, because not stopping at D, could charge from A to B half as much as the first line did from A to D, and thus run it out of the through business. There are hundreds of competing lines centering in competitive points, but not touching at the same intermediate points, in this very condition. This would not encourage and might prevent competition.

I could, had I time, give forty illustrations showing why section 4 should not be adopted. They rise like Banquo's issue, and with Macbeth I can exclaim:

> Yet the eighth appears, who bears a glass,
> Which shows me many more.

I will use one more illustration, however. Much is said about the charge from Chicago to New York being less than from Buffalo to New York, and it is charged that a high rate is placed upon the latter traffic to compensate the railroads for their losses on the through freight. Now I can see how from Chicago to New York a less charge than from Buffalo to the latter place would not only be no injury but really a benefit. Suppose a certain sum must be raised on freight to pay 6 per cent. upon the New York-Buffalo road, and there are but 9,000,000 tons of local traffic; this then must pay the profit on the road, and rates are fixed accordingly. Now, off in Chicago are the products of the great West awaiting transportation to the Atlantic seaboard. There is water transportation from Chicago to New York and Montreal, and several competing lines also center there.

There is much grain to be transported, but as it has already paid a heavy transportation charge from the West to Chicago, it must have the lowest rates from there to the seaboard in order to leave any profit to the farmer and justify him in further exertions. The water transportation is low; the rate to the East is fixed by it and by the competition of rail lines. If now the New York company desires any of this freight it can have it, but at a low rate, a rate that would not pay 2 per cent. upon its capital, but would pay 20 per cent. over its operating expenses. To get this freight it must take it at a rate lower than from Buffalo to New York. It has the cars. If it takes this freight it can obtain enough to give a gross revenue of $3,000,000, or, say, a net revenue of one million or seven hundred and fifty thousand, or any other sum. Who is injured? It is said the New Yorker must compete in the Liverpool market against the Western man, who has cheaper transportation and can therefore undersell him. This is not so, for the aggregate freightage paid by the Kansas or Iowa farmer to New York is greater than that of the New Yorker, for he pays two charges, to and from Chicago.

But I have said this low rate might be a benefit to the local traffic. Without it there is no outside income; with it is obtained this amount of money from the West, which is added to the receipts from local traffic, and thus assists in making the required percentage of profits, and in so far forth relieves the local shipper; it justifies a reduction of local rates.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR], in his speech on this bill, speaking of the evidence of Mr. Alexander before the committee two years ago, said:

> Two years ago he stated in reference to the railroad history of this country that no instance could be found, and he defied any one to point one out, where any railroad company had ever raised its local rates in consequence of carrying through freights at a low price. On this point every railroad manager agreed with him, and they all asserted, on the contrary, that a reduction of local rates almost always followed a reduction of through rates; and my friend from Texas will remember that their universal testimony was that a raise in local freight to make up for losses on through freight was unknown to the railroad business.

From this it will be seen that in so far as the profits from the long haul tend to augment the gross revenue of the company they tend to decrease the local rates.

From these statements the House will understand the reasons why I think the long and short haul provision ought not to be adopted as a part of the substitute. We on the Pacific coast are directly interested in this matter. It is a long haul there. If the rule prescribed in this bill be adopted, and the companies can not make any reduction on the long haul, you simply say to California, "We discriminate against you." That is the effect of this section. There is no State in the Union more interested in having the long interstate hauls as cheap as possible, and should this section be adopted, making the aggregate charges to the intermediate points the measure of rates to California, it would badly cripple our through business. California is a large exporter to England, and prior to the completion of the Southern Pacific was compelled to ship in sailing vessels, owned generally by foreigners. Millions were thus annually sent as freightage-money to foreign countries. It is of interest to California and her farmers that this transportation be by the quickest means and at the lowest profitable rate, and that freightage be paid to American citizens, who will develop our country. This section tends to force an increased through rate, and thus cripple a competition that was of great benefit to California. It will tend to hamper the railroads in their competition for the products of the Orient, and force to foreign bottoms the commerce that otherwise might pour through the Golden Gate and pay tribute to our people.

Having used these illustrations, I will briefly state (and any one can verify these statements) some of the elements that enter more largely into the cost of transportation than the mere item of length of haul. From Newcastle, Cal., to Reno, Nev., is about 123 miles; there is a grade of over 7,000 feet to overcome—nearly a mile and a quarter. At some places the grade is 116 feet to the mile. Now, every one who has examined in regard to gradients can understand that the same power will move much less on this line than on a level—only about nine loaded cars per locomotive over this portion of the road. The wear and tear is greater, and large sums are annually expended on snow-sheds and for a large force of men. The same power that will haul nine cars from Newcastle to Reno can haul over sixty cars one hundred and seventy miles from Newcastle to San Francisco by way of Stockton, and at less expense. Yet, because the former is a shorter haul on the same line of road, section 4 will not permit the company to charge a cent less on the latter route. Examine the section. Direction, branches, physical aspect, snow, wear and tear, gradients, competition, cost of fuel, volume of traffic, and everything are all ignored, and distance made the sole consideration.

The following are a few of the many elements which enter into the cost of transportation; many of these are much more important than distance.

First, gradients. Of this I have spoken. I now append a table showing the hauling power of a 33-ton locomotive:

Grades.	Hauling power.	Loaded cars.
	Tons.
On a level	1,400	70
20 feet to the mile	655	32
40 feet to the mile	415	21
60 feet to the mile	300	15
80 feet to the mile	230	11
100 feet to the mile	180	9

Second. Cost of road itself. All will understand that to make the same rate of profit on two roads of equal length and volume of traffic more must be charged upon the costlier one.

Third. Wages paid. These differ greatly. On the Pacific coast they are over one-third greater than the average on the railroads of the United States.

Fourth. Cost of fuel and materials, which vary greatly.

Fifth. The direction of the haul. This is a greater item than is generally supposed. It has been estimated that because the west-bound cars are generally empty freight can often be carried in them at a profit over operating expenses for from one-third to one-fifth of the east-bound charges. This was calculated a few years since over the Pittsburgh and Fort Wayne. It was also found by Morehouse, of the Illinois Central, that the average cost of freight transportation over that line per ton per mile was 15.8 mills, but that return freight could be carried for 3 mills per ton per mile, or at about one-sixth of this, and that if the cars traveled both ways loaded the freight charges could be reduced one-half and still yield the same profits. Under section 4, however, one could not charge less for a shorter haul of return than for a longer haul of through freight.

Sixth. Speed. The importance of this I have shown.

Seventh. Competition. The controlling influence of water and rail competition all understand. It is not only competiton between lines of transportation that determined their rates, but also the competition of places. The competition of foreign markets must be considered, and the price and volume of wheat in India and at Odessa have a large influence in determining the rates to the United States seaboard.

Eighth. Volume of traffic. This is one of the most important elements considered by railroad officials in the preparation of schedules of charges. Its importance can not be overlooked. Morehouse's figures show that on the Illinois Central, if the volume was only sufficient to fill the cars operated, a reduction of one-half in the charges would give the same profits. This being so, the effect of doubling the volume of traffic can be understood.

I take the following table from the Government reports, showing the cost of transportation at the time on lines operated by the Louisville, Nashville and Great Southern Railroad Company. The differences over the various branches are due mostly to the volume of traffic on each:

Line.	Cost per ton per mile.
	Cents.
Main stem	1.78
Memphis line	2.10
Nashville and Decatur Railroad	2.54
Knoxville branch	4.17
Bardstown branch	7.72
Richmond branch	9.60
Glasgow branch	19.10

There are many branch lines and feeders in the United States which barely pay their operating expenses at a higher rate than is charged over the main trunks to which they belong, but which must be run on account of the demands of trade and for the profits made on the trunks from the freight they pour into them. According to the last census 330 companies had no net income available for dividends or profits; 92 companies made under 1 per cent.; 116 between 1 and 3 per cent.; 182 between 3 and 7 per cent.; 114 between 7 and 10, and the remaining companies made over 10 per cent.

It thus appears that there are many companies that might be bankrupted by this section, although many now making a large profit would not be injured. It would cripple the weak and not the powerful.

But I will not dwell any further upon elements which enter into the cost of the running of railroad trains. Fink gives fifty-eight elements entering into cost of transportation.

I favor in general the bill of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] as a substitute for the first seven sections of the committee's bill, still I think it should be amended; that the first and seventh sections should be changed as indicated, the fourth section struck out, and the third strengthened. All remedies for railroad abuses other than Government ownership have elsewhere proved inadequate, and ultimately this will be the solution everywhere. I do not mean the ownership of all railroads, but of a few trunk tracks crossing the country and kept in order by the Government, over which, at a low toll and under proper regulations, any one can run a train of cars as now they can a boat upon the rivers.

I would have considered it far better for California, and for the people of the Pacific coast generally, if some Pacific railroad bill regulating the operations and charges on those roads which had received aid from the Government, and preventing extortions and unjust discriminations thereon, had been passed by this House, even amended if necessary, such as contemplated and introduced by my colleague [Mr. SUMNER], who has given this subject long study. But that not being the case, we should take the best we can get if so amended as to accomplish the result desired. I would like to point out and urge many of the good provisions of this substitute, but as others have done this and my time has expired I can not now do so. I desire to see amendments adopted to the first, second, third, fourth, fifth, and seventh sections of this bill, and I will offer them when in order. They are to perfect the bill, and in part prevent wars of rates and such pooling and combinations as are injurious to the people. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has five minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. BUDD. I desire to reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. GLASCOCK was recognized.

Mr. REAGAN. If the gentleman from California does not desire to proceed this evening I will move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GLASCOCK. I will yield for that purpose.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

With reference to the recommendations on the subject in my recent annual message I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State of the 9th instant, showing the necessity for immediate legislation for the purpose of bringing the statutes of the United States into conformity with the international regulations for preventing collisions at sea, which have been adopted by all the leading maritime powers of the world except this country.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, D. C., December 10, 1884.

NEW ORLEANS COTTON CENTENNIAL EXPOSITION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following telegram; which was read, and laid on the table:

NEW ORLEANS, December 9, 1884.

To the Speaker of the House of Representatives, Washington:

On behalf of board of management of the World's Industrial and Cotton Centennial Exposition, by resolution thereof, I am empowered to extend, with yourself, to the House an invitation to be present at the opening ceremonies of the exposition, which will take place on the 16th of December (Tuesday). Individual and collective invitations have already been forwarded by mail to yourself and to each member of the House.

EDMUND RICHARDSON, President.
RICHARD DIXON, Secretary.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois, by unanimous consent leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the case of Thomas G. Baylor without leaving copies on file.

And then the motion of Mr. REAGAN was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BALLENTINE: Petition of widow of F. T. McLaurine, deceased, to have claim referred to Court of Claims to correct errors in adjudication of the Commissary-General—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. BRENTS: Memorial of the Bar Association of Spokane and other counties, Washington Territory, relative to an amendment to the law appointing one additional justice of the supreme court of said Territory—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. T. M. BROWNE: Petition of 50 citizens and ex-soldiers of the city of Muncie, Ind., for the passage of the Mexican war pension bill and Senate amendments—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. GOFF: Petition of Eli Phillips and 62 others, asking for the passage of the Mexican war pension bill—to the same committee.

By Mr. HANBACK: Petition of Lebanon Post, No. 240, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Kansas, for the passage of the Mexican war pension bill—to the same committee.

By Mr. HEPBURN: Petition of J. E. Teale and 50 others, citizens of Davis City, Iowa, asking for the passage of the Mexican war pension bill and amendments—to the same committee.

By Mr. A. S. HEWITT: Memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, relative to the defenses of the port and harbor of New York—to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. LEWIS: Papers relating to the claim of Lucius J. Seals—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. MATSON: Petition of James R. Fritts and 75 others, members of Winchester Post, No. 333, Grand Army of the Republic, Gosport, Ind., for the passage of the Mexican war pension bill as amended—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. MILLIKEN: Petition of Thomas J. Lyon and others, for passage of bill to enforce the eight-hour law—to the Committee on Labor.

By Mr. NELSON: A bill for an examination and survey of the harbor of Duluth, &c.—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. CHARLES O'NEILL: Petition of John Connell, to have the charge of desertion removed from his Army record—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. RANNEY: Petition of Thomas G. Stevenson Post, No. 26, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Massachusetts, for publication in Official Records of the War of the Rebellion of photographic illustrations—to the same committee.

By Mr. ROSECRANS: Petition of August V. Kautz, Colonel Eighth Infantry, and other officers of the United States Army, in favor of a bill to facilitate promotions in the Army—to the same committee.

Also, petition of H. Brooks and others, citizens of San Francisco, requesting an early consideration of the bill for the relief of Charles M. Blake—to the same committee.

By Mr. STEELE: Paper relating to the pension claim of Col. E. W. Penney—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. STRAIT: Petition of P. Cudmore and 250 others, praying that the statute of limitations be removed, and that the soldiers' right of pension shall commence at the date of discharge, &c.—to the same committee.

By Mr. J. M. TAYLOR: Papers relating to the claim of Archibald Thomas—to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, papers relating to the claim of Archibald Thomas, Madison County, Tennessee—to the same committee.

By Mr. WASHBURN: Papers relating to the claim of Chaplain Charles M. Blake for restoration to his former rank in the Army, with pay, &c.—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, December 11, 1884.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PREVENTION OF COLLISIONS AT SEA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

To the Senate:

With reference to the recommendations on the subject in my recent annual message I transmit herewith a report of the Secretary of State of the 9th instant showing the necessity for immediate legislation for the purpose of bringing the statutes of the United States into conformity with the international regulations for preventing collisions at sea, which have now been adopted by all the leading maritime powers of the world except this country.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, December 10, 1884.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution, which had previously received the signature of the Speaker of the House of Representatives:

A bill (S. 1309) to provide statuary and historical tablets for the Saratoga monument; and Joint resolution (S. R. 98) extending the time fixed for the joint commission appointed under the sundry civil act approved July 7, 1884, to submit their report.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, favoring the construction of suitable defenses for New York Harbor; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the petition of E. A. Farr, of Washington, D. C., agent of the estate of S. O. Baker, deceased, praying compensation for supplies furnished United States troops during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented a petition of over 2,000 citizens of the city of New York, praying the repeal of all acts by which the term of many administrative offices is fixed at four years; which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. LOGAN presented a telegram from Mark L. Crawford, president of the Trade and Labor Assembly of Chicago, Ill., in behalf of 30,000 organized workmen of Chicago, in favor of the passage of the bill now pending before the Senate forbidding the importation of foreign laborers under contract; which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2393) to change the name of the State National Bank of North Providence, R. I., reported it without amendment.

HILLSBOROUGH NATIONAL BANK.

Mr. MORRILL. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance to report favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 7428) to authorize the Hillsborough National Bank to change its name to that of the First National Bank of Hillsborough, Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is simply the correction of the name of a bank. It is recommended by the Comptroller of the Currency, and I believe there can be no possible objection to it. I ask that the bill be put on its passage now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the bill be now considered. It will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill; and by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 2434) to amend section 5 of the act entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," approved June 10, 1880; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WILSON introduced a bill (S. 2435) for the relief of the volunteers of the Fourth Regiment of Iowa Infantry; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ERICSSON'S SUBMARINE GUN.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. "Concurrent or other resolutions" being in order, the Chair lays before the Senate the resolution submitted yesterday by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR], which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to investigate the new system of naval defense for the seaports of the United States proposed by Capt. John Ericsson, especially with a view to ascertaining the efficiency of his new submarine gun and projectile torpedo for that purpose; also to ascertain whether the same is about to be purchased for the exclusive use of any foreign power, and whether or not the efficiency of the naval service and prudent provision for the national defense require the purchase and appropriation of this invention by the Government.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

DEBATE ON SPANISH TREATY.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I ask for the consideration of the following resolution:

Whereas a commercial treaty of great importance has been negotiated between the United States and Spain, which was made public by the King of Spain to such extent that it was cabled from Madrid by the Times, of New York city, and given to the American people by that journal before the same was presented with becoming solemnity and secrecy to the Senate:

Whereas the provisions of said treaty materially affect the subject of revenues and taxation, involving no serious questions of diplomacy and state secrets, the discussions thereof should be in open session, so that the people may be fully apprised of the reasons why said treaty should be ratified or rejected: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be directed to report an amendment or additional rule requiring that treaties which concern matters of revenue shall be considered in open session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that the resolution be now considered. Is there objection?

Mr. WILSON. I object to the present consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the resolution goes over.

GALVESTON HARBOR IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. COKE. I desire, with the concurrence of both the majority and minority of the Committee on Commerce, to have a day set for the consideration of the bill (S. 1652) to provide for the improvement of the channel between Galveston Harbor and the Gulf of Mexico.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas asks that the bill indicated by him be now taken up with a view to his moving its postponement to a day certain and that it be made a special order. Is there objection?

Mr. CULLOM. I should like to inquire of the Senator what day he proposes to fix.

Mr. COKE. Thursday, the 8th day of January next, at 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to taking up the bill for the purpose named by the Senator from Texas? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Texas moves that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until January 8, next, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, and that the bill be made a special order for that time. Is the Senate ready for the question? Senators in the affirmative will say "ay"; the negative will say "nay." (Putting the question.) In the opinion of the Chair, two-thirds of the Senators present have voted in the affirmative, and the order is made.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 7577) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

FORFEITURE OF OREGON LAND GRANT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further resolutions that order is closed. Pursuant to the order of the Senate of yesterday the Chair lays before the Senate the bill (H. R. 181) to declare forfeiture of certain lands granted to aid in the construction of a railroad in Oregon. The bill has been considered as in Committee of the Whole and reported to the Senate. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert as an additional section:

SEC. 2. That the act of March 3, 1875, entitled "An act for the relief of settlers within railroad limits," is hereby repealed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have the yeas and nays on agreeing to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. Temporarily occupying the chair yesterday I was a good deal interested in the subject of the debate in so much as it affected the bill. The lands embraced in the bill are scarcely worth a dollar and a quarter an acre according to the concurring testimony of the two Senators from Oregon, but the precedent about to be set in regard to dealing with lands which have been forfeited and are now restored to public entry is so important, that the Senate ought to consider this question very carefully and vote understandingly.

It seems to me it would not be wise to set a precedent in this case that can not be followed in regard to other land grants when they are restored to public sale. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] made a suggestion that this case might be made an exception; but we can not make exceptions of this kind without doing a great deal of damage. It can do no harm to the people of Oregon to allow the land to be entered only under the homestead law. Under the law as it now stands when this land is restored to the public domain it is open to homestead entry. All the lands that are really needed by the people of Oregon can be acquired under the homestead law; but if the example is set of restoring lands that have long been reserved from sale to the old price of a dollar and a quarter an acre it will enable speculators under the pre-emption law and other laws to get possession of the lands, largely increased in value, and thus withhold them from general settlement.

I am therefore decidedly in favor of the amendment. Indeed, if it were not for introducing general legislation on a private or local bill, I should be in favor in this bill of repealing the pre-emption laws. They have long survived their usefulness; they ought to have been repealed long ago.

When the homestead law was enacted it was a new policy, which embraced all the public lands; and I myself will not vote for any bill that will open any portion of the public lands of the United States to disposition in any other way than under the homestead law. I believe that the homestead law is a wise provision for the disposition of public lands; and all wild lands, wherever they may be located, should be thrown open for settlement and occupation and acquisition only upon the basis of that law, except, as a matter of course, in special cases, where, as in military reservations and other lands which have been long withheld from the market, which have a largely increased value by the growth of settlements around them, in which case they should be sold at public outcry to the highest bidder under circumstances that would secure to the Government the highest price; but all public lands should only be acquired under the homestead policy.

I think the amendment of the Senator from Kansas is much more important as a precedent than it is so far as it affects this particular grant; but it seems to me that in every case where land, after long being withheld from public entry, is restored again to public disposition, it ought to be disposed of only under the homestead law.

Therefore I shall vote for the amendment, and I only make these remarks in order to call the attention of Senators to the importance of the question upon which they are now about to vote.

Mr. PLUMB. The position the Senator from Ohio takes exactly accords with my vote on yesterday. I should have been glad to have had his aid yesterday in support of the position of the Public Lands Committee, but the Senate, by a somewhat decided vote, disputed the position of the committee, and that has passed out of the jurisdiction of the Senate for the time.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator probably is not aware that I voted for his proposition. I was not in a position to speak, however.

Mr. PLUMB. I was going to say that the proposition now pending before the Senate on the motion to adopt the amendment which I proposed yesterday is in the same direction—that is to say, the direction of preventing speculation in public lands—and I hope there will be no dissent in the Senate as to its adoption.

Mr. LAPHAM. So far as I am concerned I am entirely ignorant of the policy which led to the passage of the act of 1875. But it is a general law enacted by Congress, and I rise merely for the purpose of suggesting that to repeal such a law by an amendment to a bill like this is improvident legislation, and we ought not to entertain the idea of doing it. If the law of 1875 is to be repealed let it be done by a bill, when its merits and the purpose of its enactment can be considered. If we repeal it by this amendment, we repeal it without really knowing anything about the policy which led to its enactment, and it seems to me we ought not to do it.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator from New York is entirely mistaken. This amendment is not only entirely germane to the purpose of the bill, but it is an absolute necessity if speculation is to be prevented, because the occasion for speculation arises on the passage of the bill; that is to say, it then brings up the class of claims under the act of 1875, and unless we repeal the act at this time a repeal of it hereafter in reference to these claims will be entirely valueless. It is the handmaid, the necessary accompaniment, of this forfeiture bill. No forfeiture bill ought to be passed finally until the act is repealed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GARLAND in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLPH (when his name was called). I shall vote "nay" on this question, because I do not like to attach the repeal of the act to this bill.

Mr. KENNA (when his name was called). I am paired on all questions with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. GARLAND. I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS].

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—33.

Blair,	Hampton,	Mitchell,	Sawyer,
Brown,	Harrison,	Morgan,	Sherman,
Call,	Hawley,	Morrill,	Slater,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hill,	Palmer,	Vance,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hoar,	Pike,	Van Wyck,
Cullom,	Ingalls,	Platt,	Vest.
Dawes,	McMillan,	Plumb,
Frye,	Manderson,	Pugh,
Groome,	Miller of N. Y.,	Riddleberger,

NAYS—11.

Bayard,	Dolph,	Lapham,	Sheffield,
Coke,	Jackson,	Maxey,	Walker.
Conger,	Jonas,	Sewell,

ABSENT—32.

Aldrich,	Edmunds,	Harris,	Miller of Cal.,
Allison,	Fair,	Jones of Florida,	Pendleton,
Beck,	Farley,	Jones of Nevada,	Ransom,
Bowen,	Garland,	Kenna,	Sabin,
Butler,	George,	Lamar,	Saulsbury,
Camden,	Gibson,	Logan,	Voorhees,
Cockrell,	Gorman,	McPherson,	Williams,
Colquitt,	Hale,	Mahone,	Wilson.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If no further amendment be proposed, the question is on the third reading of the bill.

Mr. MORGAN. Before the bill goes to a third reading I desire to call the attention of both the Senators from Oregon to a question that may arise in this case. The same question, I will say, arose in committee and was there answered, but I wish to have it answered in the Senate. I wish to know whether there are any persons concerned in this land grant by purchase from the railroad company, or by mortgage of the railroad company upon the lands, whose rights would be affected by this forfeiture; whether there are any other parties to this forfeiture now than the Government of the United States on the one hand and the railroad corporation on the other; because if there are persons whose rights will be affected, their rights are totally unprovided for in the bill, and I should feel compelled to offer an amendment for the purpose of carrying the case into the circuit court of the United States for Oregon, there to have their rights determined, unless the Senators can give assurance to the Senate that there are no such rights.

Mr. SLATER. My understanding is that there are no such cases as those referred to by the Senator from Alabama. While I could not say there might not be a single case, my understanding is that there has been no effort to sell any part of the land by the company or to place any mortgages upon it. So it is a case absolutely and entirely between the Government of the United States and the corporation claiming the grant, and there is no occasion, it seems to me, to attach to the bill a provision sending the case to the courts, which would operate simply to cause unnecessary expense and long delay,

Mr. DOLPH. I believe that there are mortgages which embrace in their terms and description the entire grant earned and unearned, but I suppose that a mortgage of a railroad company or other grantee of a land grant which has been made upon a condition subsequent can only take such rights as the original grantee from the Government had, and that if the condition is not performed and the unearned portion of the grant is forfeited because of such non-performance, the mortagee would have no just claim as against the United States to the unearned portion of the grant; that is to say, that the mortgagee could take by the mortgage no greater rights than the mortgageor, and that if as against the company Congress has power to forfeit the grant, it also has the same power to forfeit the grant against its grantees and mortgagees. For that reason I do not conceive that in this case the amendment mentioned by the Senator from Alabama is necessary.

I thought when the bill was before the Committee on Public Lands that there were no cases of persons who had gone upon the lands claiming under the railroad company. I am informed by Mr. GEORGE, of the House, and heard something to that effect while in Oregon recently, that there are a few persons who have chosen to go upon the lands under the company; but there is no doubt, as I said in my remarks in regard to the amendment already adopted by the Senate, if they have made any payments to the railroad company those payments will be refunded. At all events, I do not see why Congress should undertake to recognize contracts between the railroad company and settlers on the land under it. But it is provided in the amendment that such settlers as are not qualified to purchase under the general laws of the United States may secure the land by paying the United States the minimum price for the same—a dollar and a quarter an acre. I think there are very few such cases. I do not think any question can be involved that will not be settled justly and equitably under the amendment already adopted by the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. Does the Senator from Oregon say there is a mortgage upon these lands?

Mr. DOLPH. There is a general railroad mortgage and a deed of trust, according to my recollection, which embraces this grant.

Mr. MORGAN. There are two incumbrances on it, then?

Mr. DOLPH. It embraces this grant in terms, and of course if the lands were earned by the construction of the road, the mortgage would take effect upon the earned lands, but to the extent that these lands have not been earned I cannot conceive that the grantees of the railroad company or the mortgagees of the railroad company have any greater rights than the company itself, and when we forfeit the lands, and cut off the right of the railroad company to earn them by the construction of the road, we necessarily cut off the right of all persons claiming under the railroad company either as grantees or mortgagees.

Mr. MORGAN. I am compelled on this occasion to refer to something that occurred in the Committee on Public Lands. When this subject was under discussion and the bill was being prepared, I put the question to both the Senators from Oregon whether there was any incumbrance upon these lands, and I understood both Senators to say that there was not. I further put the question whether there were any persons who had taken land from the railroad company by purchase or under contract, whose rights would be affected by this forfeiture. I understood both Senators to say that there were none. Now, we are informed by one of the Senators at least that there are persons who have purchased land from the railroad company, whose rights are expected to be protected under an amendment which he offers to the bill. We are informed further that there is a mortgage upon the land, and perhaps also a deed of trust. I will say that if these facts had been known to the Committee on Public Lands (and I do not pretend that they were withheld from the committee improperly, but the Senators evidently did not know the facts at the time) a motion at least would have been made in that committee to have the principles applied to this bill which were applied by the Senate to the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad, which principles I think are applicable to every case of forfeiture where the question is not exclusively between the Government and the grantee corporation.

I hold to the doctrine, and the Senate has so voted by a very large majority of the body, that whenever we declare the forfeiture of a land grant and it is found that there are claims asserted in good faith on the part of mortgagees or on the part of other purchasers or contractors with the company to the lands, it is our duty to extend a remedy through the courts of the United States to the company and to these parties to litigate the extent and character and value of their claims, and that duty becomes absolutely incumbent upon the Congress of the United States, because our system of laws prohibits really the Government of the United States from being sued by any private person unless it is done by the express consent of Congress. Now, to take the property of these mortgagees, about which we know nothing, and here to confiscate it (for that is the effect of it) in an ex parte proceeding, without due process of law and without giving them a hearing to show what their claims are, is something that I can not consent to. I was not put here for the purpose of sitting in judgment upon private rights between individuals in this country. My function here is to legislate, to make constitutional laws and none other, and not to invade private rights by the legislative action of this body of which I am a member.

Now, Mr. President, I ask that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until this question can be examined into and until the Committee on Public Lands can be informed as to when these mortgages were created, in whose behalf they exist, what the rights and equities of the mortgagees may be, for we are legislating here entirely in the dark. We are legislating upon a state of facts that I did not know or believe to exist.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I would not occupy the time of the Senate for a moment longer if the honorable Senator from Alabama had not referred to what was supposed to have taken place in the committee.

If I was ever questioned in regard to this matter of mortgages I certainly stated the fact as I understood it to be, that mortgages had been executed which in their terms embraced the grant and would take effect upon the earned portion of the grant; but if the road was not completed the unearned portion, I suppose, would fall with the forfeiture of the grant itself. I can not conceive why, if Congress proposes to act upon the rights of the grantor, the railroad company, it can not act in the same manner upon the rights of all persons claiming under the company as grantees or mortgagees of the company, and why the title of the company and all its grantees does not stand precisely on the same state of facts and is not governed by the same rules of law.

I think the Senator is mistaken in supposing that the statement was made either by my colleague or myself that the grant had never been mortgaged. I was not aware that there were any persons upon any of the unearned lands which it is proposed to forfeit at the time the matter was under consideration in the Senate Committee on Public Lands claiming under the railroad company. That is a matter of recent information to myself, but the number is very few, and their rights I think are sufficiently provided for by the amendment offered by myself.

I do not think there will be any legal controversy whatever over this unearned portion of the grant if the bill is passed as reported by my colleague from the committee. I think the construction of this road has been virtually abandoned by the company, at least nothing has been done recently, and there is no present disposition to commence its construction. I do not think this is a case requiring the amendment which was made to the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad bill. I speak from a knowledge of the circumstances and the facts of the case. I hope that the honorable Senator will allow the bill to come to a vote and be passed as it now stands.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, if we pass this bill in the shape it now is, of course there will be no legal controversy between the United States Government and these mortgagees, whoever they may be, over this subject, for we shall have destroyed their rights entirely; they will be cut off without remedy; and I do not wish to do that until at least I understand what their rights may be and who they are that compose these mortgagees, and what the debt is that they were intended to secure. These railroad bonds have gone out—the coupon bonds especially have gone out into circulation in the community, and in those older portions of the country where the people have money treasured up they have bought these bonds, frequently at a considerable discount, as a permanent investment, and they look to the Congress of the United States to protect their rights, whatever they are.

Pass this bill, and if a question arises between one of the bondholders, who may hold a bond for a thousand dollars, and the United States Government as to whether that bondholder has some right or equity on these lands which we are now taking out of the possession of this company, what remedy can that bondholder have? None whatever. We destroy all hope of remedy, and we do not know what we are doing. We do not know the value of the claim, or the extent or the amount of it, that is alleged to be an incumbrance upon this property. In the case of Schullenberger vs. Harriman the Supreme Court of the United States have decided that the railroad corporation up to this hour is the owner in fee of these lands, subject only to be forfeited by an act of Congress or a judicial proceeding declaring that a ground of forfeiture exists. At this very moment of time when I am speaking upon this floor these mortgagees have a valid, legal subsisting incumbrance on these lands; and if the United States Government does not choose to deny the validity of that incumbrance nobody in this world can do it.

There is not any human being that exists in this world who can deny the validity of this mortgage upon this property to-day except the Congress of the United States or a court acting in pursuance of a proceeding of forfeiture, which I do not believe any court has jurisdiction under our Government to pronounce in a case of this kind. But, however that may be, here stand these mortgagees with legal rights under the laws of the land as palpable and as plain as the right of any gentleman in this body to the homestead that he may occupy, and that without knowing or seeming to care what is the character of that right and its extent and its value in law, and proceed to take it away from these mortgagees. We are the only body of men in the world that can do it, and we do it without an inquiry and without knowledge.

I reassert, sir, that I have not been informed—and I made due inquiry—of the existence of these mortgages at all until this morning. If I had been informed of it I should certainly have brought to the attention of the committee and also of the Senate the same provision which the Senate voted on the Atlantic and Pacific bill at the last session, which requires in a case of this kind that the Government of the United States shall become the actor and shall file a bill in the proper circuit court in the nature of a bill of interpleader, through which action every person claiming to have an interest in the property may be heard in court and have his rights adjudicated by that tribunal which the Constitution sets apart for this express purpose.

I can not conceive how we could go along and condemn and confiscate property without due process of law, as we are doing here to-day, when we are just informed that we are striking at rights of which we know nothing and people whose rights we do not at all comprehend.

I will change my motion, Mr. President, and I will ask that this bill be recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands, in order that it may be thoroughly understood.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama moves that the bill be recommitted.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, I am also a member of the Committee on Public Lands, and certainly have from the beginning understood that this bill proposing a forfeiture of a certain land grant in the State of Oregon had reference to one in which no questions arose, excepting such as might exist between the Government, the grantor, and the grantee, the railroad company; and I am confident that such was the understanding of the committee generally before action was taken on this bill favorable to its passage by the Senate.

I made due inquiry, as I thought, upon that point. I also understood further that this fact was found: that it was conceded upon all hands that no controversy could arise; that it was a fact that the company had abandoned absolutely and entirely all intention and all effort for the construction of the road, and therefore it was a clear case where the Government had a right to resume its control over the land grant. I did not know until this morning, and I learned it this morning by information coming from the other end of the Capitol, that there was a mortgage, and I learn still further by the declaration of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] there is also a deed of trust. Whether he means the same instrument by these expressions I know not, but I understand that there is an incumbrance on this land grant; and further, that questions may arise between individual settlers, and it may be other individual parties in addition to those that may arise under the mortgage and the deed of trust.

So it is conceded now that the necessity for the intervention of a court in determining whether in equity or in law there should be this forfeiture arises with reference to this land grant as to all the other grants the forfeiture of which is in question before this Congress.

Now, Mr. President, I am one of those who understand that the judiciary is one element of our form of government, and that it is no function of the legislative power to confiscate and destroy vested property rights, and I am unwilling myself (and I think such must be the sentiment of the Senate) that any bill should pass this body where it is conceded that there may be or must be controversies touching property rights between individuals, and between individuals and the Government, and there be no court of law to decide what those rights are.

It is with this view, and because I understand in the action of the Senate at the last session that to be the general judgment of the Senate that there shall be attached to all these bills proposing forfeiture a provision that the courts shall decide the rights and equities between all parties and because now it is apparent that this bill is like all the rest, that I trust the motion of the Senator from Alabama to recommit the bill will prevail.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Alabama to recommit the bill.

Mr. SLATER. I trust that that motion will not prevail. This matter has been well and thoroughly considered by the committee, and while it may be true that I may have been misled in regard to the fact of there not being any mortgage, a moment's reflection, I think, would show that there was one, for all land grants were mortgaged; but it is also true, as a matter of law and equity, that a mortgageor can give no higher title than he possesses. He can only give a conveyance by way of mortage on what he holds, and not pass the absolute title. As a fact the mortgagee takes only such right as the mortgageor had at the time of the mortgage. It is a notorious fact that not a particle of this road has been constructed during ten years, and so far as any effort to construct the railroad is concerned the matter has been abandoned for ten years, and the act expired as far back as 1876, I think, or perhaps earlier.

The Senator from Alabama, I think, in this particular case is fighting a shadow, that he will really find, when he comes to examine it, has no substance whatever. As a matter of course we know very well that Congress can not affect any vested rights. These rights can be presented in the proper court, if there be any. My understanding is that there are none that can be presented. Under the well-established decisions of the courts it would be simply foolish for the company or the mortgagees to present their alleged rights. They could not succeed if they were allowed to interplead, for the court would decide that they have no equity. Why, then, make this delay? Why have it attached to this bill? It can only end in one direction.

I think my colleague and myself understand this; and as I understand my colleague to-day there is no necessity for an amendment of this kind or an investigation of this kind. As a matter of fact we can not foreclose the rights of these parties if we should undertake to do so. It is only a question of the form of remedy. In one instance they come in under the direction of the United States and in the other they would have to come in against the individual citizen. As a matter of course my colleague and myself desire to look out for the interest of our constituents, and we would not wish them to be placed in an improper attitude; but we are satisfied there is no such case as this alleged, and there ought to be no delay in this matter.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I regret exceedingly that there should have been any suggestion that there is a necessity for a re-examination of any fact in this case before the Committee on Public Lands. I will state that my own recollection is, and I am very positive, that on one occasion, having some knowledge in regard to this matter, I stated to the committee the history of this grant among others, and on that occasion I mentioned the fact of these mortgages; and I did say, as I said before, that I did not think there were any persons on the land claiming under the railroad company.

I further say that my recollection is that the Senator from Alabama, when the bill was ordered to be reported from the committee, reserved his right of offering his amendment in the Senate if he saw fit to do so, and I have expected he would exercise his own pleasure in regard to that matter. But I certainly have withheld no information from the committee; neither has my colleague. It has been known to other members of the committee that these lands had been mortgaged, like every land grant in the United States, the land-grant mortgage being in general terms, with the understanding, of course, that the land could only be acquired by the mortgagee on the completion of the road by the mortgageor. I do not think a necessity for the amendment exists in this case. I hope at least that the bill will not be rereferred. There is certainly no necessity for it.

I am entirely in accord with my colleague in regard to the passage of this bill as it now stands. If any further amendments are to be put upon it I hope they will be made now and the bill passed and sent back to the House of Representatives in which it originated.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Oregon on my left [Mr. SLATER] thinks I am fighting a shadow. That may be so. I am certainly fighting in very shadowy ground here, somewhat in the twilight, because we have not had information of the facts about this case, and I want to fight in the broad, open daylight. I want to know who it is that has this mortgage, and also the extent of it.

This road has been partly completed and the constructed part is now in operation. It is alleged by both Senators that the residue of the projected road between Portland and Astoria has been abandoned, and acting upon that statement, which I do not controvert at all, I am willing to vote for the forfeiture of the land grant on the ground of abandonment so far as the company is concerned. But it was not until this morning that I found there was another party concerned in interest in this mortgage who has a right to raise the question whether this land grant has been abandoned or not.

I am not quite familiar enough with the terms of the grant to be able to state the point in regard to it which has arisen in other cases, and I dare say arises in this. The mortgagees would have the right to oust this company of the possession of its property, take it into their own care, and go on and complete this road and earn the value of their bonds, or at least cause the road to earn the value of their bonds. I understand that a mortgagee has a right by a proceeding of foreclosure and sale to take the lands, or whatever rights the company has, into his possession, provided the franchises of the road were covered by mortgages, as I have no doubt was the case, and go on and complete the construction of the road under the franchises and in virtue of the assistance of the grant of land. Now, we find that there are mortgagees, and of course there is an unpaid debt.

We find the simple proposition stated here that the company has abandoned its right to complete the road. Suppose it has, have we a right to assume that the mortgagees do not intend to foreclose the mortgage and become possessed of the legal rights of this company and complete the road in accordance with the public use declared by Congress and in accordance with the provisions of this land grant? We declare the forfeiture out and out against the mortgagees and against the company, not upon the ground that the mortgagees have abandoned their rights, but upon the ground that the debtor company has abandoned its rights. At the moment when the debtor company abandons its rights and ceases to become an active factor in this matter then the rights of the mortgagees spring up, and they can go on doubtless under the provisions of the trust deed or of the mortgage, and they can foreclose and perhaps by a mere power of sale become possessed of the franchises of this company and conclude the building of this railway and earn money enough and property enough to redeem their bonds out and out. I am opposed to having this amount of property struck down by the Government of the United States claiming as against the company a technical forfeiture when there may be and doubtless are mortgagees whose interests the Government ought to look to.

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question at that point?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. INGALLS. Grant that mortgages and deeds of trust have been placed upon the land included within the limits of this grant; suppose, also, that there have been settlers upon the lands who claim to have purchased from the railroad company to whom the grant was made, does the Senator think that if we should pass this bill it would deprive them of any rights to which they would be entitled by virtue of existing law? In other words, can the constitutional protection to the rights of property which declares that it shall not be taken except by due process of law be impaired by a subsequent act of Congress? And if the view that I take is correct, what would be the practical difficulty following the adoption of the pending bill that is now before us?

Mr. MORGAN. Of course, Mr. President, any law passed here in violation of the Constitution or ultra vires by Congress is to be regarded and will be regarded as a nullity in any court before which it is brought, and there is not a court in the United States whose jurisdiction is so mean that, if it has judicial authority at all, it can not upset an unconstitutional law.

Mr. INGALLS. Has the Supreme Court not held repeatedly that an act of Congress in that sense is not due process of law?

Mr. MORGAN. I so understand. That is the basis upon which I am proceeding with my argument. It is a question of remedies. I suppose that a case could be made in one of the State courts; it might originate before a justice of the peace in an action of unlawful detainer perhaps, or in a circuit court in an action of ejectment or trespass to try title or some such sort as that, and that case involving a Federal question could after it passed through the supreme court of Oregon be appealed to and decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, and the action of Congress, if found to be unconstitutional and oppressive, or unconstitutional whether oppressive or not, could be annulled by the judgment of those courts; and after so long a time the parties who assert their rights against our action here to-day, if it is ultra vires, would have their remedy.

Now, let us look at the condition of things and see whether we ought to provide some other remedy than this collateral one—this back-door action, as I will call it—which may exist in favor of the holder of a bond or in favor of the purchaser of property from this railroad company. The Senators from Oregon inform us that this is an unpopulated country, and that in a few instances, and only in a few, the railroad company has sold lands to other persons; and the Senator in front of me [Mr. DOLPH] has said that it was one of the purposes of his amendment to compensate those persons and secure to them the same title from the Government of the United States that they would have obtained from the railroad company. That would clear out of the question, perhaps, that class of people, because they would be satisfied and they would make no contention.

Mr. DOLPH. They will secure their title only on payment to the Government for the land.

Mr. MORGAN. They may have paid the railroad company, and now if they pay the Government they can get their land—that is, on paying for it twice instead of once. Now, let us see what condition the bondholders would be in. They have got a mortgage on all these lands. This land, as I have argued, and as I think no Senator will dispute, as between the Government of the United States and every person in the world but the holders of this land, is a fee-simple estate in the hands of the company, and of course that fee-simple estate is mortgaged to the mortgagees. That is the situation to-day.

These mortgagees, having this sort of legal estate conferred upon them under the mortgage for the security of their bonds, could go into a State court, for they can not get into a Federal court unless we permit them to do it by express enactment of Congress. They go into a State court and file a bill of foreclosure. Who is the party defendant to that bill? It can not be this railroad company whom we have bereft of all rights under this very bill, for we have the right to take the property away from the railroad company by an act of entry and ouster, office found, or whatever you please to call it—a declaration by Congress of the forfeiture, which is the same thing.

The railroad company can not be sued for it, for the railroad company has no longer any estate in the property. Whom then will the bond-holder proceed against? Not the Government of the United States, for that Government can not be sued in an action by one of its citizens or by any other person without its express consent. These mortgagees must hunt up some person who is upon some part of this land under color of title of some character in order to have a standing in court as against that party, and proceed by bill in equity to foreclose the mortgage. I can think of nothing so hopeless as a remedy of that kind.

We have destroyed the title of the mortgageor, the railroad company. By our bill we permit whatever the interest there may be there on the part of citizens to controvert with the Government to be taken up by allowing them to pay to the Government and by payment of money to obtain title to the land direct from the Government, which of course they would do in preference to having any litigation.

Now, sir, if I were an attorney practicing in Oregon and after this bill becomes a law some one should come to me and ask to employ me to file a bill to foreclose this mortgage and try to collect these bonds on these lands and to controvert with the Government of the United States the constitutionality of the law we are trying to pass this morning, I should be certain to say to my client, Go hence; do not send good money after bad money; do not undertake to fight the Government of the United States, which has put itself behind the barrier of legal fortifications which no man in the world dare assail. That is the situation.

It was for the purpose of remedying against this difficulty and giving to our people something analogous to the English petition of right, whereby any British subject may come in and question the Crown as to the ownership of a piece of property that it seeks to condemn by forfeiture, confiscation, or otherwise—it was to give to them some remedy analogous to that, so that the proud boast of American liberty should have some shadow of support at least in the nature of the statutes upon which we dispense and dispose of the rights of private individuals, that I proposed the amendment which the Senate inserted on the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad forfeiture bill.

Now, I hope that I have answered the question of the honorable Senator from Kansas. He and I proceed together upon this question until we come to the point of the remedy. I assert that if these mortgagees, these bondholders, who have a legal estate in this property to-day of a certain character, a legal right of satisfaction out of it, are to be disregarded entirely, and they are to have no opportunity to controvert with the Government in respect of how much of this land is still covered by the mortgage, we are leaving them in a forlorn condition that we ought not to do. I do not know who they are or where they live; I know nothing about them; but it is my duty to know before I legislate in this case.

I think, Mr. President, that the Senate would not be doing right to go along with the passage of this bill because the two Senators from Oregon happen to agree about it. They are both most worthy and excellent Senators, men of high ability as well as high character; but we have also an interest in this question, and the holders of these bonds, who are doubtless not all of them residents of the State of Oregon, have an interest in this matter that ought to be looked after. It can not be fairly looked after until this case can go to the committee and the committee be authorized upon the evidence to report how much these debts are and what is the nature of the lien.

The Senators from Oregon both assume that a railroad company has no right to mortgage more than it owns. Nobody will deny that proposition. Neither has a railroad company by its act a right to forfeit the rights of the bondholders to collect their money out of this property, and it is required here that the right of these bondholders shall be determined because the railroad company has simply abandoned the construction of this road. That is more than the railroad company had a right to do under the law.

Now, sir, I want to know and I want the Senate to know whether it is a shadow that I am fighting about here or not. I maintain that there are rights in favor of bondholders against railroad corporations that sometimes rise superior to the rights of the corporation, not perhaps to the rights of the Government, but certainly to the rights of the corporation. And these mortgagees, I repeat, if this mortgage is at all akin to the multitude that have been examined by this Committee on Public Lands, have the right to carry out the contract with the Government, to go on and build the road, to foreclose the mortgage and take the very franchises away from the corporation, assume the duties and obligations of its charter, build the road, and thereby satisfy the public policy in which this railroad grant was first founded. Shall we cut them off from all these rights? Have we a right to say here, upon what meager knowledge we have about this thing, that these mortgagees would not proceed to foreclose this mortgage, would not proceed to gather up what belongs to them under it, including the franchises of this company, and build this important road from Portland to Astoria down the Columbia River?

Sir, that is an important road. The time, perhaps, is not ten or twenty years distant when that will be looked upon as one of the great arteries of trade in this country, and one of the means of completing by competitive railroads access to the Pacific Ocean. While it may be that persons in Oregon desire to get hold of this right, or rather to get it out of their way so that they can proceed to build a road over the same territory—and that is the allegation which is made here; while it may be that it is one of the necessary conditions precedent that they shall get rid of this mortgage and this railroad and this land grant in order that they may have untrammeled access to this important region of country for the building of this road—while this may all be so, it is still true, I dare say, I believe it to be true upon the statement made here this morning, that these mortgagees have the right to do that same thing. If the right to build a road from Portland to Astoria down that river is so valuable that citizens of Oregon desire to avail themselves of the opportunity under some State charter, why is it not valuable enough to the holders of these mortgage bonds at least to give them a right to be heard on the facts before the Senate of the United States when we are about to take away from them this land grant and to confiscate it for the benefit of the United States?

Mr. President, I do not wish to express the shadow of an opinion here that would reflect in the slightest degree upon any person connected with this matter, for there is no reason for that. Senators are candid in their opinion, no doubt entirely so, that this subject is a matter of no concern to any person, and not to the bondholders, because there is no value in the grant, they say, and because they do not want to press this question as against the company, or against the Government. But before I act upon it I desire to have an opportunity of understanding it. Two members of this committee have assured the Senate that they were not informed as to the condition of this matter; and under these circumstances I do not see how the Senate will refuse to allow this subject to go before the committee, when it can be reported back again and taken up by the Senate and acted upon with a proper knowledge of the facts.

Mr. LAPHAM. Mr. President, the Senate at the last session, after very elaborate argument and with much deliberation and by a large majority, decided that where the Government was seeking a forfeiture of a railroad grant and it appeared there were mortgagees or bondholders interested in the question the Government should perfect a proceeding by a bill in equity, calling in all proper parties, and have a legal determination of the question involved. Now, believing in the wisdom and justice of that provision in all these cases, believing that the Government should be the actor instead of throwing private individuals to their remedies, imperfect as they would be, when this bill came up yesterday I went to the honorable Senator from Alabama and asked him whether it was necessary to have any such provision in this bill, and he answered me very frankly, "There is no occasion for it, because I have inquired and learned that there are no outstanding mortgages upon this road, that there are no rights of third persons involved in the question." I know that was the condition of mind of the Senator from Alabama and the reason why he said nothing upon the subject until this morning.

Now, Mr. President, I submit, whether the amount of the interest of bondholders or mortgagees be greater or less, whether it be one that can be maintained successfully or not, the mode of determining that question adopted by the Senate in the case of the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company is one from which we should never depart, and from which we ought not to depart in this case. It will require time. The amendment necessary to accomplish the object that was sought to be accomplished in the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad bill was an elaborate amendment. It will require hours to prepare it. It can not be prepared and offered now, and there is no other mode of reaching this remedy except to adopt the suggestion of the Senator from Alabama and recommit or postpone this bill.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Mr. President, I have been listening attentively to ascertain if I could the object to be gained by a recommittal of this bill. Now for the first time after the long discussion of this matter in the other House, as the RECORD shows, and its long delay and procrastination in this body, first in its committee and then here, an urgent appeal is presented on the part of the bondholders or mortgagees of this road, who have not for two years felt their interests so much imperiled or the duty of self-preservation so imperative as to come here by themselves or their attorneys and make an appeal on their behalf. Is not that a remarkable proposition?

Gentlemen have been relating what took place in the committee-room. I may go a little further and say that day after day, until midnight, and even beyond, did attorneys of different railroads appear before the Committee on Public Lands and enter all conceivable objections to any forfeiture. The gentlemen who have served on the committee will remember that those Senators who have spoken are correct in their own understanding, and they will remember that several of these railroads were placed together, particularly those in California and Oregon, for consideration and argument before the committee, and that learned attorneys came there, and I well remember (if I may be allowed to say it, although it is entirely out of order) that a question was propounded during the argument of some of the cases whether the mortgage of the railroad company covered all the lands embraced in the grant, and the question was answered affirmatively that it did.

I understand, and I think the Senator from Alabama will agree with me, that it must have been understood by every member of the committee who listened to and heard the arguments, the long tedious arguments on that matter, that it was the custom and, as far as any rule went, the rule of railroad companies about the first thing they did to issue bonds covering all the lands granted by the act. I think the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from New Hampshire can not call to mind a single land-grant railroad that did not place a mortgage on all the lands granted.

Mr. MORGAN. I will say, if the Senator will allow me, that I do call to mind this particular case in which I was informed, and believed, there was no mortgage of any kind.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Whether the case of this road was argued separately before the committee or in connection with certain other roads which were represented by the same interest and by the same attorneys I fail to remember; but my recollection is distinct that representations were made, not for the purpose of antagonizing the statement made by any member of the committee or any Senator here, but the impression was given to the committee at some stage of these deliberations and arguments that the railroads conveyed by mortgage all the lands embraced within the grants.

What is to be accomplished by the delay now proposed? The mortgagees did not seek to be heard. If they have any interest outside of the railroad itself, which probably controls the bonds, no mortgagees have appeared in this case asking to be heard, and I do not know that any one appears for them in the Senate to-day asking that they shall be heard on the ground that their rights are to be taken from them. If the position now taken be correct, a forfeiture by Congress will be impossible. If the position is correct that every mortgagee must be heard, then the position will be equally good that every judgment creditor should be heard. Why not? A judgment creditor of this railroad company would have the same right to come in and ask to be heard by Congress before a forfeiture could be declared. I suppose the Government of the United States is not required to ascertain by an examination of the county records who may be mortgagees or creditors of a railroad company.

I understand there was a condition in this grant. That condition runs with the land evidently, and every mortgagee who takes a mortgage on this land takes it subject to this condition. It is for Congress or the Supreme Court to say whether the condition has been broken; and if the fact be true that the condition has been broken and the land is subject to forfeiture, then the same reason applies to all mortgagees and judgment creditors, for neither can have any greater right to the land granted.

That is not the question in regard to this railroad grant. That question never has been raised in the committee or outside of it until this morning. The only question was how far this forfeiture should extend. The House by its bill said that the forfeiture should reach all the lands granted, as well those adjoining the road constructed as those adjoining the road not constructed. The House, if I may be allowed to say it, were more logical than the Senate in this matter, and the facts sustain their action more than that of the Senate, and in order that that point should not be pressed too far the Senate committee, on the only point in discussion on this railroad grant, thought it better to go no further than to declare a forfeiture of the lands adjoining the part of the road not constructed; and that is all the bill which we reported proposes.

The railroad company expressly declared that it abandoned this road. Mr. Villard, in 1883, when he was president of nearly all the roads in Oregon, wrote to the board of trade or commerce of Astoria a communication in which he figured up the cost of this railroad and said they must abandon it. He was president of this railroad company. Then it became evident that the House was right in the forfeiture which it declared, because here was a company organized to construct a road from Portland to Astoria, one hundred and twenty or one hundred and thirty miles, to which a land grant was given with a view to the construction of a road that distance, with a branch running off some twenty miles. The railroad company built twenty miles from Portland and then ran its branch in an opposite direction from Astoria, and there stopped. They had constructed the easiest portion of the road; they had built it through the most valuable part of the land granted, and then they stopped.

The condition of the grant was that if the road was not completed at the end of six years the grant should be forfeited, and they accepted the grant upon that condition, and the mortgagees accepted their mortgage upon that condition. Now it would seem to an ordinary jury, I think, that they had no right to any part of the land. It became evident that they did not intend to build the road from Portland to Astoria. They only got the grant with a view to build twenty miles from Portland and then diverge twenty miles down. That was the only question there was, and it is the only question to-day. This railroad company abandoned its road. It represented the bondholders evidently, and represented the mortgagees. There can be no possible question in regard to that matter. Did I understand my friend from Alabama to say that if these mortgagees proposed to foreclose the mortgage there was no person against whom they could bring a suit, not even the railroad company?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not understand the question.

Mr. VAN WYCK. My friend said that when the mortgagees wanted to foreclose their mortgage there would be no one they could arraign in court as the defendant, not even the railroad company.

Mr. MORGAN. Nobody; and if the Government of the United States now reclaim the land it would be useless to put in a party who would have no interest in the land.

Mr. VAN WYCK. That may be, but they could get a standing in court in that way. The only question is as to delay in this matter. The bill has been already nearly two years before one branch of Congress and the other, and this is the first time an application has been made by the mortgagees as the creditors of this road or any suggestion made in that direction.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I feel bound to say that this is the first time the fact has come to the attention of some members of the committee at all events, about this mortgage. I do not think I have been delinquent about it, though I certainly have inquired very assiduously; the Senator will bear me out in that; and I certainly gave notice that I would be prepared with an amendment if there was any question of that sort in this case.

This bill can go back to the committee, and we can consider it and ascertain precisely from evidence, I suppose here in Washington, what the extent of this mortgage is and who it is who owns it. The Senator from Nebraska intimates that the mortgage is owned by some railroad company. I do not know a word about that; he may; but I do not, for I never heard of it until it was suggested to me this morning by eminent gentlemen in the House of Representatives who have been inquiring into these matters very assiduously, and who informed me of the existence of these mortgages, very much to my surprise. I think the committee ought to have the opportunity of looking into this question to see what the facts are. Shall we sit as a court here in condemnation of a railroad company or of its mortgagees and adjudicate the property out of their hands by a reclamation of the title absolutely, when there is no Senator on this floor who can tell who the mortgagees are, what length of time the mortgages have to run, what rights they have got, or the amount of the debt? I think, sir, that it would be absurd for us to do it, and I do not see why Senators are in such a hurry to push this bill through this morning as to deny to the committee, or members of it who have not been informed about this matter, an opportunity to know what the real state of the facts is. We ought to be allowed to know it before we are compelled to act; and I protest that we ought to know it.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I did not mean to say absolutely in this case as a matter of fact that these mortgages and bonds were owned by this railroad company.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator does not know who owns them, neither do I.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I can say as a matter of fact, however, that ordinarily the bonds and mortgages of a road of this nature are under the control of the managers of the railroad; and when their attorneys appeared before the committee to argue for their interest they would most naturally have argued for this interest if it was in peril at that time.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not care to try the rights of this company or of the mortgagees on a suspicion. I want to know what the facts are.

Mr. VAN WYCK. This fact was public, it was notorious; in April last, when the bill was discussed in the House of Representatives, it was there stated that mortgages existed on the line of this road. Senators may not be concluded by what took place in the other branch, but that was a fact which was made as notorious as a fact could be made in legislation. It appeared in the discussion; it was stated as a fact there that mortgages had been issued upon this railroad. That surprised nobody, for I supposed everybody knew that about the first thing a land-grant railroad company did was to issue mortgages upon its lands and put bonds upon the market. Every railroad company does that before it constructs a mile of road. It is done in all cases. These persons for many years have known of this. A person who owns a mortgage on a land-grant railroad is apt to know the history of legislation affecting that road. For many years the question has been before the American Congress, and nobody can presume that any mortgagee who would desire to be heard has not had an opportunity to present his case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The question is on the motion to recommit the bill.

Mr. SLATER. This whole case it seems to me is in a nutshell. The question is, has this corporation failed to perform the conditions of the grant? Now, it is an admitted fact that for eight years this company has done nothing toward the prosecution of the grant, and has intimated through its president that it can not and will not undertake to build the remainder of the road. Then there is a condition broken in this case, and it has been broken for eight years. This bill has been pending before Congress ever since the second day of the last session of the Senate, the second day of the legislative session of Congress, and it is strange to me that we should not have heard somewhere at some time and in some place a plea for these mortgagees prior to just on the eve of the passage of the bill.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question? I ask the Senator when he first heard that there was a mortgage upon this property?

Mr. SLATER. I can not say that I have heard it before this morning. My impression was, and I was led to believe, that there was none in this case; and yet, as I said before, reflection should have taught me that perhaps in all these cases it was the custom, and I might say the unbroken usage, to put a mortgage on the land grants as a means of constructing the roads.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator will allow me to say that reflection led me in the direction of supposing that there might be a mortgage until I asked the question and it was stated to me in the committee that there was none.

Mr. SLATER. I do not remember how that might be.

Mr. MORGAN. I do.

Mr. SLATER. But granting that there is a mortgage, I do not see that it is necessary for us to concern ourselves about that. The mortgagees stand on no higher plane, no broader basis, no higher right than the mortgageors themselves do. They can take no right that the mortgageors did not possess. The title of the mortgageors was one hampered and controlled and embarrassed by a condition. The mortgagees know the condition has been broken, and all we have to do now is to declare that condition broken and a forfeiture for that reason. These parties are not remediless. We only change the condition, the manner and mode of the procedure. One mode is proposed by the Senator from Alabama, and I do not see why he does not propose his amendment, as he did in the former case, instead of proposing to send the bill back to the committee, and let us pass on it at once if it is desirable. That amendment only changes the mode. In the one instance under the amendment parties would go into court by an interpleader at the instance of the United States. In the other case they would go into court in a suit against an individual citizen. There can be but few cases, if any at all, in which there would be any one to go into court in regard to this grant.

As I said before, as I understand this case there is no ground or basis for the application of the principle of the amendment as the Senator proposed to apply it to another bill; there are no rights which can possibly be brought into court in behalf of the original corporation, or of their subsequent purchasers, or of the mortgagees of the original corporation upon which they can or would have an equitable or legal standing in court. Why then proceed with it? It simply hampers the action of Congress; it simply ties up the matter of forfeiture an indefinite period and withholds these lands from occupation. It seems to me this is wholly unnecessary. If we had undertaken to forfeit the earned lands as well as the unearned lands, the question whether they would have rights would be a question which would go to the courts; but we avoid that by not agreeing with the House on that point. We treat that question as settled. In my judgment we can not touch the lands that have been earned, and can only touch the unearned portion of the grant.

I hope the Senate will now vote on the question and refuse to recommit.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator from Oregon is arguing a question upon which the Senate has already pronounced its judgment. By a very large majority, in the discussion upon the bill proposing to forfeit the land grant of the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad during the last session of Congress, the Senate said that there should be a remedy provided in the courts for those whose rights were concerned, and proposed, by an amendment suggested by the Senator from Alabama, to constitute a specific kind of court to entertain and decide those rights.

The distinction between the Atlantic and Pacific case and this, as it has hitherto been supposed to exist, was simply that in the case now being considered by the Senate, that of the land grant in Oregon, there was no possibility of controversy arising with reference to any other rights than those between the General Government and the original grantee, and therefore that there was no case for the attaching of that amendment and the constitution of the proposed court in relation to this grant. But the Senate had before it no other case, unless it was this Oregon case, where that state of facts was supposed to exist; and therefore those who were in favor of the creation of such a tribunal were willing that this particular bill should proceed to forfeiture without any such condition or any provision for such tribunal being attached. And so the bill was going through; but a discussion arose this morning between gentlemen of both Houses who are engaged in the consideration of the amendments upon the Atlantic and Pacific bill, and there I first obtained information that this bill was understood by the other House of Congress to be just like the others, and that there was the same occasion for the constitution of such a court with reference to rights arising under this grant as in the other cases which are before Congress. And it will be understood, I know I understand, that if this bill now before the Senate passes without such an amendment, it is practically a committal of the Senate against the very policy which it adopted in its action on the Atlantic and Pacific bill, and therefore it is important.

This radical mistake with reference to the questions involved is one which leads to this discussion, and it seems to me perfectly apparent that unless the Senate proposes to stultify itself by its action upon these two different bills the motion of the Senator from Alabama should prevail, and this bill should return to the committee, that it may come from the committee under precisely the same conditions as the other bills where the Senate committee understands that there are questions of fact to be adjudicated by the courts. That is all I wish to say.

Mr. DOLPH. I desire to say again that I distinctly recollect on more than one occasion stating to the Committee on Public Lands from my knowledge of this matter that there were mortgages upon this grant. I distinctly recollect that counsel appeared for the company and so stated orally, and I think also in a printed argument filed in the case. And my recollection is in accord with the recollection of other members of the committee. I do not question the good faith or the correctness of the Senator who has just spoken, or the Senator from Alabama, as to what they understood in regard to the matter; but I will say that when it was agreed that this bill should be reported I understood that the privilege was reserved by the Senator from Alabama of offering his amendment in the Senate, and I understood the Senator to say no longer ago than the last session of the Committee on Public Lands, on Monday last, that he might do so.

I do not care anything about this matter any further than as to the suggestion made that there may have been some withholding of information on this subject. But whatever has been done in committee, I do not see the necessity of again referring the bill to the committee for information. It is now stated on all hands that there are mortgages. The amendment which was adopted by the Senate to the Atlantic and Pacific bill is in print; it can be offered to this bill, and the sense of the Senate tested on it at any time without delay.

I will say that I voted for the amendment referred to to the Atlantic and Pacific bill, but I distinctly stated that I did so because the bills making the grants to the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company, the Texas Pacific Railroad Company, and the Northern Pacific Railroad Company were peculiar and exceptional; that in my judgment Congress had undertaken to say what the remedy should be or what penalty should be inflicted if those companies failed to construct their roads within the time limited in the grant, and that was that Congress might take such steps as were necessary to secure the completion of the roads and at least one court had held that Congress could not forfeit these grants, but must apply them for the purpose originally intended. That was the reason why I thought that in those three cases the amendment referred to ought to be adopted, and I do not stultify myself in view of what I stated on the 3d of July last when the Atlantic and Pacific bill was under discussion by proposing to vote for this bill without the amendment when I voted for the amendment to the other.

Mr. MORGAN. I regret to appear so frequently in this matter before the Senate, but I have been led into some trouble about it unexpectedly. The Senator from Oregon on my left [Mr. SLATER] informs us that this morning was the first time he ever knew that there was a mortgage on this property. Well, Senators living in other States very far distant from Oregon are perhaps not expected to find out what neither of the Senators from Oregon knew or told the committee of so far as I know. When I made the motion to recommit I did it because I wanted the committee to examine the subject and to ascertain whether there was any necessity for putting on this bill the amendment which the Senate voted onto the Atlantic and Pacific bill. I do not want the Senate to go before the House of Representatives and before the world as voting an amendment onto a bill of the character which I had the honor to offer at the last session and it was passed by this body, and then refusing to put it upon another bill of precisely the same character. That would leave us in rather bad shape, and the committee of conference in which the two Houses are now represented would be very much embarrassed no doubt if the Senate should vacillate in its course from day to day, and on one day say that such a tribunal and such a jurisdiction was necessary to be created for the protection of private rights, and on another day neglect it entirely in a case of precisely the same character. Therefore I wanted the bill to go to the committee, to see if the committee could ascertain that there were in this case facts to excuse us from doing that which the Senators both agreed to. They say they do not want this subject drawn into litigation at all; that if we pass their bill just as it is there will be no litigation. Why will there be no litigation? I wish to know whether it is because by the passage of the bill we paralyze the people who have rights, or whether it is because there are no rights of a substantial character to advance. Therefore I want the committee to act upon it.

At the time I made my motion to refer I was not aware that I should have it in my power to get a print of the amendment which I offered at the last session of the Senate. Since that time I have obtained a copy of that print and I am now prepared to offer the amendment. At the same time I dislike to offer it without action of the committee, because the two Senators from Oregon, both members of that committee, assert here in this body that there is no occasion for having this amendment put upon this bill. Yet on the face of the case as presented by one of the Senators from Oregon at least who has some acquaintance with this mortgage matter, the other not having any acquaintance with it at all, it does appear that there are mortgagees (we do not know who they are) who have rights that ought to be protected in the courts of the United States. If the persons concerned in the Atlantic and Pacific, or in the Texas and Pacific, or in any of the other roads whose lands are sought to be forfeited need the protection of the jurisdiction and power of the Federal courts, then of course in this case it is needed, unless the Senators from Oregon are able to show the committee that there is some reason why this is an exceptional case. Therefore I wanted the bill to be recommitted to the committee, and I think that is the true course to take.

I am very much obliged to my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] for calling my attention to a proposition in this case which I think I ought to state, although I do not wish to abuse the patience of the Senate. It is that it is our duty in making the forfeiture of these land grants to protect the settlers upon the land and all persons interested in the railroad land grants that are being forfeited from a great number of lawsuits. Shall we so manage this business as to compel each one of these persons in the assertion of his rights to institute a suit and undergo the expense of attorney fees and costs of court, besides the other vexations and loss of time incident to litigation, when by providing a jurisdiction of competent authority, a bill to be filed in the name and on behalf of the United States for the settlement of all these questions in one suit, we can so readily determine it?

If there was no right involved in it, as a mere matter of public policy and public justice we ought to establish some means here through the authority of Congress by which these litigations can be consolidated and brought all into one suit. Now, let me illustrate. It bears some resemblance, if the Senate will bear with me a moment, to a creditor's bill. Here a creditor comes into a court of chancery and files a bill—his debt may not be more than $300—against a debtor who owes $100,000, and he says to the court of equity: "I want the assets of this insolvent man marshaled, and I want the preferences that exist according to law and according to contract between his creditors ascertained and secured by the decree of the court; I file this bill on behalf of myself and every other creditor, and I give to every creditor of this man an opportunity to come into the court and to prove his claim and to give to the court information of its precise character."

The court of chancery, upon the petition of a single creditor of a man who may owe $100,000, the debt of the particular man not being more than $300, will take jurisdiction in a cause like that, and proceed by publication or otherwise to call in the other parties and give them an opportunity to come into that record so that the whole estate may be administered and marshaled and settled. Now, here are a class of landholders who are scattered, as in some of these cases, over a territory 1,000 miles long and forty or fifty miles wide. One of these men comes in and files his application, his petition, setting up his peculiar rights. When his rights are decided, the court having made publication that the others may come in, every man can get the benefit of that decision. The court can order a consolidation of the petitions, so that the costs will be trifling, being only the costs of a single petition, and in that way the expenses of litigation and the harassment and embarrassment of it would be very much neutralized, almost entirely dissipated.

We can not forego an opportunity to do as good a thing as this is for the people, and we surely can not deny that the circuit courts of the United States will administer justice according to law to these people as well as any of the courts of this country; for after all when these collateral litigations come to be finally heard they go up from one appeal to another, from one step to another, from a county court to a supreme court, and to the Supreme Court of the United States, and after three or four or six years of delay then we have a question decided here which perhaps unsettles and rips up hundreds of titles and destroys hundreds of homes.

Mr. President, I can not conceive how it is that we can pass over a question of this kind without creating a jurisdiction to hear this entirely new right. Let me appeal to the Senate of the United States, and to every lawyer here, if this is not a question entirely without precedent, if it is not an affair de novo. When have we ever established a jurisdiction in the United States for dealing with forfeited land grants? We have made no forfeitures of land grants; the necessity for it has not heretofore arisen; but now that a great number of people seem to be bent and determined upon forfeiting the unearned land grants in this country, it behooves us when we are dealing with this question in limine to provide a tribunal and a method of procedure which shall save expense and cost and harassment to the people.

If that is not done those gentlemen, if there be any, who desire to prevent the forfeiture of land grants will carry their purpose, because of the very enormity of the injury and wrong that will be inflicted by a simple forfeiture, and relegating these people to their rights and remedies under the local courts. The very trouble which it will entail upon the country to carry out this litigation will be a sufficient reason in the minds of sensible and good men, many of whom would really like to have some of these land grants forfeited, why none of them should be forfeited.

If I were advising a scheme by which I would effectually prevent the forfeiture of any of these land grants at all, it would be the very scheme which would be the result of passing a bill like this, without providing some Federal remedy for the administration of the right; for if we do convert these lands back into public domain—for that is the proposition, to carry them entirely out of the possession of these companies back into the public domain, and provide no remedy at all, but leave the face of the whole country to be swarming with private litigations between man and man growing out of it in a collateral way—we shall thereby so startle the sense of justice and propriety and policy of the Congress of the United States that no land grants will be forfeited.

That is the best means I know of to prevent the forfeiture of land grants. The gentlemen who are so eager and so hot about this matter, who seem to have no appetite for anything else until they have in the first place satiated their desires, like a before-breakfast toddy, by the destruction of a railroad—these gentlemen will miss their purpose entirely if they simply rely upon the idea that the Congress of the United States is going to forfeit land grants in order to fill up the country with useless and very expensive litigation.

I believe some of these land grants ought to be forfeited. I vote for their forfeiture. I vote for this forfeiture. I voted for the Atlantic and Pacific forfeiture, and perhaps it is not improper to say that I shall vote for the Texas and Pacific forfeiture, but I should hesitate to do that when I believed the evils that would be inflicted upon the litigants whose rights have sprung up under these different charters would be very much greater than the public good which could be accomplished by a relegation of these lands to the public domain.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. 1682) to enable the people of that part of the Territory of Dakota south of the forty-sixth parallel of north latitude to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of the State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

Mr. SLATER. I ask the Senator from Indiana to yield to me for a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I ask the Senator from Oregon for what purpose he desires the floor?

Mr. SLATER. I desire to have some understanding or agreement in regard to the future consideration of the bill just closed.

Mr. HARRISON. I yield for such a purpose.

Mr. SLATER. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be proceeded with to-morrow morning immediately after the morning business has been concluded, as was done to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent of the Senate that House bill 181, from the consideration of which the Senate has just passed, shall be taken up immediately after the completion of the morning business to-morrow.

Mr. SLATER. I will say at the next meeting of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. At the next meeting of the Senate, after the completion of the morning business.

Mr. HOAR. I think we ought not to sacrifice the time devoted to the Calendar. There are a great many very important bills there, and that is the only time when they are in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Massachusetts to object?

Mr. HOAR. Yes, sir; I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. SLATER. Then I move that the bill be made the order of business at the next meeting of the Senate immediately after the conclusion of the regular morning business.

Mr. HARRISON. I had no objection to yield the floor to the Senator from Oregon until he could make his request for the unanimous consent of the Senate, but if he asks me now that I shall yield further until he can submit motions to the Senate I must ask him to excuse me.

Mr. SLATER. Of course I must submit.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana is entitled to the floor.

ADMISSION OF DAKOTA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1682) to enable the people of that part of the Territory of Dakota south of the forty-sixth parallel of north latitude to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of the State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] assumed that I had in my opening remarks upon this bill imputed to Senators upon the other side of the Chamber a disposition to be actuated in their votes upon it by partisan influences and motives. The Senator was entirely mistaken; I made no such imputation. On the other hand, everything I said was intended and I think calculated to lift the discussion upon this important measure above the level of partisanship. I supposed that if I could show that this area of country, which it is now proposed to constitute into a State, had now a population equal to the unit of representation in the House of Representatives; if I could show that it had now a larger population than any other Territory ever had at the time of its admission to the Union; if I could show this so clearly that not even the stingiest arithmetic could impeach the calculation; if I could show this people to be practically unanimous in their desire for admission into the Union; if I could show that this population, under the invitations of public law, had settled upon and occupied an area greater than any one of twenty-one States of the Union; if I could show that this Territory had a productive capacity which had already placed her in the actual achievements of her industrious people far in advance of many of the older States, and gave assured promise to place her very speedily in the front rank of the States, I think I should then have made out a case which would appeal so strongly to the sense of justice of every Senator that no consideration as to the effects of this measure upon the weight of parties in the Senate of the United States or in the electoral college could influence any Senator in his vote.

Now, I claim to have established every one of those propositions. I assert that the Senator from Missouri has not successfully assailed any one of them. I am not yet authorized to anticipate that we are to have a party division upon the question of the admission of Dakota, although I am free to say that the indications seem to be all that way. I felt that I should be imputing a disgraceful thing if I charged any Senator with approaching the consideration of this question from a partisan standpoint or voting upon it from partisan motives.

But the Senator from Missouri says he would not regard it as disgraceful to declare that his vote was influenced upon this question by party feeling, though at the same time protesting that in this particular case no such feeling actuated his vote. He alluded to the debates which have taken place in the past upon the admission of States to the Union, and he said that the discussions and the votes upon those measures showed that the Senate in those olden and better times, I believe he called them, had been actuated by partisan motives. It is true that before the war and while slavery was still maintaining its aggressive and persistent fight for supremacy in the politics of this country and for an equipoise between the slave and free States, questions affecting freedom or slavery in the Territories did influence the votes of Senators, and that motive was confessed in debate. I had supposed, however, that that exigency which seemed to make it necessary, as the history of such legislation shows, to admit States by pairs, one slave and one free, had passed away with the destruction of the institution of slavery.

I am sure that the Senator from Missouri would feel that it was a disgraceful thing to say upon the floor of the Senate to 300,000 American citizens living in the Territory of Dakota that they should not be admitted to statehood because the prevailing opinion there was Republican. I am sure he would feel it to be so; and I feel very sure that no Senator on the other side of this Chamber will be bold enough to make that confession. Yet the Senator from Missouri suggests that it would be altogether a fair thing, seeing that the Territories of the United States have been so long under what he calls Republican influence, to keep them for a while longer under Democratic influence, in the hope that the Federal officers to be sent to the Territories as governors, secretaries, and marshals by the incoming Democratic administration might have sufficient influence by one means or another over the people of that Territory to change their political sentiments.

The Senator from Missouri greatly exaggerates the influence of the governor of Dakota, he greatly magnifies the power of a United States marshal in Dakota to influence political sentiment, he greatly underrates the intelligence and manhood of her population, if he supposes a complement of Democratic officers would be likely to change the political views of a majority of her citizens. A sentiment prevails in the Territories so hostile to the appointment of their officers from the States, that those who go there to discharge official functions are to a great extent robbed even of that degree of influence which their own ability and standing would give them if they were citizens of the Territory ni a private capacity.

But the Senator says he does not propose to vote against the admission of Dakota with a view of attempting to convert her Republican majority into a Democratic majority. He only suggests it as a fair thing to do, but one that his mind does not quite consent to at the present time.

The speeches of the Senator from Missouri are always sonorous and pleasing. But he does not always define himself with absolute clearness. I think he conspicuously failed in this respect yesterday, not because of any lack of ability to state his propositions clearly, but because the conditions of the debate were against that method of argumentation. I listened with interest, trying, as the Senator proceeded, to settle in my own mind one question, and as I failed I will ask him to settle it for me now. What rule does the Senator prescribe to himself in relation to the population which a Territory should possess before its admission to the Union? Does he consent that when it is shown to have a population equal to the unit of representation in the House of Representatives it is then entitled to admission? If he does not consent to that basis, what basis does he suggest? I should be pleased if the Senator would respond to this question now.

Mr. VEST. With the greatest pleasure, Mr. President. I have never assumed to prescribe for myself or others any rule in regard to the admission of any Territory as a State. I have said and say now that I believe the spirit of the Constitution requires that every new State admitted into the Union should have at least the ratio of population that would entitle it to a member in the popular branch of Congress. But even if that existed, that would not necessitate me to vote in favor of its admission. It would depend in each individual case upon the character of the population, of the institutions that I thought they would have, and of the effect of the admission generally upon the rest of the States in the Union.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator is quite as indefinite in his answer as he was yesterday in his speech. He says the State should have at least the population requisite for a member of the House, but it may have that population and more, according to the answer of the Senator from Missouri, it might have twice that population, and still have no claim to admission, notwithstanding its population is entirely homogeneous, not only between its own parts, but a population homogeneous with that of the whole country.

Mr. VEST. If the Senator will permit me, I will propound a question to him.

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. VEST. If I understand the Senator correctly, he says that when a population exists over and above the ratio for a member of the lower House that is conclusive of the question, if the population is homogeneous. Is that his position?

Mr. HARRISON. Not at all; my proposition is that as to population it is conclusive.

Mr. VEST. As a matter of course.

Mr. HARRISON. And I ask the Senator whether he regards it so.

Mr. VEST. I state to the Senate emphatically, as I stated yesterday in my feeble way, and I can make it no stronger, that population of itself is not sufficient. Suppose Utah should apply here with a million inhabitants for admission, would the Senator vote for it? I undertake to answer for him "no." Therefore there are other considerations besides population.

Mr. HARRISON. I have not denied, but in my opening remarks asserted, the very proposition which the Senator now asserts. But my question related to population only. Supposing all other things, as to the character of the people, the institutions they have adopted, the civilization that prevails among them—suppose all those to be in line with the general civilization of our country; then, it being a question only of population, how much does he insist upon? That is the point. The Senator is too good a lawyer not to see it. All the other conditions that are essential to the admission of a State, and which assure us that when she takes her place among us it will be with institutions that are in harmony with the civilization of the other States; all that being assumed, how much population can we insist upon; and the answer I get from the Senator is at least the ratio of representation in the House of Representatives. He leaves the other limit entirely unfixed. He leaves himself free, as I understand, notwithstanding there are people enough to entitle the new State to a member in the lower House, notwithstanding all her institutions are right and unexceptional, to vote against her admission.

I showed in my opening remarks, from all the precedents, that no one had ever argued that a larger population than one equal to the ratio of representation could be demanded of any Territory seeking admission to the Union. Now, I ask upon this question of population, for I propose to take up these considerations one at a time and not have them massed upon me, why is it that Dakota is not to be admitted now?

I have not alluded to the prevailing political sentiment in the Territory of Dakota. I had not sought to find in that the cause of Democratic opposition to the admission of this Territory, but when we have such conclusive evidence of a sufficient population, I ask Senators on the other side of the Chamber either to give me some other rule or to pass with me favorably that part of the debate and let the discussion advance to some other question.

The Senator from Missouri rejects all precedents. Trained as a lawyer, trained to quote and to show respect to precedent, he wipes out with one rhetorical sweep the entire history in Congress of the admission of States. He tells us that some new, indefinite rule ought to be applied now, because settlement is so rapid in the new Territories, while formerly it was slow. Does it make any difference whether it takes ten years for one hundred and fifty thousand people to get into a Territory, or whether they all go in in one year, if they are bona fide settlers? It is not a question of the length of the journey; it is not a question of tediousness of settlement; it is a question of a bona fide resident population.

In that connection the Senator alluded to the fact that 800,000 foreigners were pouring in upon our country every year. I do not suppose that this suggestion came to the Senator's mind by reason of a reference made in one of the letters he read. One of the gentlemen whose letters he read alludes to the fact that there is a very large foreign population in the Territory of Dakota, and expresses the opinion that they are no more fitted to exercise the rights of American citizenship than the colored people in the South. I would not impute to the Senator a suggestion that Dakota should be delayed in her admission because a large per cent. of her population happened to be of foreign birth, and yet he alludes to the great immigration coming from abroad, to the suddenness and rapidity with which our own population, drawn from our best States, is throwing itself into the Western Territories, and he faintly suggests that by reason of this some different rule should be adopted on the subject of the admission of a State.

Now, I wish to say just a word or two as to the actual population in Southern Dakota. I want to show any Senator on the other side of the Chamber who will listen that when I say the stingiest arithmetic can not deny to the southern portion of Dakota a population equal to the present ratio of representation in the House of Representatives I
